KNIGHT'S POPULAR HISTORY OF ENGLAND.

A HISTORY OF SOCIETY AND GOVERNMENT FROM THE EARLIEST PERIOD TO OUR OWN TIMES.

The proceedings of the English parliament, from the period when the Commons went up to the king with an address, declaring that they would support him in a war with France, to the adjournment in August, are no doubt interesting when presented with characteristic details, but are scarcely important enough to be related with minuteness in a general history. Less important is it to trace the factious disputes in which so many angry passions and so many petty jealousies were called forth during the three or four latter months of the session. It is satisfactory to know that the attainders of William Lord Russell, of Algernon Sidney, of Alice Lisle, and of Alderman Cornish, were reversed. It is not so satisfactory to trace the revival of past animosities in the discussions upon the sentence of Titus Oates, who brought that sentence before the House of Lords by a writ of error. A majority of Peers affirmed the judgment; but in the lower house a bill annulling the sentence was brought in. The majority of the Lords looked at the infamous character of Oates. In the Commons the supporters of the bill for annulling the sentence looked to the illegality of the judgment. The difference between the two houses was compromised. Oates was released from confinement, having received a pardon, and the Commons moved an address to the crown that he should be allowed a small pension for his support. In the case of Samuel Johnson, the Commons voted that his degradation from ecclesiastical functions was illegal, and the king was asked to bestow some preferment on him. William more wisely gave him a thousand pounds and a pension.

During this session an act was passed by which any Protestant clergyman of Ireland who had been forced to leave that kingdom, "for fear of the Irish rebels," should not be deprived of an Irish benefice by accepting ecclesiastical preferment in England.* Before the landing of James at Kinsale many Protestants had fled to England, in the dread of a repetition of the frightful atrocities of 1641. Many of these refugees were aided by a public subscription, and some of the clergy were appointed to lectureships and small livings.† The miseries produced "by fear of the Irish rebels" were small compared with the tyrannous proceedings of the parliament which King James opened in Dublin on the 7th of May. Of two hundred and fifty members of the Irish House of Commons only six were Protestants. James told the parliament in opening the session that he had always been for liberty of conscience, and against invading the property of any man. The next day he issued a proclamation, in which he says that, since his arrival in his kingdom of Ireland, he had made it his chief concern to satisfy his Protestant subjects "that the defence of their religion, privileges, and properties is equally our care with the recovery of our rights." It has been alleged, as an excuse for James in furnishing a very speedy proof of the futility of such professions, that he could not control the violent spirit of his parliament. They passed an Act of Toleration on one day; they passed an Act of Confiscation on the next. The one act consisted of unmeaning professions; the other transferred all the lands held by Protestants under old Acts of Settlement to their ancient proprietors before the rebellion of 1641. Another act transferred the tithe, for the most part, from the Protestant to the Roman Catholic clergy, without compensation. But the iniquity of the act which deprived the holders of property for nearly forty years, whether acquired by grant, purchase, or mortgage, was small when compared with the Act of Attainder, by which two thousand six hundred persons were declared traitors, and adjudged to suffer the pains of death and forfeiture. "The severity of this act exceeded even that of the famous proscription at Rome during the last Triumvirate."* The Act of Attainder affected the real estates of absentees thus declared to be traitors. Another act vested in the king all their goods and chattels, debts, and arrears of rent. The spirit of the parliament was universally carried out. The arms of all Protestants were seized, whatever their political opinions. The Protestant clergy, mostly preachers of divine right, were insulted and unprotected. The fellows and scholars of the University of Dublin were thrust out of their halls and chambers, and their property seized, the sole condition of their personal liberty being that no three of them should meet together, "on pain of death." This was the ready phrase of terror applicable under all circumstances. The king, with the example before him of iniquities long faded away, issued a coinage of brass money which was to pass as sixpences, shillings, and half-crowns. "Eight half-crowns of this money were not intrinsically worth twopence.'† The tradesmen of Dublin, if they refused the money, were threatened to be hanged by the provost-marshal. The government of King James, that was looking forward to the day when England and Scotland should come under the same merciful rule, decreed, by proclamation in the name of the king, that no covetous person should give by exchange of the currency, intolerable rates for gold and silver to the great disparagement of the brass and copper money, under pain of death.

Such, when King William met his parliament on the 19th of October, were the manifestations of what might be expected from the blessed rule of King James, should he be restored in England. It is recorded of William that, on the day before, he met the council, and produced a draft of his speech written by himself in French, when he thus expressed himself: "I know most of my predecessors were used to commit the drawing of such speeches to their ministers, who generally had their private aims and interests in view; to prevent which, I have thought fit to write it myself in French, because I am not so great a master of the English tongue: therefore, I desire you to look it over, and change what you may find amiss, that it may be translated into English." This was not complimentary to the king's ministers, nor accordant with our modern notions of ministerial responsibility. Yet it was an honest endeavor of William's commonsense not to be misunderstood. He said that it was a misfortune that, at the beginning of his reign, he should have to ask such large supplies for carrying on the wars upon which he had entered with their advice. He had not engaged in these out of a vain ambition, but from the necessity of opposing those who had so visibly discovered their designs of destroying the liberties and religion of the nation. He asked that there should be no delay in determining what should be the supply for the charges of the war, because there was to be a meeting at the Hague of all the princes and states who were engaged against France, and his own resolutions would be determined by the means at his command. This was honest language, which the Commons seconded by a vote that they would stand by the king in the reduction of Ireland and in a vigorous prosecution of the war with France. Yet there is nothing more painful to one who looks back upon the history of his country, with an earnest desire to think the best of her public men, than to trace, amid the bitter contests of factions, the slight predominance of the patriotic spirit. The second session of the Convention Parliament is a melancholy exhibition of party intrigues for power, of rivalries that were to be made enduring by mean revenges, of desperate attempts to revive the indiscriminate hatreds of the past in a frequent disregard of the necessities of the present—hateful contests, that made William seriously purpose to throw up the government, and remove himself from a scene where he was unable to make men understand that there was a duty to their country which ought to outweigh all selfish desires.

The work for which this session of parliament is to be chiefly remembered in after time was the passing of the Bill of Rights. This celebrated measure was the reduction to a statute of the Declaration of Rights.* Some important provisions were introduced. It was enacted, to prevent the kingdom being governed by a papist, that the sovereign should, in parliament and at the coronation adopt by repetition and subscription the declaration against transubstantiation. It was also enacted that if the sovereign should marry a papist the subject should be absolved from allegiance. The dispensing power of the crown—the cause of so many fierce conflicts—was absolutely taken away.† The parliament in this session left few other records of considerate legislation. They went wildly to work with impeachments. They impeached the Earl of Peterborough and the Earl of Salisbury for departing from their allegiance and being reconciled to the Church of Rome. They impeached the Earl of Castlemaine under a charge of trying to reconcile the kingdom to the Church of Rome. They raked up the accusations against those who had been accessory to the convictions of Russell and Sidney, chiefly in the hope to fasten some charge upon Halifax, who had retired from office. They carried their political hatreds so far back into the region of history as to accept a statement that "Major-General Ludlow is come into England, and is in town; and that his old accomplices do comfort, aid, and abet him;" and thereupon they carried an address that the king would issue a proclamation for apprehending General Ludlow, who stood attainted of high treason for the murder of Charles I. Old Colonel Birch, who asked for evidence of Ludlow being in London, made a sly allusion to the contrast between the present and the past: "I am in a new periwig, and pray let the house look upon me."‡ The men of the new periwigs seemed anxious that the passions of the old love-locks should never be forgotten. Ludlow returned to his asylum at Vevay; to wonder, perhaps, what sort of revolution was that of 1688, which had thus repudiated what it owed to the Puritans who had made the Bill of Rights a practicable thing.

Among the annoyances to which William and Mary were subjected by party intrigues, there were none, probably, more personally distasteful than the misunderstandings which arose out of the position of the Princess Anne. Upon her marriage with Prince George of Denmark she had a settlement of £20,000 a year. From the circumstance of Anne being the presumptive heir of the crown, it was not unnatural that she should desire a larger revenue. From the peculiarities of her character she was necessarily a fit subject for intriguing politicians to work upon. Sarah Churchill, afterward Duchess of Marlborough, had over her the most unbounded influence. The attachment of Mrs. Morley (Anne) to her dear Mrs. Freeman (Sarah)—or rather the dependence of a weak nature upon an imperious one—had an influence of long duration upon the politics of England. The correspondence of the princess and the lady of the bedchamber, under their fictitious names, would lead to the belief that real friendship was not incompatible with a court atmosphere if we did not see beneath this seeming affection the schemes of one of the most cunning and domineering of her sex. The Tories, who looked to Anne, in 1689, as one to be propitiated, had been moved to apply to parliament for a large increase of her income. Sarah tells the story herself: "Her majesty, when some steps were made in parliament toward settling a revenue on the prince and princess, taking her sister one night to task for it, she asked her, What was the meaning of these proceedings? To which the princess answered, She heard her friends had a mind to make her some settlement. The queen hastily replied, with a very imperious air, 'Pray, what friends have you but the king and me?'" The lady goes on to state how she urged the princess to persist in applying to parliament instead of depending upon the king; how Shrewsbury (she erroneously calls him "duke") came to her from the king, "who promised to give the princess £50,000 if she would desist from soliciting the settlement by parliament;" and how she, the dictatress of the princess, insinuated a doubt whether the king would keep his word; upon which the princess herself told Shrewsbury, "that she could not think herself in the wrong to desire a security for what was to support her."* The friends who had a mind to make the princess some settlement went too far. They asked for £70,000 a year, which the house would not grant; and, finally, Anne received the £50,000 which Shrewsbury was authorized to offer.

The politics of the palace were passing annoyances from the troublesome movements of a faction rather than permanent causes of uneasiness to the king. The Whigs, to whom he in a great degree owed his crown, had manifested a violence toward their political opponents that rendered it impossible that he could wear that crown in tranquillity. They sought to obtain a considerable increase of power, by a bold manœuvre which would materially strengthen them in a new parliament. Without any attempt to legislate in the spirit of party, a bill had been read twice for restoring the corporations which had surrendered their charters at the mandates of Charles II. and James II. There was a thin attendance in the house, for it was the holiday time of Christmas. But the Whigs by concert mustered in force, and engrafted upon the bill two clauses disqualifying for municipal office every person who had been instrumental in surrendering the charter of a borough. The term proposed for the duration of this disqualification was seven years. A large proportion of the parliamentary franchise was in the hands of corporations. The clause would have the effect of removing Tory electors and substituting Whig electors. This attempt at a surprise was finally defeated. The gross injustice of the clauses—their spirit of vindictiveness—produced a disgust in which the king participated as much as any man. Absent members rushed to London from every district, and the clauses were at length rejected. The Tories, now triumphant, tried to carry the bill of indemnity for political offences, which had been laid aside in the last session. So many exceptions to the measure of amnesty were introduced by the opposite faction that it became a measure of proscription. William was worn out by these contests. According to Balcarres he told the Duke of Hamilton "that he wished he were a thousand miles from England, and that he had never been king of it."† Burnet gives a circumstantial relation of the effect of these manifestations upon a mind so usually calm and imperturbable. "He was once very near a desperate resolution; he thought he could not trust the Tories, and he resolved he would not trust the Whigs; so he fancied the Tories would be true to the queen, and confide in her, though they would not in him. He therefore resolved to go over to Holland, and leave the government in the queen's hands: so he called the Marquis of Carmarthen, with the Earl of Shrewsbury and some few more, and told them he had a convoy ready, and was resolved to leave all in the queen's hands; since he did not see how he could extricate himself out of the difficulties into which the animosities of parties had brought him: they pressed him vehemently to lay aside all such desperate resolutions, and to comply with the present necessity. Much passion appeared among them: the debate was so warm that many tears were shed; in conclusion, the king resolved to change his first design into another better resolution, of going over in person to put an end to the war in Ireland."* This last resolution came to be known, and it was determined by the Whigs to oppose it, as a step inconsistent with the health and safety of the king. William took a decisive course. He went to parliament on the 27th of January, determined to prevent any address that should interfere with his purpose. In his speech from the throne he said, "It is a very sensible affliction to me to see my good people burdened with heavy taxes; but since the speedy recovery of Ireland is, in my opinion, the only means to ease them, and to preserve the peace and honor of the nation, I am resolved to go thither in person, and, with the blessing of God Almighty, endeavor to reduce that kingdom, that it may no longer be a charge to this." The parliament was then prorogued, and, two days after, dissolved.

"There was fierce and great carousing about being elected in the new parliament." Thus writes Evelyn on the 16th of February. "There was a great struggle all England over in elections," says Burnet; "but the Corporation Bill did so highly provoke all those whom it was to have disgraced that the Tories were by far the greater number in the new parliament." A year had passed in which the foundations of civil and religious liberty had been widened and strengthened; but the constitutional legislation of the Convention Parliament was not likely to excite much popular enthusiasm. The people were heavily taxed to carry on the war. On the continent no effectual resistance had been offered to the ambition of France, and in Ireland James was dictator, at the head of a large military force. A prince with the highest reputation for courage and sagacity had come to be king over England; and yet her navy had been defeated in an encounter with the French; and the army which had gone to Ireland under Marshal Schomberg had done nothing, and was perishing in its inaction. At the dinner-table of the most influential minister, Carmarthen, "a very considerate and sober commander, going for Ireland, related to us the exceeding neglect of the English soldiers, suffering severely for want of clothes and necessaries this winter, exceedingly magnifying their courage and bravery during all their hardships."† Meagre as are the reports of debates in parliament, we may trace, in 1689, complaints of departmental neglect very similar to those which were so loudly outspoken in 1855. Mr. Waller gave an account at the bar of the House of Commons of the state of the army in Ireland. The baggage-horses were left behind at Chester; for profit was made by putting them to grass. The sickness by which Schomberg's forces were terribly reduced he imputed to the great defect of clothing; "all that were well clothed were in health." He contrasted the care bestowed upon a Dutch regiment in camp with the neglect of the English: "Their officers looked upon their soldiers as their children, and would see them make their huts, pave them, and lay fresh straw; in the whole Dutch camp scarce two died." Surgeons' medicines were very ill provided: "It was reported they had 1700*l.* worth of medicines, but I know not where they were." In that rainy season "the foreigners were warmer clothed than our own men, in great coats over their close coats; of which the English had none." Lastly, the troops "were not well furnished with shoes: some came late—they were not consigned to anybody."‡ The Commons naturally became furious at these recitals of neglect and peculation. Shales, the commissary of the stores, was the chief mark for their indignation. "If ever you have the war carried on with honor and success," said Colonel Birch, "you must hang this man." The house wanted to criminate higher men than the commissary of the stores, whose experience in what was useful as well as what was dishonest had been acquired in the army of James. The Commons resolved upon an indecent address to the king, to ask him to inform them who had recommended Shales. William consulted his higher sense of honor by refusing to be an informer. A wiser course was adopted than hanging Shales. A commission was sent to Ireland to remedy these abuses. The state of the navy was not more satisfactory than that of the army. The indefatigable secretary of the navy, Pepys, though now out of office, had his keen eye upon the abuses of that department of which he had the most intimate knowledge of any man. At a dinner at which Evelyn was present, Pepys "deplored the sad condition of our navy, as governed by inexperienced men since the revolution." He was for building frigates. He desired "they would leave off building such high decks, which were for nothing but to gratify gentleman commanders, who must have all their effeminate accommodations, and for pomp. It would be the ruin of our fleets if such persons were continued in command, they neither having experience nor being capable of learning, because they would not submit to the fatigue and inconvenience which those who were bred seamen would undergo."* The victualling of the fleet was as notoriously infamous as the commissariat of the army. The victuallers were ordered by the house into custody; but the affair seems to have evaporated in talk. "I believe the fleet is as ill victualled as if our enemies had done it," was the sense of the house, thus expressed by Mr. Hampden. "You may talk of raising money, but not of raising seamen," said another member. The seamen would not serve to be starved and poisoned. With a council in which there was far more hatred than concord; with a parliament in which the evils of party greatly outweighed its advantages; with a Church equally divided in opinion—"of whom the moderate and sober part were for a speedy reformation of divers things, which it was thought might be made in our liturgy, for the inviting of dissenters, others more stiff and rigid, for no condescension at all;"† with the dry rot of corruption in all the administrative departments of government—we can scarcely be surprised that William panted for another field of action, in which his own energies could be fairly put forth. "The going to a campaign," he said, "was naturally no unpleasant thing to him; he was sure he understood that better than how to govern England."‡ And so the sickly man advised with Sir Christopher Wren about building for him a house of wood, that should be carried with the army like a showman's booth; and though his constant cough had driven him from Whitehall to Kensington for purer air, he resolved to take no heed of those who manifested a real or pretended concern for his health. He would see with his own eyes if affairs in Ireland were irretrievable. Upon the king himself almost wholly devolved the duty of making a fit preparation for his campaign, by searching into the abuses of the military departments, and of remedying evils of such disastrous magnitude. He wrote to his friend Portland, after the prorogation of parliament, "All will depend upon success in Ireland. I must apply myself entirely to regulate everything in the best way I can. There is no small work on my hands, being so badly assisted as I am."§

At the opening of parliament on the 20th of March, 1690, some changes had been made in the ministry and in the lesser offices, "so that," says Burnet, "Whig and Tory were now pretty equally mixed; and both studied to court the king by making advances upon the money-bills."‖ The king had a tolerably equal contempt for both factions; and his sense of the baseness of some public men is recorded by the historian of his own time. Sir John Trevor, who had been master of the rolls under James, "being a Tory in principle, undertook to manage that party, provided he was furnished with such sums of money as might purchase some votes; and by him began the practice of buying off men, in which hitherto the king had kept to stricter rules. I took the liberty once to complain to the king of this method. He said he hated it as much as any man could do; but he saw it was not possible, considering the corruption of the age, to avoid it, unless he would endanger the whole."¶ The corruption of the age lasted through three generations. It had "lighter wings to fly" when paper-credit came. It grew more rampant under the second George than under the first. It flourished through half the reign of the third George. It would have lasted to our time if the people had not become fully acquainted with the proceedings of their representatives. It could not live in the light of public opinion, shed upon the nation by the free publication of the debates. We can scarcely blame King William for using the ready means of self-defence, while his enemies freely employed the subtlest arts for his overthrow. It was difficult for him to trust any one. His favorite minister was the Whig, Shrewsbury. Read his correspondence, and he appears the fairest of advisers. He writes to the king, "I wish you could have established your party upon the moderate and honest-principled men of both factions; but as there be a necessity of declaring, I shall make no difficulty to own my sense, that your majesty and the government are much more safe depending upon the Whigs, whose designs, if any against, are improbable and remoter than with the Tories, who, many of them, questionless, would bring in King James; and the best of them, I doubt, have a regency still in their heads; for though I agree them to be the properest instruments to carry the prerogative high, yet I fear they have so unreasonable a veneration for monarchy, as not altogether to approve the foundation yours is built upon." * William manifested some favor to the Tories, and Shrewsbury resigned the seals as secretary of state. Burnet says, "He saw the Whigs, by using the king ill, were driving him into the Tories; and he thought these would serve the king with more zeal if he left his post." William, continues Burnet, "loved the Earl of Shrewsbury." The man represented as so sullen and so cold pressed his favorite secretary again and again to hold the seals. Shrewsbury steadily refused; and his "agitation of mind threw him into a fever that nearly cost him his life." It has been proved, beyond doubt, that this friend of William resigned the seals by the command of King James, to whom he had tendered his services. James, in a paper submitted to the French government in 1692, said, "There is the Earl of Shrewsbury, who, being secretary of state to the Prince of Orange, surrendered his charge by my order." † Shrewsbury, from weakness of character, was faithless to the master whom he admired; and his alienation was very temporary. Others were treacherous through the baseness of their natures; and, in betraying the prince whom they had contributed to raise, did not hesitate to betray their country.

Whatever may have been the amount of individual baseness, and of party violence, among the legislators of this period—however unpleasant their jealousy of arbitrary power might have been to a king who truly desired to rule over a free people—the spirit of the Long Parliament had not departed from the second parliament of the revolution. However desirous Whig or Tory might be to gain favor with the sovereign, they agreed in refusing to grant the duties of customs to the crown for life, as they had been granted to William's two predecessors. "Why should they entertain a jealousy of me," the king said to Burnet, "who came to save their religion and liberties, when they trusted King James so much, who intended to destroy them?" Wisely and boldly did the bishop answer him: "King James would never have run into those counsels that ruined him if he had obtained the revenue only for a short term." ‡ On a previous occasion, when this question of the settlement of the revenue was raised, William said to Burnet, "he understood the good of a commonwealth as well as of a kingly government; and it was not easy to determine which was best: but he was sure the worst of all governments was that of a king without treasure and without power." § We may well believe that William had no desire to use treasure or power for despotic purposes; and yet we may rejoice that the Commons of England stoutly resolved to prevent the possibility of the crown becoming dangerous by being too independent. For out of the practical working of the constitution, through many a struggle, it has come to be understood that the sovereign can have no interest separate from the public advantage; and that the representatives of the people would grossly err in any attempt to lower the personal dignity of the sovereign. The real relations of the executive and the legislative power have practically changed, without any change in the constitutional theory of their rights. Under the well understood principle that the advisers of the crown cannot exist with a minority in the House of Commons, the dignity of the crown is in no degree lessened by any opposition which may enforce a change of the servants of the crown. It was otherwise when the sovereign was in a considerable degree his own minister, and when his servants did not act under a joint responsibility. William drew a distinction between the good of a commonwealth and the good of a kingly government. Practically the distinction has almost ceased to exist in our times. But we venture to think that our constitutional historian scarcely makes allowance for the remaining influence of the traditions of the monarchy when he says of William, "He could expect to reign on no other terms than as the chief of a commonwealth." *

The statute-book contains an act of a dozen lines, which passed with little effectual opposition, although well calculated to produce a trial of strength between the two great parties. It is the act whereby the Lords and Commons recognize and acknowledge that William and Mary "were, are, and of right ought to be, by the laws of this realm, our sovereign liege lord and lady, king and queen." † This act also declares that all the acts made in the parliament assembled on the 13th of February, 1688 [1689], are laws and statutes of this kingdom. Upon this point the Lords debated long and warmly. In the Commons the question was settled in two days; for Somers put the house in a dilemma. This parliament, he said, depends entirely on the foundation of the last. "If that were not a legal parliament, they who were then met, and had taken the oaths enacted by that parliament, were guilty of high treason: the laws repealed by it were still in force, so they must presently return to King James." ‡ The Whigs had their triumph in so easily carrying this bill. It was a triumph of common-sense. They were justly defeated upon an attempt to impose a new test upon the people. A bill was introduced in the House of Commons requiring every person holding office to abjure King James. To make the proposed measure still more odious, any justice of the peace was empowered to tender the oath of abjuration at his pleasure, and to commit to prison whoever refused to take it. The bill was rejected by a small majority. The measure, with some modifications, was then tried anew in the House of Peers. "I have taken so many oaths in my time," said Lord Wharton, who looked back to the days of the Long Parliament, "that I hope God will forgive me if I have not kept them all. I should be very unwilling to charge myself with more at the end of my days." The old Puritan interpreted the real feelings of every honest man about the multiplication of political oaths. It was well known that William had no desire for such a measure as this oath; and thus, after many angry words and insinuations, the abjuration of King James was abandoned. King William strengthened his throne far more effectually than by a test arbitrarily administered, by authorizing Carmarthen to present to the Peers an Act of Grace for political offences. Bitter memories of the past had prevented the passing of indemnity bills. William resolved that the cause of the revolution should not be disgraced with forfeitures and bloodshed, as was that of the restoration. The exceptions to the Act of Grace were the surviving regicides—who had been excepted under the Act of Charles II. These were far out of the reach of such a visitation for the crime of forty years' standing. Thirty of the evil instruments of James were excepted by name; and, last of all, "George, Lord Jeffreys, deceased." This "Act for the king and queen's most gracious general and free pardon," was passed by both houses without debate. It was one of the most effectual means to prevent a recurrence of "the long and great troubles and discords that have been within this kingdom." Yet the clemency of William was sneered at by those who received its benefits, and condemned by those who were balked of their revenges. The king closed the session on the 20th of May; and an act having been passed to give the queen power to administer the government in his absence, he prepared to take the conduct of the war in Ireland.

William left London on the 4th of June. He had selected nine privy-councillors to advise the queen in the conduct of affairs. It was difficult wholly to rely upon the honesty of this council, in which there was a mixture of the leading men of the opposite factions. It was a time of great anxiety. Plots were in course of detection; invasion might be expected. The king determined to go where the necessity was most pressing. "He seemed to have a great weight upon his spirits, from the state of his affairs, which was then very cloudy. He said, for his own part, he trusted in God, and would either go through with his business, or perish in it. He only pitied the poor queen, repeating that twice with great tenderness; and wished that those who loved him would wait much on her, and assist her." * William had done everything in his power to insure success in his great enterprise. Schomberg had been largely reinforced. His army had grievously suffered from sickness and neglect. The pestilence which had thinned its ranks was deemed by the court of King James "a visible mark of God's judgment upon that wicked and rebellious generation." † William, "a fatalist in religion," according to Smollett, had a rational confidence that God might manifest his judgments through the industry and zeal of his creatures; and he had set about to repair all that had been amiss in the previous organization of the Irish army. He had now in Ireland thirty-six thousand troops, well fed, properly clothed, not wanting in the munitions of war, prepared by his own vigilant superintendence to take the field with those advantages without which the skill of a general and the bravery of his men may be thrown away. The English knew how carefully it had been endeavored to repair the evils of the last autumn and winter. Still the people were anxious and doubtful. There is a curious instance of the uncertainty attached by public opinion to the determination of the king to attempt the reduction of Ireland—an instance also of the gambling spirit of that age. Rowland Davies, Dean of Ross, who had been ejected from his benefices, is going with the army of William as a chaplain. He and four of his friends desire to raise money; and they borrow four hundred pounds under a bond, signed and sealed at Jonathan's coffee-house, the great resort of stock-jobbers, "for the payment of six hundred pounds within a month after King William and Queen Mary are in actual possession of Dublin and Cork." ‡ Of the condition and prospects of King James, a lamentable account is given by his official biographer. The Duke of Berwick had been beaten at Belturbet; Charlemont had surrendered; but these misfortunes "were nothing in comparison of the disappointments the king met with from the court of France." Louis would not consent to make England the seat of war instead of Ireland. He would not believe that the friends of James in England, at the head of an Irish and French army, would soon "make the English weary of resisting God and their duty." § Louis would only consent to send six thousand men into Ireland. The English were masters of Ulster. The Catholics who quitted it upon Schomberg's landing brought such prodigious flocks of cattle with them as ate up the greatest part of the grass and corn of other counties, according to the lugubrious memoir writer. The Rapparees destroyed on all sides; there was no corn nor meal to feed the army; no cloth, no leather; "and the brass money put an absolute stop to importation." We cannot have a more striking picture of the effects of an improvident and iniquitous administration of public affairs.

Ulster, at the beginning of June, was big with expectation of the arrival of King William. Absurd reports preceded him. An officer came from London to Belfast, and reported that the parliament was adjourned; that the king was speedily to set out, "and will bring with him four hundred thousand men." ‖ On the 7th the busy chaplain, preaching one day, dining jovially in the English quarters on another, saw many troops landing at Carrickfergus, and the train of artillery in the harbor. On the 10th, in the evening, on a false report that the king was landed, "all the country flamed with bonfires." ¶ On the 14th, over a bowl of punch, "we received the news of the king's landing, and being at Belfast, and spent the night jollily." On the 15th the officers of the various regiments crowded round William, and were presented to him. Troops continued to arrive, "insomuch that there was not less than five hundred sail of ships together in the Lough." William reviewed the troops on the 17th and on the 19th, and then gave orders that they should march after him. The army was composed not only of English and Englishers. There were Brandenburgers, Dutch, Danes, and French Huguenots. The spirit of the king triumphed over his feeble body. He was all animation. His eye sparkled with the exultation of hope. "I will not let the grass grow under my feet," he exclaimed. James appeared equally alert at the call of danger. He left Dublin on the 16th of June. William's army was at Loughbrickland on the 26th of June, consisting of thirty-six thousand men. The troops had manifested a very different conduct from those of James, who had ravaged the country in the preceding year; for William had issued an order that they "do so carry themselves both in garrison, quarters, and wheresoever they shall march, as persons ought to do who are under military discipline;" that they should not presume to rob or spoil, to do violence, or extort, "but that they duly pay such reasonable rates for their provisions" as shall be ordered and appointed.* The captains of King William's forces paid in a better coin than the brass money of King James. It was expected that the Irish army would have disputed the passage of William at the pass near Moyra Castle, now known as Ravensdale; but they left it open, and on the 27th the English army was at Dundalk, forming "a camp at least three miles in length, in two lines." † King James still retired as William advanced; but at length, on the 30th, as the English army approached Drogheda, the enemy was seen encamped on the opposite south bank of the Boyne.

The army of James was in a strong defensive position. The stream which divided the counties of Louth and Meath was between him and his rival. "The river was deep, and rose very high every tide; and after these difficulties were surmounted, there was a morass to be passed, and behind it a miry ground." ‡ The camp of James on the Meath side was defended by intrenchments and batteries. The fortress of Drogheda, on the Louth side, was held by the Irish, and displayed the ensigns of James and of Louis. The numbers of his enemy were variously reported to William. He had received tolerably accurate information from a man who knew how to deal with exaggerations. An officer who had deserted from James's army greatly magnified their real amount. Mr. Cox, a civilian with Sir Robert Southwell, bade the officer look upon the English camp and say what their numbers were. "He confidently affirmed them to be more than double their real number; whence his majesty perceived he was a conceited ill-guesser." § William, surrounded by his generals, rode along the bank of the river on the morning of the 30th to inspect the position of the enemy. "We shall soon be better acquainted with their numbers," he observed. ‖ He alighted from his horse near the village of Old Bridge. It was a rising ground, within musket-shot of the river. His breakfast was spread on the grass, and he rested for a hour. On the opposite bank there were watchful eyes directed toward the group which surrounded William, and it was soon perceived that no common enemy was within the reach of cannon. Two field-pieces were quickly brought down from the hill, and planted in a ploughed field screened by a hedge. The king had remounted. One piece is fired, and the horse of Prince George of Hesse is hit. Another shot, and William himself is struck. The ball has rent his buff-coat, and grazed his right shoulder. His officers crowd around, for the king stooped upon his horse's neck. He alights, and the slight wound is dressed. A shout went through the camp of James; and the tale passed from mouth to mouth that the Prince of Orange was killed. The rumor soon crossed the sea. On the 2d of July feux-de-joie were fired in Paris to proclaim the great triumph. The next day had its own tale, of which James himself was the bearer. William was soon riding through every part of his army; and when the sun of that last of June was set, he was still in the saddle, making arrangements by torchlight for the coming struggle. He had resolved to pass the river the next morning. The enterprise was thought by Schomberg too dangerous. William felt that there was greater danger in delaying a decisive action. The event proved that the daring of the comparatively inexperienced prince was a better policy than the caution of the old hero of many a well-foughten field.

The right wing of William's army was the earliest in its movements after daybreak on that first of July. It was led by the son of Marshal Schomberg, accompanied by the Earl of Portland. There were twenty-four squadrons of horse and dragoons, and six regiments of foot under the command of Meinhart Schomberg, the marshal's brave son. Every man had a green bough in his hat, according to an order issued by the king on the previous night. This right wing marched toward the bridge of Slane, about five miles from the main camp. Rowland Davies, who was with this division, says, "At two fords we passed the river, where there were six squadrons of the enemy to guard the pass." Other accounts represent the right wing as passing over the bridge of Slane. Whether by the fords or by the bridge, the passage was resisted by some squadrons of horse, but they soon gave way. The French general Lauzun saw that the movement of the English right wing must be met, and he rapidly moved his best troops to prevent the rear of James's army being attacked. "As soon as we passed the river," says Davies, "we saw the enemy marching toward us, and that they drew up on the side of a hill in two lines." Portland recommended the horse and foot to be drawn up also in two lines, intermixing horse and foot, squadron with battalion—"grounded upon the example of Cæsar at the battle of Pharsalia."* Rowland Davies parades no such learned authority, in relating the same fact; and he says, "thus the armies stood for a considerable time, an impassable bog being between them." Reinforcements of foot having arrived, "we altered our line of battle, drawing all our horse into the right wing; and so, outflanking the enemy, we marched round the bog and engaged them, rather pursuing than fighting them, as far as Duleek."† It was arranged that King William should lead the left wing and pass the Boyne about a mile above Drogheda. This division consisted wholly of cavalry. Marshal Schomberg, commanding the centre, composed almost entirely of infantry, was to cross the river about half a mile higher up at the ford of Old Bridge. Count Solmes led his Dutch regiment of guards through the rapid water, though up to their middle. The English foot crossed up to their arm-pits. The Danes and French refugees also waded through the stream at other points. The south bank was bristling with Irish horse and foot. Some attempt at resistance was made by the Irish infantry while the greater part of the troops were still in the water; but at last the columns had crossed. Then the Irish foot would not face these resolute soldiers of many nations. An ancient superstitious fear of the Danes perhaps contributed to their panic. But the Irish cavalry, led by Hamilton, fought with desperate courage against the infantry that had gained the shore, or were still in the bed of the river. The issue was very doubtful. Caillemot, the commander of the Huguenots, was killed. The veteran Schomberg saw the danger, and, rushing to the river without waiting to put on his cuirass, crossed, and led the retreating Protestants, exclaiming, "Allons, messieurs! Voilà vos persécuteurs." Schomberg fell in the confusion; his skull was cloven. On the same ground fell the heroic defender of Londonderry, George Walker. At this critical juncture William arrived on the field. He had brought his left wing across the stream with some difficulty. There was a rapid tide. The bed of the stream was in some places a deep mud. His own horse floundered in the miry bottom, or was carried along by the rushing tide. But the king and his cavalry were at last on firm ground. William drew his sword, and was soon in the heat of the fight. The Irish horse retreated toward Donore, about a mile from the pass. Here, from his tent on the hill near the church, now a ruin, King James had watched the progress of the battle. Here his retreating horse made a stand. They turned upon their pursuers, and William's cavalry began to give way. He rode up to the Enniskilleners, and exclaimed, "What will you do for me?" "It is the king," said their officer. "You shall be my guards to-day," cried William, and led on the yeomen who were conquerors on the field of Newton Butler. The battle of the Boyne was not yet won. Again and again "Little Will,"‡ rallied his troops whenever they gave way, and brought them up to the charge. The fate of the day did not long remain in suspense. Hamilton, the traitorous messenger to Tyrconnel, was taken prisoner. "Will the Irish fight any more?" said William. "Yes, sir, upon my honor, I believe they will." "Your honor!" exclaimed the injured prince; and then directed that his prisoner's wounds should be looked to. There was little more fighting. James saw that the day was going against him, and he mounted his horse and fled, the French covering his retreat. At nine o'clock that night he arrived in Dublin.

It is remarkable that a battle so momentous in its consequences should have been attended with so small a sacrifice of life. The loss in James's army did not exceed fifteen hundred men, chiefly cavalry. On William's side the loss of men was not more than five hundred. If we may judge from a passage in Rowland Davies, the steadiness of the Dutch guards repelled the attacks of the Irish horse by a mode of fighting which is mentioned as if it were novel: "Count Solmes marched over the river with the blue Dutch regiment of guards. No sooner were they up the hill but the enemy's horse fell on them, ours with the king being about half a mile lower, passing at another ford. At the first push the first rank only fired, and then fell on their faces, loading their muskets again as they lay on the ground. At the next charge they fired a volley of three ranks. Then, at the next, the first rank got up and fired again, which being received by a choice squadron of the enemy, consisting mostly of officers, they immediately fell in upon the Dutch as having spent all their front fire. But the two rear ranks drew up in two platoons and flanked the enemy across; and the rest, screwing their swords into their muskets, received the charge with all imaginable bravery, and in a minute dismounted them all. The Derry regiment also sustained them bravely, and as they drew off maintained the same ground with great slaughter."

Such was the battle of the Boyne, in which Protestant Europe was fighting against Roman Catholic ascendency, in the island which had been distracted for a century and a half with the bitterest wars of religion. The Londoner, the Scot, and the English settler of Ulster, the Dutch Calvinist and the French Huguenot, stood the brunt of that first of July, with equal resolution and equal confidence in their leader.

A great principle was manifested in this battle—a principle not always understood by statesmen or warriors—that the results of a victory are not to be estimated by the numbers of killed and wounded on the side of the vanquished—nor by the possession of the field of battle—not even by the submission of the district in which the conquering army has gathered its laurels. Looking at the mere material results of the 1st of July, there was no sufficient cause for the dispersion of the Irish army, many of whom James had seen fighting bravely in his cause as he looked upon the valley of the Boyne from the hill of Donore. The real victory was in its moral consequences—in the instant and complete exposure of the character of the man for whom the better part of the Irish Catholics had been fighting, out of an honest conviction that they were in arms for the cause of their country and their religion. James first deserted them in his intense selfishness; he afterward insulted them in his cowardly ingratitude. On the morning of the 2d of July he assembled the magistrates of Dublin. He said that he had been often told that, when it came to the touch, the Irish would not bear the brunt of a battle. He had provided a good army, and had made all preparations to engage a foreign invader, and he had found the fatal truth of which he had been forewarned. Though the army did not desert him as they did in England, yet when the trial came they basely fled the field, and left it a spoil to his enemies. Thenceforward he determined never to head an Irish army, and now resolved to shift for himself, as they themselves must do. He exhorted them to prevent the plunder or destruction of the city, and to submit to the Prince of Orange, who was a merciful man. After this, the most devoted slave of the house of Stuart would perfectly understand that this ungenerous and cruel attack of James upon his army was a mere selfish expedient to cover the ignominy of his own desertion of the cause for which his adherents had fought—some with admirable resolution; others, as well as the miserable discipline in which they had been trained would lead a reasonable man to expect. They had been trained to plunder, to ravage, to make war with the instinct of savages; and when they had to meet the shock of civilized warfare they fled as a lawless multitude always will flee, regardless of everything but their own safety. The battle of the Boyne manifested the utter disorganization of the principal force by which Ulster had been wasted and harassed during a year of evil government.

There was another battle being fought on the south-eastern coast of England, at the very hour when the shot that was fired across the Boyne had very nearly settled the question whether the revolution of 1688 should be a starting-point in a race of honor and prosperity, or a broken trophy of one brief and useless effort for liberty and the rights of conscience. The departure of William for Ireland was the signal for an attack upon the English coasts, which was to be accompanied with an insurrection of the Jacobites. A fleet sailed from Brest under the Count de Tourville. The English fleet was in the Downs, under the command of the Earl of Torrington. He sailed to the back of the Isle of Wight, and was there joined by a squadron of Dutch vessels under a skilful commander, Evertsen. Queen Mary and her council were aware that the French fleet had left Brest. It soon became known that the English admiral had quitted his position off St. Helen's, and had sailed for the Straits of Dover upon the approach of the French. The council determined to send Torrington positive orders to fight. The French fleet was superior in vessels and guns to the combined English and Dutch fleet; but the inequality was not so great that a man of the old stamp of Blake would have feared to risk a battle. Torrington did something even worse than hesitate to fight. He let the brunt of the conflict fall upon the Dutch. He put Evertsen in the van, and brought very few of his own squadron into action. The Dutch fought with indomitable courage and obstinacy, but were at length compelled to draw off. The gazers from the high downs of Beachy Head witnessed the shameful flight of a British admiral to seek the safety of the Thames. When the news came to London that Torrington had left the Channel to a triumphant enemy—when an invasion was imminent, for England was without regular troops—when plotters were all around, and arrests of men of rank, even of Clarendon, the queen's kinsman, were taking place—then, indeed, there was an hour almost of despair such as was felt when De Ruyter sailed up the Medway. But the very humiliation roused the spirit of the people. The queen was universally beloved; and, although studiously avoiding, when the king was at hand, any interference in public affairs, she took at once a kingly part in this great crisis. "The queen balanced all things with an extraordinary temper," writes Burnet. She sent for the lord mayor of London, and inquired what the citizens would do should the enemy effect a landing. The lord mayor returned to the queen with an offer of a hundred thousand pounds; of nine thousand men of the city train-bands, ready instantly to march wherever ordered; and a proposal for the lieutenancy to provide and maintain six additional regiments of foot; and of the mayor, aldermen, and common council to raise a regiment of horse, and a thousand dragoons, by voluntary contributions.* The same spirit was manifested throughout the land. The people might grumble against the Dutch; they might feel some commiseration for an exiled prince; they might be divided about questions of church government; they might complain that the revolution had brought them increased taxation. But they would have no papist government thrust upon them by the French king. They would not undo the work of their own hands. The gloom for the disaster of Beachy Head was quickly forgotten. On the 4th of July a messenger had brought letters to the queen which told that a great victory had been won in Ireland, and that the king was safe; and, says Evelyn in his quiet way, "there was much public rejoicing."

CHAPTER CXXV.

James embarks for France—William enters Dublin—The French devastate Teignmouth—William's march to Limerick—Siege of Limerick—The siege raised—William goes to England—Parliament—War supply—England and continental politics—William leaves for Holland—Congress at the Hague—Mons capitulates to the French—Vacant sees in England filled up—Plot of Preston and Ashton—Treason laws—Marlborough in Flanders—Limerick surrenders to Ginkell—Treaty of Limerick.

King James, "in compliance with the advice of all his friends, resolved to go for France, and try to do something more effectual on that side than he could hope from so shattered and disheartened a body of men as now remained in Ireland."† "Request of friends" is the apology for the foolish actions of the weak king as well as of the vain scribbler. On the 3d of July James quitted Dublin with all speed, about five in the morning; left two troops of horse at Bray, to defend the bridge there against any pursuers; rode over the Wicklow Mountains, and baited near Arklow: "mended his pace:" when four French officers maintained that the enemy was not far behind, and never stopped till he got to Duncannon about sunrise. His attendants found a merchant ship at passage. The captain was persuaded to take James on board in the evening. They sailed for Kinsale, and the next day the royal fugitive was secure in a French frigate, and was landed safely at Brest.* James repaired to St. Germains, where "his Most Christian Majesty came to see him, and in general terms promised all imaginable kindness and support." The sanguine exile having abandoned Ireland, had his ready scheme for invading England, "now naked and ungarnished of troops." Louis received the project coldly, and, finally, would have nothing to do with the affair, although James magnanimously offered to go with a fleet, either with or without an army, for he was sure "his own sailors would never fight against one under whom they so often had conquered."† His Most Christian Majesty pretended illness when his brother of England came to pester him with his new demands for ships and troops. "The court of France could not forbear speaking great disrespect, even in his own hearing, which the queen seemed much more sensible of than he did."‡ The courtiers of Versailles could guess at the truth, although "the few English courtiers who stayed with the queen in France, to justify the flight of their king, did not spare calumniating the Irish." They averred that "the Irish abandoned their prince, and left him exposed to the enemy;" and this version of the cause of James' return was so believed by the uninformed that the Irish who had been refugees in France since the days of Cromwell "durst not walk abroad or appear in the streets, the people were so exasperated against them."§

On the day that James fled from Dublin the citizens had to apprehend two sorts of danger. The forces of James, scattered about the vicinity, pressed by hunger, might return and rifle the town. The lowest of the Dublin populace, in a pretended zeal for religion, threatened to burn and plunder the houses of the papists. The city was saved from these calamities chiefly by the firmness of Captain Robert Fitzgerald.‖ On the 3d the camp of William on the Boyne was broken up. On the 4th the Dutch guards took possession of Dublin Castle. On the 5th the headquarters of the king were at Ferns; and on the 6th, being Sunday, he rode to Dublin, and in the cathedral of St. Patrick returned thanks to God for the success of his arms. William, however, continued to sleep in his camp. On the 8th "his majesty in person viewed and took a general muster of all the army, and was fourteen hours on horseback; only for one quarter he did alight to eat and drink."¶ The news of the disgrace of Beachy Head had reached Ireland on the 10th, when the king, contemplating a return to England, resolved to secure Waterford, as the most important harbor of the eastern coast. On the 11th of July the army was on its march. Rowland Davies records how, in defiance of the royal proclamation, the troops "robbed and pillaged all the road along." Execution followed execution. On the 14th, on the march to Carlow, "as we passed, two of the Enniskillen dragoons hung by the wayside, with papers on their breasts exposing their crime; and thereby our march was very regular, without any such excursions or pillaging as before." On the 21st Waterford was in possession of William's troops, the garrison having capitulated. The king then determined to return to Dublin, with the view of embarking for England. With a French fleet in the Channel there was now greater danger to be met on the English shores than in the resistance which continued to be made in Ireland. The forces which had been scattered on the 1st of July had gathered around Limerick, and were prepared to defend that city. Officers and soldiers, without orders from their superiors, without a leader, all flocked to Limerick, "as if they had been all guided thither by some secret instinct of nature."†† But irregularly fortified, and its defence left to the Irish, it was considered as likely soon to fall. On his road to Dublin, on the 27th, more accurate intelligence from England had reached the king, and he determined to invest Limerick in person.

The shameful discomfiture of the allied fleet at Beachy Head had not been followed up by the French so as to produce any results that should give serious alarm to William. On the 22d of July the French admiral, Tourville, was anchored in Torbay, with the fleet which had chased Torrington to the mouth of the Thames; and he had been reinforced with a number of galleys, rowed by slaves. The whole fleet was employed to transport troops. The approach of danger had roused up the spirit of the July of 1588. The beacons are again blazing on the Devonshire hills. From every road in the interior the yeomen of the West are gathering on the coast, not shrinking from trying their strength against the veterans of France. Tourville loses faith in the assurances of the Stuart courtiers, that all England would be up to aid in his enterprise. 'All England is shouting "God bless King William and Queen Mary." But Tourville will do something. He lands some troops at Teignmouth, which Burnet calls "a miserable village," but which the inhabitants represented as consisting of two towns, having three hundred houses. The people of Teignmouth obtained a brief for their losses; and in this document they say that "the French fleet, riding in Torbay, where all the forces of our county of Devon were drawn up to oppose their landing, several of their galleys drew off from their fleet, and made toward a weak unfortified place called Teignmouth, about seven miles to the eastward of Torbay." The narrative then continues to describe the ravages of these heroes: "Coming very near, and having played the cannon of their galleys upon the town, and shot near two hundred great shot therein, to drive away the poor inhabitants, they landed about seven hundred of their men, and began to fire and plunder the towns of East and West Teignmouth, which consist of about three hundred houses; and in the space of three hours ransacked and plundered the said towns, and a village called Shaldon, lying on the other side of the river, and burned and destroyed one hundred and sixteen houses, together with eleven ships and barks that were in the harbor. And to add sacrilege to their robbery and violence, they in a barbarous manner entered the two churches of the said towns, and in the most unchristian manner tore the Bibles and Common Prayer-books in pieces, scattering the leaves thereof about the streets, broke down the pulpits, overthrew the communion-tables, together with many other marks of a barbarous and enraged cruelty. And such goods and merchandises as they could not, or durst not, stay to carry away, for fear of our forces, which were marching to oppose them, they spoiled and destroyed, killing very many cattle and hogs, which they left dead in the streets." After these feats, Tourville sailed away to France, and left behind him an amount of indignation that was worth more for defence than even the troops of horse raised by the citizens of London. The brief of the "poor inhabitants" of the towns of East and West Teignmouth and Shaldon—who "being in great part maintained by fishing, and their boats, nets, and other fishing-craft being plundered and consumed in the common flames," had lost, as they alleged, eleven thousand pounds—went through every parish from the Land's-End to the East, South, and North; and every penny that was dropped in the plate at the church door was accompanied with the pious hope that England might have strength from above to resist the papists who burned fishing-huts and tore the Bible in pieces, and who would ravage this island as they had ravaged the Palatinate.

On the 8th of August King William's main army was encamped at Cahirconlish, about six miles from Limerick. "As we came up," says Davies, "we saw houses in the country round on fire, which put the king into some concern." The Earl of Portland had advanced with a large body of horse and foot within cannon-shot of the city; and in the evening of the 8th William himself viewed the position in which the strength of the Irish Catholics was now concentrated. The French general, Lauzun, had declared that the place could not resist the attack of the advancing army. With the pedantry that sometimes clings to military science as well as to other sciences, he trusted more to walls and moats, such as Vauban constructed on the French frontier, than to resolute hearts, by which Limerick only could be defended. He left the Irish to their fate. The Irish resolved to redeem the dishonor of the Boyne. They had an intrepid counsellor in Sarsfield, their general, who put his own resolute spirit into the twenty thousand defenders of the city. Lauzun and Tyrconnel had marched away to Galway, as the English advanced guard approached. As the setting sun flashed on the broad expanse of the Shannon, William would see an old town entirely surrounded by the main stream and a branch of the great river, and connected with another town by a single bridge. The town on the island, with its ancient castle built by King John on the bank of the stream, was known as the English town. The other was known as the Irish town. The eye of the tactician would quickly see the capacity for defence of this position, even though its walls were not of the most scientific construction. The English town was accessible only through the lower Irish town. The Shannon, in a season of wet, overflowed its flat margin. "The city of Limerick," says one at whom some may laugh as an authority, "lies, an' please your honor, in the middle of a devilish wet swampy country. . . . 'Tis all cut through with drains and bogs."* Thus naturally defended, a besieging army had many difficulties to encounter, and there could be no want of supplies to the besiegers from the open country of Clare and Galway. The river approach from the sea was commanded at this time by a French squadron. William looked upon Limerick, and determined to commence the siege. On the 9th the main body of his army advanced. "When we came near the town, and found all the bridges within a mile of the city lined by the enemy, the king ordered a detachment of grenadiers to go down and clear them, which they immediately did, with all the bravery imaginable."† The peculiar missiles of the grenadiers thus employed are called "new invented engines;"‡ and the Irishman of this period is represented as ready to give his one cow if he could be safe "without these French and Dutch grenados."§ Before the night of the 9th the Irish town, according to Davies, was invested "from river to river." The expression has reference to the remarkable curve of the Shannon in its course to the sea, before it reaches the island on which the English town was built. The river thus incloses, in the form of a horseshoe, a long and narrow tongue of land, but not insulated from the country on the southern bank. William's position was taken up partly on this space between the windings of the stream, and partly on the south bank, near the Irish town. For several days the siege was not actively prosecuted, for the battering train had not arrived. On the night of the 10th Sarsfield, with about five hundred horse, passed out of Limerick, crossing the Shannon at Killaloe, with the object of intercepting the train of artillery and a supply of military stores and provisions, coming to the besiegers from Dublin. The convoy had arrived within eight miles of the English position. The ruined castle of Ballyneedy was at hand to offer a place of safety for the wagons and guns; but the escort was scattered about in the open plain, securely sleeping while a few sentinels watched. Sarsfield suddenly came down from the mountains; killed most of the too confident escort, the rest flying for their lives; loaded the guns to the muzzles, and half buried them; heaped up the barrels of powder around the guns, with a pile of wagons and stores; fired a train; and was safe in Limerick before the dawn. Part of the army was at Drumkeen, waiting for the heavy cannon, which were expected to be within three miles of them on the night of the 11th. "About three in the morning we were all awakened by the firing of two great cannon near us, which made our house shake, and all within it startle; and about an hour after were alarmed by a man that fled to us almost naked, who assured us that the enemy had fallen upon us, taken all our cannon, ammunition, and money, and cut off the guard."‖ Sarsfield attributed great importance to the success of this daring enterprise; for he told a lieutenant who was taken prisoner that if he had failed he should have given up all as lost, and have made his way to France. The loss of the cannon and stores was partially repaired by the arrival of two guns from Waterford. But that surprise was in some degree more fatal to the besiegers than in the actual havoc and loss. The success of the exploit gave new courage to those who resolved to defend their city against an army not greatly superior in numbers to themselves. The besiegers were proportionately depressed, for they knew that the materials for a bombardment were insufficient. On the night of the 17th the forces of William entered the trenches of the besieged; and the same desperate work went forward till the 27th, when a general assault was determined upon. The attack was unsuccessful. As the troops of William mounted a breach with the most determined bravery, the Irish repulsed them with equal resolution. A fort, called the Black Fort, was stormed and carried ; when a magazine was exploded, by which the greater part of a Brandenburg regiment was destroyed. After four hours of desperate fighting the besiegers retired, with fearful loss on both sides. At a council of war on the 29th it was determined to raise the siege. On the 30th King William was on his way to Waterford, and the next day the besiegers had quitted their trenches, and the camp was broken up. There was a reason for this determination of the council of war, even more powerful than the gallant resistance of the Irish. Another assault might be more successful ; for in this failure of the 27th some of the besiegers had penetrated to the very streets of the English town. But the elements were opposed to the further progress of the siege. Evelyn writes in his diary, "The unseasonable and most tempestuous weather happening, the naval expedition is hindered, and the extremity of wet causes the siege of Limerick to be raised." The Duke of Berwick asserted that when the siege was raised not a drop of rain had fallen. Rowland Davies, on the 25th of August, says, that day "proved so extremely wet that no one could stir ;" but he does not mention bad weather again till the 9th, when in the camp near Thurles the evening "proved extremely wet and stormy." In this uncertain condition of the evidence to disprove the insinuation of Berwick, that the wet weather was a pretence of King William to cover the shame of defeat, the testimony of the humorist, who preserved "the traditions of the English mess-tables," is worth something. "There was such a quantity of rain fell during the siege, the whole country was like a puddle ; 'twas that, and nothing else, which brought on the flux, and which had like to have killed both his honor and myself. Now there was no such thing, after the first ten days, continued the corporal, for a soldier to be dry in his tent, without cutting a ditch all round it, to draw off the water." *

King William landed at Bristol on the 6th of September, and slowly travelled to London. The renown of his victory at the Boyne was slightly diminished by his repulse at Limerick ; but the English of all ranks felt proud of their sovereign, and had confidence in his energy and sagacity. His reception by the people was as enthusiastic as could be indicated by huzzas and bonfires—by peals of bells and loyal addresses. The parliament was to meet on the 2d of October. In the interval an expedition had set sail for Ireland under the command of Marlborough. On the 22d of September the fleet was disembarking troops near Cork. The forces of Marlborough were soon joined by a portion of the army from Limerick under the Duke of Würtemberg. The German prince and the English earl settled a dispute about precedence, by agreeing that they should command on alternate days. Marlborough here displayed that genius which was to culminate in victories far greater than had ever been achieved by English generalship. Cork capitulated, after a struggle of forty-eight hours, on the 29th. On the 30th the Protestant magistrates of Cork proclaimed the king and queen. Marlborough did not wait to receive the freedom of the city, in the silver box which the corporation voted him. He was on his march to Kinsale ; and his cavalry arrived there in time to save the town from destruction, it having been fired by the Irish. The garrison, after a short resistance, also capitulated. Marlborough accomplished these successes with no great loss of men in action ; but many perished from the diseases incident to the season and the climate. The Duke of Grafton, who had accompanied the expedition as a volunteer, was wounded in the attack upon Cork, and died on the 9th of October. The spot where he fell is now called Grafton's alley.†

The second session of the second parliament of William and Mary was opened by the king on the 2d of October. His partial success in Ireland was modestly alluded to, with one slight reference to his own exertions : "I neither spared my person nor my pains, to do you all the good I could." He told the houses that the whole support of the confederacy abroad would absolutely depend upon the speed and vigor of their proceedings in that session. The parliament testified its belief that the support of the confederacy was a national object, by voting, in less than a fortnight, more than two millions and a half for maintaining an army of nearly seventy thousand men ; and a further sum of eighteen hundred thousand pounds for the navy and ordnance. So large a supply had never before been voted by parliament for warlike operations—"the vastest sum that ever a king of England had asked of his people." * This supply was to be raised by a monthly assessment on land, by doubling the excise duties, and by increasing the customs' duties on certain articles imported. The community in every rank of life would thus feel the cost of this war. Yet the House of Commons was almost unanimous in voting the supply. Burnet wrote to Mr. Johnston, the English minister at Berlin, that the members "dare not go back into their countries, if they do not give their money liberally. . . . We seem not to be the same people that we were a year ago ; and the nation seems resolved to support the king in the war, to the utmost to which it can possibly stretch itself." † Burnet attributes this change to the outrages of the French at Teignmouth, and to the gallant behavior of William in Ireland as contrasted with the meanness of James. This national conviction of the necessity of carrying on the war with extraordinary vigor may be ascribed to more general causes. Imperfect as were the sources of political information, the English people well knew that an European war against the preponderance of France was inevitable. The hostile attitude of the French king toward England was essentially connected with the long-formed determination of the Prince of Orange to organize a general resistance to the designs of Louis against the independence of nations. William had freed England from a bigoted despotism, and at the same time had put himself at the head of the European coalition. Louis, in his determined endeavor to restore the deposed king—untaught as James was by misfortune, and as obstinate as ever to maintain the prerogatives which he claimed by divine right—was attacking his continental enemies in the most vital part. William as King of England wielded an authority far greater than William as Stadtholder of Holland. When the English people took William as their king, they accepted the involvements of his continental politics as the unavoidable price of their liberty. Had they continued under the rule of James, they might have been spared the vast burdens of a continental war by remaining in a state of semi-vassalage to France. The condition of peace was slavery. They had made their election for freedom at whatever cost, and they were willing to abide by it. The Englishman of 1690 saw, what only dreamers have ever failed to see, that a state of isolation from continental quarrels was simply an impossibility, if his country were to hold her rank among the nations. He knew how she had sunk in all the attributes of honest greatness under the base government of the restoration. He knew that she had again a leader, who would strive to bring her back to the position in which Cromwell had placed her as the head of the Protestant states. But he also knew that, the idea of the isolation of England from continental politics being a delusion, it was better for her to fight her battles on the banks of the Meuse or the Scheldt than on the banks of the Thames or the Humber. In the operations of the confederacy to which England was committed by the sovereign of the revolution, there might be the mistakes inseparable from conflicting interests. Perfect co-operation in such alliances was scarcely to be expected. The same summer that saw the disgrace of Beachy Head and the havoc of Teignmouth, also saw the defeat of the allies at Fleurus by the greatest of French generals, Luxemburg. The thought might enter many minds that the power of the great French king was too mighty ; had such support in the most skilful of diplomatists ; was too entirely under the direction of one head to be adequately resisted by any combination of jealous courts, held together only by the energy of a prince of infirm health and blunt manners, who was indeed their natural and acknowledged leader, but as such leader of great kings and petty dukes—the pettiest, the most proud and punctilious—exposed to intrigues that would mar every well-concerted project, and rivalries that would arrest every bold enterprise. The victory of the French over the Dutch at Fleurus was attributed to the want of concert of the Elector of Brandenburg. Such want of organization might occur again, and the results of the alliance might only go to lead on the ambition of France to new encroachments. So might reason the refining politician of that period. But then would come the instinctive feeling of English common-sense, that even a battle lost might not be wholly unprofitable. When William was fighting at the Boyne, England was under the apprehension of an invasion. The news of Fleurus arrived to make men anxious. But to the movements of the allies, connected with the doubtful and bloody day of Fleurus, is attributed the fact that England was saved from the hostile descent of a great army The French, says Burnet, "had suffered so much in the battle of Fleurus, and the Dutch used such diligence in putting their army in a condition to take the field again, and the Elector of Brandenburg bringing his troops to act in conjunction with them, gave the French so much work that they were forced, for all their victory, to lie upon the defensive, and were not able to spare so many men as were necessary for an invasion." * Many thoughtful minds in England would thus see that William was not speaking with an un-English spirit when he said to his parliament, "If the present war be not prosecuted with vigor, no nation in the world is exposed to greater danger." It was better for the purpose of a continental war that the nation should be heavily taxed—that loans should be raised which should be felt in after time, rather as a precedent than for their actual amount; that the commerce of the country should decay; that even her population should dwindle; than that the country should have peace and dishonor under the tutelage of Louis of France. It was not the French nation that was at war with England, to place a satrap of King Louis on the throne at Whitehall. The man who said he was "himself the state," was the enemy to be opposed. The only man to oppose him was he who shrunk from no labor and no privation to earn the position which even Louis himself, a few years later, was obliged to concede to his merits. "I could not see him," writes the French king to Marshal Boufflers, "at the head of so powerful a league as that which has been formed against me, without having that esteem for him which the deference that the principal powers of Europe have for his opinions seems to demand." † The mental qualities of William—what St. Simon describes as the capacity, the address, the superiority of genius, which acquired for him "the confidence, and, to say the truth, the complete dictatorship of all Europe, excepting France"—these qualities were not only the best security of England against the renewal of her degradation under the Stuarts, but reflected some of their lustre upon the country which had chosen their possessor for its ruler. And thus, with treasons against him hatching at home; with nonjuring churchmen hating him for his toleration, and praying for a heaven-ordained king though he were a papist; with a popular feeling, not sufficiently propitiated by William himself, that he was more a Dutchman than an Englishman, he set out for the congress at the Hague, and the nation at any rate felt that its honor was in safe hands.

On the 5th of January, 1691, the king closed the session of parliament, with his thanks for the great dispatch they had used "in furnishing the supplies designed for carrying on the war." He was now at liberty, he said, to go into Holland. The wind was adverse for some days; but on the 18th he embarked at Gravesend, with many distinguished persons of his court. The passage that is now made in twenty hours occupied five days. The man-of-war in which the king sailed was becalmed off the English coast; and when the shores of Holland were neared, it was thought dangerous to approach in the thick fog that shrouded the land from view. William was resolved to make the coast in an open boat; but a night of cold and darkness was passed, before a landing was effected on the island of Goree. Covered with ice, the king and his nobles were too happy to enjoy the shelter and warmth of a peasant's hovel. The enthusiasm of his reception when he reached the Hague was an ample compensation for the disagreeable incidents of his voyage, and for the perils at which "he himself was the only person nothing at all dismayed." ‡ William had that hatred of parade which belongs to the truly great; and he at first resisted the entreaties of his countrymen that he should make a public entrance at the Hague. He yielded at length to their wishes; and on the 26th of January he passed through long files of his admiring compatriots, under triumphal arches, on which the chief actions of his life were painted. The pomp was soon over, and the real business began. The Tory historian, who has no affection for the person of William, writes, "Of the princes and ministers who attended his majesty at the congress, almost all authors affect to give a long and pompous list, in imitation perhaps of the tricks of the stage; where it is used to form a court, or a train, of scenemen or other rabble, to raise a higher idea in the audience of the hero presented before them." * In place of such a list, let us endeavor to give some notion of the interests that were represented at this extraordinary assembly of potentates and ministers.

The Emperor of Germany had his representative at the congress. His real interests were essentially concerned in resisting the oppressions of France; but his ruling desire was to succeed in his war against the Turks, chiefly with a view to the enlargement of his own dominions. He was a Roman Catholic, and had no sympathies for the Protestant coalition of England and Holland. Charles II. of Spain was there represented by the Marquis of Gastanaga, the governor of the Netherlands, the imbecile servant of a weak king and a decaying monarchy. The armies of France would soon have overrun the Spanish Netherlands if they had not been defended by some bolder arm than that of Spain. These great Catholic sovereigns had not been hostile to the prince who had ejected the papist king of England; for at the time when the revolution of 1688 was maturing, Pope Innocent the Eleventh was not indisposed to encourage any opposition to his oppressor, the French king. His ministers, it is affirmed by the historian of the popes, had personal knowledge of the designs of the Prince of Orange upon England; and if he knew not of the entire scheme, "it is yet undeniable that he attached himself to a party which was chiefly sustained by Protestant energies, and founded on Protestant sentiments." † But at the period of the congress at the Hague Innocent the Eleventh was dead. His successor, Alexander the Eighth, had indeed the same disposition to make common cause with those who opposed Louis. In July, 1691, that pope also died. His successor, Innocent the Twelfth, was of a more pacific disposition; and the French king saw the necessity of making concessions to the Papal See, and thus removing one cause of the strange union of Catholic and Protestant. Changes such as these rendered the task of William to hold the coalition together a work of constant and increasing difficulty. At the congress, however, there were princes who joined the alliance with a zeal for the cause which William represented as the sovereign of Protestant England and the first magistrate of Protestant Holland. The chief of these was Frederick the Third, Elector of Brandenburg, subsequently Frederick, first King of Prussia. His mother was aunt to William; and he succeeded to the electoral dignity seven months before his cousin landed in Torbay. William had sent him the garter in 1690; and it is said that the young elector was indulging his taste for pageants in a solemn investiture of the insignia of the "most honorable and noble order," at the hands of the English envoy at Berlin, when he ought to have been marching to the Sambre to aid the Prince of Waldeck. We have been made somewhat more familiar with the person and character of our William's cousin, in his relation of grandfather to Frederick the Great. ‡ Crooked, through an accident in his infancy, of weak nerves, of a turn for ostentation, an expensive prince, but nevertheless a spirited man and strictly honorable—this is he who, on the 3d of February, 1691, is entertained by his cousin, the king and stadtholder, "at his house in the wood," and sits on William's right hand, while the Duke of Norfolk is on his left, and great nobles, English and foreign, fill up the table. The gentleman who attended on one of these noble English lords tells us how "the first health was begun by the king, who whispered it softly to the elector, and the elector to the rest;" and he also tells us how, ten days after, the king dined with the elector, "who went out in the very street to receive him" when he came; and when he returned, "accompanied him to the very foot of his coach." § The Hohenzollern, "with his back half broken," knew how to show respect to his heroic little cousin with the constant asthma. Of other German princes at the congress there were the Elector of Bavaria and the landgraves of Hesse Cassel and Hesse Darmstadt; there were princes of Luxemburg, of Holstein, of Würtemberg, of Anspach. Few came out of disinterested love for the cause of nations ependence. Of one of these potentates there is this curious notice a contemporary: "The Elector of Saxony, a bold man, and a hard aker, as well as a zealous assertor of the Protestant religion, was ught into the confederacy by the promise of money: 'For,' said 'our friendships, though ever so good, must be confirmed by pres-s.'" *

Victor Amadeus, Duke of Savoy, had already joined his fortunes those of the confederacy. At the period of the Congress he was ending his own dominions against the armies of France. The ung prince had become weary of the domination exercised over n by the French court; had for some time been secretly negotiat- with Austria; and was watching the progress of the revolution England, with a view to make a decisive effort for independence. e vigilance of the diplomatists of Louis frustrated his designs; l, with the ultimate argument of an army marching upon Pied-nt, Catinat, the French general, demanded for his master that nch troops should garrison Turin and Vercelli. Victor put on a d front, refused compliance, and war was the inevitable conse-nce. An ambassador from Savoy came to London before William out for the Hague, and in a formal address to the king said, "You ve inspired my master with the hope of freedom after so many rs of bondage." The first military operations of the Duke of voy were unfortunate; and at the period of the congress many an xious thought of William must have been turned to Piedmont. e talent and bravery of Victor were undoubted—a capacity too ch mingled with Italian craft, but a courage that did not shrink m an encounter with fearful odds. The dangerous position of the ke of Savoy enabled William to stipulate successfully that the aldenses, who had been subjected to long and grievous persecu-n, should be allowed to exercise their religion in peace. A treaty ntaining a secret article for their toleration was signed on the 8th February, 1691.

The arrangements of the congress had sufficiently ripened in a nth to allow William to announce in the London Gazette, that the rious powers had agreed to furnish certain contingents, which uld enable an army of two hundred and twenty thousand men to ke the field. But while the King of England was infusing his spirit to his allies, some eager and confident, others tardy and lukewarm, ost with some especial private interest to accomplish—while, as e caricaturist of that day paid a homage to his powers, William as teaching his bears to dance †—Louis suddenly appeared in person the head of a great army to besiege Mons, the strongly-fortified pital of Hainault, and one of the chief barriers of the Netherlands ainst France. The French troops, gradually converging to the ntier from every quarter of the territory of Louis, were opening enches before this strong fortress, while the allied powers were liberating and dining at the Hague. William, with his accustomed ergy, at once broke up the congress, got together an army of fifty ousand men, but arrived only in time to learn that the burning y had capitulated amid the terrors of its population, after a bom-rdment which had destroyed one half of its dwelling-places. Louis ent back to Versailles, to hear the well-rehearsed flattery, that herever the great king appeared the genius of victory was there ady with the laurel crown. William ran over to England, with s secrets of the future kept close in his own bosom. He arrived on e 13th of April. On the 1st of May he was again on his way to olland. In these seventeen days the king had important affairs to ttle, which required the exercise of a clear intellect.

The period had arrived when it was necessary to fill up the sees, acant by the refusal to take the oaths, of the Archbishop of Canter-ury and the Bishops of Bath and Wells, Ely, Gloucester, Norwich, nd Peterborough. Two other nonjuring bishops, Worcester and hichester, had died in the interval since the revolution. A discov-y had been made of a correspondence of Turner, the Bishop of Ely, ith the court of St. Germains. Burnet says, "the discovery of the ishop of Ely's correspondence and engagements in the name of the st gave the king a great advantage in filling the vacant sees." Whether Turner was justified in stating to James that he was acting n concert with his brethren, when he advised that a French army ould come into England, may reasonably be doubted. Sancroft and few bishops denied the charge in a printed paper in answer to an anonymous pamphlet. Endeavors had been made to conciliate the nonjuring prelates. All that they would engage to do was to live quietly. Their deprivation was no longer opposed even by the king's Tory advisers. So Tillotson became Archbishop of Canterbury and Sharp Archbishop of York. Patrick, Stillingfleet, Moore, Cumberland, Fowler, and Kidder, filled the other vacancies. "In two years' time the king had named fifteen bishops; and they were generally looked upon as the learnedest, the wisest, and best men that were in the Church." This was Burnet's opinion; but from this opinion there were many dissentients. Tillotson was especially marked out for the hatred of the Jacobites. The violent High Churchmen saw cause of offence in all these preferments, for the successors of the nonjuring bishops "were men both of moderate principles and calm tempers." *

When the king closed the session of parliament on the 5th of January he noticed "the restlessness of our enemies, both at home and abroad, in designing against the prosperity of this nation and the government established." It was impossible that such "restlessness," and such dislike of "the government established," should not exist in some quarters. William alluded to the apprehension of Lord Preston, with two other agents of the Jacobites, on the night of the 31st of December. They were seized on board a smack in the river, with papers addressed to James, containing propositions for his coming over with a small force during the absence of William, when the nation would be undefended, and the people would be complaining of the burden of taxation. Preston and his humbler associate, Ashton, were tried for high treason in January, and were convicted upon very clear evidence. The altered character of the mode in which prisoners charged with political offences were treated by the judges and by the counsel for the crown was strikingly exhibited in this trial. In the "Life of James" there is a curious observation of the compiler, which shows in what light the laws of the realm were considered by the champions of arbitrary power. The law which makes a correspondence with a foreign enemy treasonable is for the safety of the commonwealth, as every other portion of the law of treason contemplates that safety. The biographer of James writes thus: "My Lord Preston and Mr. Ashton (there not appearing evidence enough against Mr. Elliott) were brought to their trials, condemned, and the latter executed, being the first that suffered by a court of justice for the royal cause; which was a new subject of grief to the king, for he knew not what would be the consequence when he found the laws, as well as the sword, turned against him." † The notion could never be driven out of the heads of those who had seen a king ejected for his contempt of the laws, that he alone was the source of all law; and that without him, the one legitimate head of the law, it was powerless to protect or to punish. The new head of the law, expressly chosen that the ancient laws, which gave the people security and freedom, should not perish, but should be strengthened by an infusion of principles having still higher regard for the general good—this sovereign of the revolution was always considered by James and his minions as an interloper having no legal rights. The solemn compact which had been entered into by the nation with William and Mary was to give them no real authority. William was but a Prince of Orange, who had traitorously and wickedly thrust out God's anointed; and the assassin's knife was therefore too good a fate for him. Happy was it for England that this prince was a man of justice and clemency. We shall have to mention plot after plot against his life and his government. But we shall have to record no sweeping proscriptions, no demands for new powers, no exercise of his own uncontrolled will. During the long continuance of plots and conspiracies, the laws of high treason were so modified as to assure the prisoner a much fairer trial than under the ancient system, by affording him every facility for his defence. We may have incidentally to notice the publication of the most virulent libels against the person and principles of William. But we shall also have to record that, at the very time when these attacks were most frequent and most inflammatory, the laws against printing and publishing were relaxed instead of being made more stringent—the censorship of the press was abandoned. We may probably attribute to this moderation of the king the circumstance that, although his reign was one of continual danger to his person; that although he was surrounded by treacherous servants and cold friends; that although a systematic attack upon the principles that raised him to power was constantly going forward—his power strengthened as it grew, out of the very absence of any attempt to prop it by unconstitutional devices. There might have been something in the character of the English people which led them to respect the equanimity which had no morbid dread of the conspirator or the libeller; which was never diverted from its own course of duty by fear or by revenge. But certainly there must have been something very remarkable in the character of William—very different from the ordinary character of those who are termed usurpers—to direct him toward the noble policy of making himself secure by equal justice instead of irregular despotism, and of living down calumny instead of weakly attempting to forbid its utterance. We have been led to these remarks by the fact, that when William returned from the continent in April he had to occupy some portion of his short visit to England by learning the extent of the conspiracy of which Preston was the chief agent, and of determining as to the fate of some of those accused as conspirators. We cannot enter minutely into the details of the discoveries which had been made by his ministers in the king's absence. Preston had confessed, when his own fate appeared to depend upon his confession, that he was guilty himself, and that Clarendon, Turner the Bishop of Ely, and William Penn, were implicated with him. When William returned to England, Preston was brought before him at the council; and he then said, "that Mr. Penn had told him the Duke of Ormond, the Earls of Devonshire, Dorset, Macclesfield, Lord Brandon,"* and others, were well affected to the plot. He also implicated Lord Dartmouth. The accusation against these eminent persons was probably without foundation. Whether or not, William stopped the hearsay testimony of Preston. The biographer of James shows the value of this wise discretion: "It is probable the Prince of Orange thought it not prudent to attack so great a body of the nobility at once; that what he knew was sufficient either to be aware of them, or by forgiveness and a seeming clemency gain them to his interest. Which method succeeded so well, that whatever sentiments those lords which Mr. Penn had named might have had at that time, they proved in effect most bitter enemies to his majesty's [King James's] cause ever afterward."† And this is deliberately written by the habitual maligner of King William.

Since the successes of Marlborough in the autumn of 1690 there had been no marked change in the positions of the two contending parties in Ireland. To follow up his successes was not a trust assigned to the victor at Cork and Kinsale. Marlborough was chosen by William to accompany him in his continental campaign. He was intrusted to collect all the English troops, and to wait near Brussels till the king should arrive to take the command. William had much diplomatic work on his hands—to encourage the wavering, to assist the weak, and to bribe the hungry. Victor Amadeus was in despair at the devastation of his country by the French armies; Schomberg was sent by William to raise the duke out of his despondency. The petty princes of the Germanic empire, striving, for the most part, for some personal dignity or profit, had each to be propitiated and kept in good humor. In the interval between the king's arrival at the Hague and his taking the command of the army, Marlborough was sorely tempted to make good some of the professions which he had secretly conveyed to the sovereign whom he had betrayed in 1688. It is recorded that Marlborough had, in London, told Colonel Sackville, an agent of the court of St. Germains, "that he was ready to redeem his apostasy with the hazard of his utter ruin;" and "proffered to bring over the English troops that were in Flanders if the king [James] required it." It is further stated that he wrote to the same effect to James himself, in January and May, 1691. "Nevertheless," says the compiler of James's life, "the king found no effect of these mighty promises; for his majesty insisting upon his offer of bringing over the English troops in Flanders, as the greatest service he could do him, he excused himself under pretence that there was some mistake in the message." Marlborough asked, however, for two lines under the hand of James, "to testify that he would extend his pardon to him."‡ James, it is stated, complied with this request. Whether the crafty Churchill really believed, as he assured James, that "in case the French were successful in Flanders, or any ill accident should happen to the Prince of Orange, his restoration would be very easy," it is pretty clear that he, like many others, saw nothing higher in politics than their own safety and their own profit. William had no suspicion of the man employed by him in a most important command. The opportunity was probably wanting for a decisive act of treachery in this campaign, in which nothing great on either side was accomplished or even attempted.

But if 1691 were a year of inaction in Flanders, it was a year of great events in Ireland. In the spring Tyrconnel had arrived from France to assume his position as the viceroy of James; and he was followed by a French general, Saint Ruth, as commander-in-chief of the Irish army. He took the command at Limerick, and made great exertions to bring the disorganized troops into a state of efficiency. On the English side, an experienced Dutch officer, Ginkell, was appointed to the command-in-chief. His first operation was to lay siege to Athlone. On the thirtieth of June, a day memorable with the English army, the grenadiers again put green boughs in their hats, and were led to the assault under the command of Mackay. The town was taken by a bold attack; and Saint Ruth, who was encamped near, marched away on the road to Galway. He took up a strong position at Aghrim, resolved to risk a general engagement. On the 12th of July, at five in the evening, the two armies joined battle. The Irish fought with the most desperate resolution. The English and Dutch attacked and fell back again and again. The issue was at one time very doubtful. But at the very crisis of the engagement the French general was killed by a cannon-ball, and his death was concealed. The other general, Sarsfield, was inactive with the reserve, waiting for orders. The Irish were overpowered, and were soon disorganized. The victory of the English was complete, and they did not use it with moderation. There were few prisoners; and four thousand Irish lay dead on the actual battle-field. It is supposed that seven thousand altogether fell in the horrible carnage which accompanied the total rout of Aghrim. Ginkell followed up his victory by obtaining the capitulation of Galway; its garrison, with the French general, D'Usson, being permitted to retire to Limerick. Here was the last stand made against the triumphant army of King William. That army was now well supplied with artillery and the munitions of war. The same ground was occupied as in the previous year; but it was not in the same wet condition. Ginkell, by a bold manœuvre, crossed the Shannon on a bridge of boats, and scattered the Irish horse that were encamped near the city. He then succeeded in carrying a detached fort, which commanded the bridge called Thomond's; and a fearful slaughter of the garrison accompanied this success. The bombardment was terribly effective. The garrison might hold out till the whole town was in ashes; but even then, unless the besiegers were compelled to retire on the approach of the wet season, hunger would effect what cannon-balls and bombs had left incomplete. The fall of the city became inevitable. In 1690 a French fleet commanded the approaches from the sea. Now an English fleet rode in the Shannon. Hostilities were suspended for some days during the progress of negotiations. On the 1st of October two treaties were signed—one military, the other civil. The civil treaty was signed by the lords justices, who had repaired to the camp. The first article of this civil treaty was in the following words: "It is agreed that the Roman Catholics of this kingdom shall enjoy such privileges in the exercise of their religion as are consistent with the laws of Ireland, or as they did enjoy in the reign of King Charles the Second. And their majesties, as soon as their affairs will permit them to summon a parliament in this kingdom, will endeavor to procure the said Roman Catholics such further security in this particular as may preserve them from any disturbance on account of their said religion." An entire amnesty was promised to all who should take the oath of allegiance. Limerick bears the name of "the City of the Violated Treaty." Years of unjust and vindictive penal laws, which are now happily swept away, have manifested that this reproach is not unfounded. The parliament of Ireland became wholly Protestant, and laws were passed which not only denied the Roman Catholic "privilege in the exercise of their religion," but deprived them of the most sacred civil rights—the rights of family. The war in Ireland was at an end, but not its woes. It was offered to the the nds of Irish troops at Limerick, to make their election for entering e army of King William, or to become the soldiers of King Louis France. The greater number decided for France. It had been omised by the Irish general that those who embarked for another untry should be allowed to take their wives and families with em. The promise could only be partly realized. "When the lest men," says the writer of "Macariæ Excidium," "were once t on shipboard, the women and babes were left on the shore, posed to hunger and cold, without any manner of provision, and ithout any shelter in that rigorous season but the canopy of aven, and in such a miserable condition that it moved pity in me of their enemies." Ireland thus passed under the rule of the nglish colonizers. Happy would it have been if years had not en suffered to elapse before it was felt that penal laws were the orst of all modes for securing religious conformity; happy if nother series of years had not been wasted in attempts to maintain e union of two nations without an equal participation of civil ghts. The present generation has honestly labored to repair the in- stice of the past; and the time may thus arrive when even the me of the third William shall be pronounced without party trreds.

The politics of Scotland in the first two years after the revolution ere more complicated than those of England. The ascendency of ne Presbyterians had been established; but the Episcopalians were ill a formidable body. In 1689, although episcopacy had been bolished, the church government had not been defined. There was o supreme directing power in affairs of religion. In 1690 the parament of Scotland established the synodical authority; made the gnature to the Confession of Faith the test of orthodoxy; and atronage was abolished, under certain small compensations to the atrons. The dissensions connected with these arrangements gave ourage to those who looked to discord as the means for restoring ne Stuart king. A knot of turbulent and discontented men, known s the Club, entered into schemes for reversing all that had been ccomplished by the revolution. Their leaders were frightened, and nformed against each other. Lord Annandale implicated the nhappy Jacobite scribbler, Nevil Payne. He thought himself safer n Scotland than in London—a fatal mistake. We extract a passage in letter from the Earl of Crauford to the Earl of Melville, the king's igh commissioner, to show how the ancient ferocity still lingered mong the politicians of Scotland. The letter is dated December 1th, 1690: "Yesterday in the afternoon, Nevill Penn (after near an our's discourse with him, in name of the council, and in their resence, though at several times, by turning him out and then calling him in again) was questioned upon some things that were not of he deepest concern, and had but gentle torture given him, being esolved to repeat it this day. Which accordingly about six this vening we inflicted on both thumbs and one of his legs, with all the everity that was consistent with humanity, even unto that pitch that ve could not preserve life and have gone further; but without the east success."* This was the last occasion on which Scottish statesmen were disgraced by endeavoring to extort evidence against political malcontents, by "all the severity that was consistent with humanity."† The noble actors in this plot offered up the obscure Nevil Payne as a sacrifice, secured their own safety, and suffered he Lowlands to settle down into peace.

After the victory of Killiecrankie there was a new gathering of Highland clans. The command was taken by General Cannon, who had come over from Ireland with the three hundred troops sent by James to the aid of Dundee. The chieftains soon began to manifest their repugnance to be under the control of a stranger, although he had served in the Netherlands, and brought his military experience to aid their national mode of warfare. The comparative value of regular troops and of mountaineers, who if they failed in the first rush were quickly disorganized, was again to be tried. The Cameronian regiment at Dunkeld was attacked by four or five thousand Highlanders. The place was obstinately defended by the successors of the old Puritans, and after four hours' fighting the clans drew off, the chiefs signed a pledge to support King James, and their followers dispersed. The victorious army of Dundee melted away like a snow-drift. During 1690 there were various outbreaks of detached clans. But Mackay collected an overpowering force at Inverlochy, and there hastily built Fort William, and fixed a garrison there under the command of Colonel Hill.

King William, as early as March, 1690, manifested a wise disposition to tranquillize the Highlands by gentle measures. His warrant to George Viscount Tarbet to treat with the Highland chiefs authorizes him to offer the leaders of the clans indemnity, with money and honors, upon their "return to their duty." Early in 1691 a message had been sent to James "by the loyal Highlanders who had continued in arms for him in Scotland, that unless those of the south joined them, or that his majesty sent speedy succors, it would be impossible to hold out any longer." His majesty returned for answer that his abilities to assist were exhausted by the pressing necessities of Ireland; but that "he had made a shift to send them some present relief of flour, salt, brandy, tobacco, medicinal drugs, flints, etc.," and that if they could stand out no longer, he recommended "an outward compliance."* In 1690 a negotiation had been opened with Lord Breadalbane, to win him over to the government, and to employ his influence to conciliate the rebel chiefs. This negotiation failed. But in the autumn of 1691 Breadalbane, having made his submission to the government, was again authorized to treat with the heads of clans, and to expend twelve or fifteen thousand pounds in this work of pacification. It may well be doubted whether this Highland earl went about his trust in perfect good faith. He is described by his contemporary, John Macky, "cunning as a fox, wise as a serpent, but as slippery as an eel."† At any rate, those who had the most intimate knowledge of the rivalries and petty interests of the chiefs doubted the practicability of the plan, as they doubted the honesty of the man employed to work it. Colonel Hill, in May, 1691, had received an order from the council, as he writes to the Earl of Melville, "to fall upon those Highlanders within my reach that do not presently come in and take the oath of allegiance, and deliver up their arms." In a previous letter he says, "I could wish, if they rise again, that all the west country, and all the clans whom they have injured, may be let loose upon them till they be utterly rooted out."‡ Utterly to root out a rebellious clan was the ready method that presented itself to the military mind. At this time Hill says, "I expect several of them in, and the M'Intoshes men in the Brae, and Glencoe men; if they fail, I'll put my orders in execution against them." On the 15th of May he writes to Melville, "I have last night received an order to delay the severity prepared by the former order, till I hear further."§ He took wiser measures than the plan of rooting out. He sent the clans the form of an oath, to which many chiefs subscribed. "The Appin and Glencoe men have desired they may go in to my Lord of Argyle, because he is their superior, and I have set them a short day to do it in."‖ By a letter of Sir Thomas Livingstone, who was chief in command of the king's forces, it appears that he "had been commanded by the Master of Stair, to order Hill not to act as yet any way vigorously on his side."¶ The Master of Stair, Sir John Dalrymple, was secretary of state for Scotland, and was then in attendance upon King William in Holland and the Netherlands. The scheme of Lord Breadalbane for bribing the chiefs to submission and loyalty was the cause of the direction to

Hill not to act vigorously. Colonel Hill by no means approved of Breadalbane or his plan. He would, he writes, have had "much more of the people under oath had not my Lord Breadalbane's design hindered; which I wish may do good, but suspect more hurt than good from it: for my part, hereafter, if I live to have geese I'll set the fox to keep them." * Breadalbane came into the Highlands, and made his overtures to certain chiefs. "He tells them the money he has for them is locked up in a chest at London; but they believe, if he say true in this, he will find a way to keep a good part of it to himself." † On the 23d of July Dalrymple wrote to Livingstone from the camp at Gerpines, in the name of the king, to direct him to keep his troops on the Highland borders, but not to commit any acts of hostility against the Highlanders.‡ On the 29th of July, the privy council of Scotland expressed their opinion to the queen, that if the army had marched against those who held out when Hill was tendering the oath, "they would have submitted themselves, or been easily forced to it." §

The plans of Breadalbane did not produce the effect that was contemplated. Hill writes on the 23d of August that the country was peaceable, but that there were impediments to a general submission, through the oath of confederation among clans, "by which they are obliged to do nothing without the consent of each other." ‖ There was a strong suspicion that Breadalbane did get the lion's share of the money which he pretended to be in the chest at London, but which was really in his own coffers. According to a tradition preserved by Dalrymple, he refused to give any account of how it was applied, saying, "the money is spent—the Highlands are quiet—and this is the only way of accompting among friends." In the distribution of his gratuities he brought his own interests and passions into play. He was a great Highland lord, with large domains and hundreds of vassals, but his territories were often exposed to the depredations of the clans with whom he was at feud. The small clan, MacDonald of Glencoe, were bad neighbors to Breadalbane; and he took this occasion to require that the gratuity which he had to offer for their allegiance should be a set-off for certain claims of the Campbells for injuries committed by the MacDonalds. MacIan, their chief, as proud if not so great as Breadalbane, was wholly impracticable upon such terms. Others followed his example; and many clans remained in a state of inert rebellion. In August the government determined to bring the submission of the Highland chiefs to a decisive issue, by a proclamation offering indemnity to all who should take the oaths, on or before the last day of December, 1691, and threatening the extremities of military execution—in the old form of threatening the vengeance of fire and sword—against all and each who should not submit to the government, and swear to live in peace. "Letters of fire and sword had been so ceaselessly issued against the Highlanders that in the time of the Stuarts it was a usual and little noticeable form." ¶

It would appear by a letter of the Duke of Hamilton, dated as late as the 26th of December, that he regretted that Sir Thomas Livingstone, who had that night returned from London, had not seen the king, which "would have contributed more to his service than commanding him back; for he could have advised better measures than is taken, to have reduced the Highlanders, of which there is not one word signified to the council."  Some of the chiefs had held out to the very last. But on the 31st of December all the clans had given their submission, with one exception—the MacDonalds of Glencoe. The submission of all the other chiefs who had been in arms against the government was an event which was not contemplated with satisfaction by the Master of Stair. Burnet says, "A black design was laid, not only to cut off the men of Glencoe, but a great many more clans, reckoned to be in all above six thousand persons." †† This may be a very loose assertion; but letters of Dalrymple, written to Lieutenant-Colonel Hamilton early in December, prove that he had an especial grudge against the MacDonalds, "for marring the bargain which the Earl of Breadalbane was doing with the Highlanders;" and that he entertained a hope that the MacDonalds would "fall into the net"—that is, not comply with the proclamation. He further intimates that the government is obliged to ruin some of the clans, "in order to weaken and frighten the rest." That Dalrymple contemplated something like "the black design" mentioned by Burnet is evident from his letter of instructions to the commander of the troops for his guidance, if the obnoxious clans should not have submitted by the prescribed day. He is directed to destroy entirely the country of Lochaber, Lochiel's lands, Keppoch's, Glengarry's, and Glencoe's. "Your power shall be large enough. I hope the soldiers will not trouble the government with prisoners." Mr. Burton considers that Dalrymple, from whose letters of this nature we now turn with such loathing, "only pursued the old policy of Scottish governments toward the Highlanders. . . . The rule had always been to show no more consideration to Highlanders than to wild beasts." *

The clan of the MacDonalds dwelt in the valley of Glencoe, under their venerable chief, MacIan. Their huts were scattered in several hamlets around his house—a small population of not two hundred adult males.† He had fought with his few hardy followers in the ranks of Dundee at Killiecrankie; he had the reputation of being one of the most daring of the Highland marauders; he had driven off cattle in the territories of Argyle and Breadalbane. He was therefore an object of especial hatred to those proud nobles, who regarded him as a paltry robber to be crushed when the opportunity came. MacIan had his own pride, and deferred his obedience to the proclamation till the last moment. On the 31st of December he presented himself, with some of his clan, at Fort William, and offered to take the oaths before Colonel Hill. The commander of the garrison had no legal power to receive them; he was not a magistrate. Hill gave him a letter to the Sheriff of Argyleshire, stating the application that had been made to him, and expressing a hope that the submission of the "lost sheep recovered" would be received. It was six days before he reached Inverary, over mountain paths covered with snow. The sheriff yielded to the old man's prayers and tears, administered the oath, and sent to the Sheriff-Clerk of Argyle, then at Edinburgh, a certificate to be laid before the council of the circumstances which had led him to do what was a departure from the letter of the proclamation, but which was within its spirit. The sheriff-clerk first tendered the certificate, with a copy of Hill's letter, to the clerks of the council, who refused to receive it. He then applied to individual privy counsellors, who would not interfere in the matter. The certificate was finally suppressed, and the general body of the council were kept in ignorance of it. Among those who advised that the certificate should not be sent in was the lord president, father of the John Dalrymple. Dalrymple, the secretary, was the medium for the transaction of Scottish affairs with the king. It would appear that the general submission of the clans was not quite certain; for the king had signed, on the 11th of January, instructions to Sir Thomas Livingstone to pursue with fire and sword those Highland rebels who had not taken the benefit of the indemnity; but to allow them to surrender on mercy. Objections were taken to the use of the term "fire and sword" in these instructions. On the 16th of January the instructions of the 11th were repeated, with verbal alterations, and with this addition: "As for MacIan of Glencoe and his tribe, if they can be well distinguished from the rest of the Highlanders, it will be proper for the vindication of public justice to extirpate that sect of thieves." Burnet alleges that "the king signed this, without any inquiry about it; for he was too apt to sign papers in a hurry." Those who doubt this allege that it was not even signed but superscribed by the king. The Hon. William Leslie Melville says "that the king's having both superscribed and subscribed 'one unfortunate sentence,' should not be received by all our historians and poets as a conclusive proof of his being cognizant of their contents. I find numerous warrants and orders from him, some superscribed and subscribed, some only superscribed some only subscribed, as a man in haste would dispatch business of form." ‡ It is of some importance to bear in mind that what William superscribed and subscribed was a long letter of instructions containing several clauses. It was a duplicate, with alterations, of what he had signed five days before. In this duplicate the "one unfortunate sente was added. In a little book, very useful as a summary of events, the compiler prints the words beginning, "As for MacIan," and ending, "sect of thieves," with "William R." as the superscription of these four lines only, subscribed "W. R." He then rejects the notion that William signed without reading the document because it consisted "of so few words."* We attach no importance to Burnet's defence. In our view the character of William is best defended by assuming that he did read the order; that he signed without knowing that MacIan had irregularly taken the oaths; and that the words, "to extirpate that sect of thieves," who were represented in a state of rebellious warfare, was not to direct their butchery with circumstances of treachery and cruelty. We are inclined to believe that William not only signed the order with a complete knowledge, but that the attempt to prevent any indiscriminate slaughter, by the words "if they can well be distinguished from the rest of the Highlanders," looks like an emanation from his mind. The Master of Stair would have little cared how many were slaughtered in a loose construction of the exceptional case of the MacDonalds. Whether the argument that the word extirpate "would naturally bear a sense perfectly innocent, and would, but for the horrible event which followed, have been universally understood in that sense,"† may admit of a difference of opinion. The word meant, no doubt, a complete suppression of a community not conforming to the laws of civilized society; but, as it appears to us, it did not mean their indiscriminate slaughter. Hill, who appears to have been no cruel oppressor, desires that the rebellious clans "may be utterly rooted out." To extirpate and to root out are synonymous terms. We believe that William knew what the word implied. He had probably never read "The Tempest;" but used the word as Shakespeare used it when he makes the King of Naples hearken to the suit of Prospero's brother, that he

If the long letter of instructions, concluding with the short sentence relating to the MacDonalds, had run in the ancient form for the destruction of Highlanders, he might have hesitated: "To invade them to their utter destruction, by slaughter, burning, drowning, and other ways, and leave no creature living of that clan, except priests, women, and bairns."‡ At any rate we may affirm that it is a falsehood in the compiler of the "Life of James II." to say, "By an order, which Nero himself would have had a horror of, the Prince of Orange commanded one Colonel Hill and Lieutenant-Colonel Hamilton to put Glencoe to death, and all the males of his line, [in age] not exceeding seventy."§ It is observed by Walter Wilson, in his "Life of Defoe," that "the inveteracy that marked the language of the Jacobites when speaking of King William, and with which their works are so highly seasoned, has descended in full force to our own day." We have an example of this temper in the valuable but somewhat prejudiced "Annals" issued from Oxford, in which it is inferred "that Stair did not really go beyond William's instructions in planning the massacre of Glencoe, although the parliament of Scotland had the complaisance to lay the greater blame on the minister." The parliament of Scotland expressly said, as the first result of their investigation in 1695, "We found, in the first place, that the Master of Stair's letters had exceeded your majesty's instructions." William was, indeed, justly indignant at this resolution; "frequently repeating that he thanked the parliament of Scotland; they had used him better than England had done his grandfather, for they had tried him for his life, and brought him in not guilty."‖ His pride was wounded that any investigation at all should have taken place as to his concurrence in the act of his minister. The parliament had voted the Glencoe slaughter to be a murder; and he thought it no compliment to be formally acquitted as an accessory before the fact.

In transmitting from London the instructions signed by the king on the 11th of January, the secretary of state for Scotland wrote to Sir Thomas Livingstone, "I have no great kindness to Keppoch nor Glencoe; and it is well that people are in mercy. Just now, my Lord Argyle tells me that Glencoe hath not taken the oath, at which I rejoice. It is a great work of charity to be exact in rooting out that damnable sept, the worst of the Highlanders." When Dalrymple sent the instructions of the 16th, he wrote to Livingstone, "For a just example of vengeance, I entreat the thieving tribe of Glencoe may be rooted out to purpose." To Colonel Hill he wrote on the same date, "That such as render on mercy might be saved;" but entreats that "for a just vengeance and public example the tribe of Glencoe may be rooted out to purpose. The Earls of Argyle and Breadalbane have promised that they shall have no retreat in their bounds." During another fortnight nothing was done toward accomplishing Dalrymple's entreaties. On the 30th he wrote again to Livingstone: "I am glad that Glencoe did not come within the time prefixed. I hope what is done there may be in earnest, since the rest are not in a condition to draw together to help. I think to harry their cattle and burn their houses is but to render them desperate lawless men; but I believe you will be satisfied it were a great advantage to the nation that thieving tribe were rooted out and cut off." To Hill he writes on the same day, "Pray, when the thing concerning Glencoe is resolved, let it be secret and sudden." Colonel Hill sent his orders to Lieutenant-Colonel Hamilton to march with eight hundred men straight to Glencoe; "and there put in execution the orders you have received from the commander-in-chief." Hamilton addressed his orders to Major Duncanson, his second in command; concluding his letter by directing that the avenues be so secured "that the old fox nor none of his cubs get away: The orders are that none be spared, nor the government troubled with prisoners. Major Duncanson then dispatched Captain Robert Campbell, of Glenlyon, to proceed to Glencoe in advance of the other troops with a detachment of a hundred and twenty men of Argyle's regiment. He arrived there on the 1st of February.

The valley of Glencoe has been variously described, according to the associations of those who have visited it. In the eyes of the picturesque historian of this period—who regards it as a rugged desert, "valued on account of the shelter which it afforded to the plunderer and his plunder"—it is "the most dreary and melancholy of all the Scottish passes, the very valley of the shadow of death."* To the equal-minded tourist, "the scenery of this valley is far the most picturesque of any in the Highlands.† To the enthusiastic believer in Ossian, it is the valley of Fingal—having a name, indeed, signifying in the Celtic tongue the Valley of Tears—"the most peaceful and secluded of narrow vales." Here "the matchless melody of the sweet voice of Cona first awaked the joy of grief." The blue stream of Ossian's Cona here bends its course to Lochleven. The glen, "so warm, so fertile, so overhung by mountains which seem to meet above you," is described as "a place of great plenty and security."‡ The admirable historian of Scotland from the revolution tells us of the narrow slip of grazing ground between the Alpine walls of Glencoe, and a few, still narrower, on the upper levels. If the MacDonalds had not lived, he says, by plunder, their arid glen could not have supported the population.§ Whether barren or fertile, whether filled by robbers or by "born poets," who treasured up "the songs of Selma"—here dwelt the MacIans in patriarchal simplicity. Campbell of Glenlyon, who came with his hundred and twenty Highlanders of the Argyle regiment on the 1st of February, 1692, spent twelve days with his men amid the somewhat unpoetical hospitalities of the clan. The MacIans had no affection for the Campbells; but Glenlyon's niece was married to the second son of their chief; and when he and his lieutenant, Lindsay, said they came as friends, and asked for quarters, being sent to relieve the garrison of Fort William, who were overcrowded, they were received with cordiality. Undoubtedly the chief and his clansmen trusted to the indemnity of the government, which they thought had been secured by the oath which MacIan had taken before the Sheriff of Argyle. Here they lived for twelve days as Highlander with Highlander. They had beef and spirits without payment. They were sheltered from the snow-storms in the huts of the poor people. Glenlyon became affectionate over his usquebaugh with the husband of his niece, played at cards with the old chief, and entertained two of MacIan's sons at supper on the night of the 12th. At that time he had the following letter in his pocket, from Major Duncanson, dated on the 12th from Valacholis, in the immediate neighborhood: "You are hereby ordered to fall upon the rebels, the Macdonalds of Glencoe, and put all to the sword under seventy. You are to have especial care that the old fox and his sons do on no account escape your hands. You are to secure all the avenues, that no man escape. This you are to put in execution at five o'clock in the morning precisely, and by that time, or very shortly after it, I'll strive to be at you with a stronger party; if I do not come to you at five, you are not to tarry for me, but to fall on. This is by the king's special command, for the good and safety of the country, that these miscreants may be cut off, root and branch. See that this be put in execution without fear or favor, else you may expect to be treated as not true to the king and government, nor a man fit to carry commission in the king's service. Expecting you will not fail in the fulfilling hereof, as you love yourself, I subscribe these with my hand." Captain Campbell did not tarry for his superior officer. He was strong enough to do his murderous bidding without his aid. Sir Walter Scott thinks that the purposed crime was more foul, through its perpetration being "committed to soldiers, who were not only the countrymen of the proscribed, but the near neighbors, and some of them the close connections of the Macdonalds of Glencoe." He adds that, "the massacre has been unjustly attributed to English troops."* We venture to believe that English troops had not the qualities which would have recommended their employ. It is impossible not to see that the revenges of the Campbells had as much to do with this act as "the king's special command." Argyle and Breadalbane were not promising that the clan MacDonald should have "no retreat in their bounds," without making known their desire to their people that "the old fox and his cubs" should be wholly "cut off." The cunning of the affair was characteristic of the mountain tribes: "Highland history is crowded with incidents, which, in modern phraseology, would be stamped as treachery, but in the social system of the actors passed as dexterity."† Some agitation among the Argyle soldiers—whisperings and murmurs—had roused the fears of John MacIan. He went at midnight to the house of Inverriggen, in the hamlet where Glenlyon was quartered. The captain was up and his men about him. He was ordered, he said, to march against Glengarry's people. Could he be likely to harm his friends, and especially those among whom his niece had married? Would he not have given a hint to Alaster? The man was satisfied. The night was stormy. The valley lay quiet in mists and thick darkness. At five in the morning Glenlyon and his men slaughtered Inverriggen and nine other men. A child of twelve was stabbed by an officer bearing the name of Drummond. Lindsay and his party went to the house of the old chief, and killed him as he was dressing himself, roused by his faithful servants. His two sons escaped among the rocks. His wife was stripped of her trinkets by the savages, and died the following day from her ill-usage. In another hamlet, Auchnaion, a sergeant of the name of Barbour, with his detachment, shot Auchentriater, and seven others, as they sat round the fire in the dark morning. It is reckoned that the number of the slaughtered was thirty eight. Happily, the order that the avenues should be secured was not effectually carried out. Duncanson did not arrive in time. The reports of the murderous guns had alarmed the sleeping families, and three fourths of the adults, with their wives and children, escaped by the passes before the troops of Hamilton had barred their way. No deed of blood remained for those who came to Glencoe, when the sun was high in the heavens, but to slay an old man of eighty. Their work was to burn the huts of the tribe, and drive off their cattle. But the unhappy fugitives who had escaped the slaughter had to endure all the extremities of hunger and cold in that inclement season. The number who perished in the snow, sank exhausted in the bogs, crept into caverns and died for lack of food, was never ascertained. In a short time, some few stole back to their half-ruined cabins, and in after years the valley had again a population. Among those who returned to the scene of desolation was the bard of the tribe. "The bard sat alone upon a rock, and, looking down, composed a long, dismal song."‡

In an age of publicity the extraordinary occurrences of the valley of Glencoe would have been known in a week in every corner of these realms. In an age when newspapers were uncommon, and gatherers of news by no means vigilant to minister to public curiosity, no Londoner knew of this tragedy, or, if he heard some rumor, heeded it not. After some weeks had elapsed there was a report that a robber tribe had been engaged with Scotch troops, and that the chief and some of his clan had been killed. At Edinburgh people in the coffee-houses began to talk. Glenlyon was conscious of the remarks upon him, and said that "he would do it again if it were again to be done. He would stab any man in Scotland or England without asking why, if he were commanded so to do." Argyle's Highland regiment was quartered at Brentford, in June, 1692; and it was afterward published that the soldiers talked about the massacre, and that one said, "Glencoe seems to hang about Glenlyon night and day; and you may see it in his face." While public murmurings were faintly heard in Scotland—not "while public indignation was at the highest," as Scott says—Dalrymple wrote to Hamilton from the Hague, on the 30th of April, 1692, "For the people of Glencoe, when you do your duty in a thing so necessary to rid the country of thieving, you need not trouble yourself to take the pains to vindicate yourself, by showing all your orders, which are now put in the Paris Gazette. When you do right you need fear no body. All that can be said is, that, in the execution, it was neither so full nor so fair as might have been." Charles Leslie, the nonjuring clergyman, obtained some particulars of the deliberate treachery and cold-blooded ferocity which made the Glencoe massacre so peculiarly atrocious; and he published the circumstances about the end of 1692. A pamphlet called "Gallienus Redivivus" followed up this attack. Burnet says that the transaction at Glencoe "raised a mighty outcry, and was published by the French in their gazettes and by the Jacobites in their libels, to cast a reproach on the king's government as cruel and barbarous; though in all other instances it had appeared that his own inclinations were gentle and mild, rather to an excess."* The affair would probably have rested with the French gazettes and Jacobite libels had not the parliament of Scotland, after a recess of two years, met in 1695, when Glencoe was a subject which had roused the nation to demand inquiry; for the nonjurors and friends of King James had worked diligently in stirring up the popular feeling. Political hostility to the Master of Stair had something to do with the tardy indignation of the Scottish estates. William had in 1693 authorized an investigation of the matter by the Duke of Hamilton and others. The duke died; and the inquiry was left to die with him. The king was now advised to take a more decided course, anticipating the measures of the Scotch parliament. He issued a commission of precognition to the Marquis of Tweeddale, and other privy counsellors in Scotland. The inquiries were necessarily minute and complicated; but the document was at last produced. From that document, and the letters and oral evidence accompanying it, is an authentic narrative of the massacre to be collected.

The report of the commission, with the depositions and letters were read in the Scottish parliament on the 24th of June, 1695, and the result is thus recorded:

"After hearing of the said report, it was voted, nemine contradicente, that his majesty's instructions of the 11th and 16th days of January, 1692, touching the Highland rebels, who did not accept in due time of the benefit of his indemnity, did contain a warrant for mercy, to all, without exception, who should offer to take the oath of allegiance, and come in upon mercy, though the first day of January, 1692, prefixed by the proclamation of indemnity, was passed; and that therefore these instructions contained no warrant for the execution of the Glencoe men, made in February thereafter.

"Then the question stated and voted, if the execution and slaughter of the Glencoe men in February, 1692, as is represented to the parliament, be a murder or not, and carried in the affirmative."

It was then moved "that since the parliament has found it a murder, that it may be inquired into, who were the occasion of it, and the persons guilty and committers of it, and what way and manner they should be prosecute."†

On the 10th of July the parliament agreed to an address to the king, which contains the following material passages :

"We humbly beg that, considering that the Master of Stair's excess in his letters against the Glencoe men has been the original cause of this unhappy business, and hath given occasion in a great measure to so extraordinary an execution by the warm directions he gives about doing it by way of surprise ; and considering the high station and trust he is in, and that he is absent, We do therefore beg that your majesty will give such orders about him for vindication of your government as you in your royal wisdom shall think fit.

"And likeways considering that the actors have barbarously killed men under trust, We humbly desire you majesty would be pleased to send the actors home, and to give orders to your advocate to prosecute them according to law, there remaining nothing else to be done for the full vindication of your government of so foul and scandalous an aspersion as it has lain under upon this occasion." *

The Master of Stair was only dismissed from office by the king. The parliament of Scotland did not accuse "the original cause of this unhappy business" as being participant in what they voted to be a murder. Whether the king ought to have placed the chief culprit on his trial for a great crime can scarcely be maintained without acknowledging that William had some excuse for his comparative lenity in the very mild recommendation of the parliament "to give such orders about him, for vindication of your government, as you in your royal wisdom shall think fit." Most persons will nevertheless agree with the historian that "in return for many victims immolated by treachery, only one victim was demanded by justice ; and it must ever be considered as a blemish on the fame of William that the demand was refused." † The Scottish parliament imputed no guilt to Livingstone or Hill ; they somewhat doubted about Hamilton and Duncanson ; but they were clear that Captain Campbell and Captain Drummond, Lieutenant Lindsay, Ensign Lundy, and Sergeant Barbour were the actors in the slaughter, and ought to be prosecuted. The king did not cause these to be prosecuted. He knew perfectly well that they had as sound a legal defence before a civil tribunal as any of the privates who discharged their muskets under the orders of Sergeant Barbour. Defoe affirms that "his majesty often said, it was a moot-point in war, whether they had broken orders or no ; and though I have the honor to know that his majesty exceedingly resented the manner, yet it did not appear at all that they had laid themselves open to military justice in it." ‡

There was one person connected with the Glencoe massacre, of whom we lose sight in the decisions of the Scottish parliament as to "who were the occasion of it." That person is the Earl of Breadalbane. But there is a further record in the minutes of that parliament which shows that the other great culprit besides Dalrymple had not been wholly overlooked : "July 1. A warrant granted to bring the Earl of Breadalbane down to the parliament house." § From the parliament house he was committed to the Castle of Edinburgh, on a charge of high treason. In the course of the Glencoe inquiries the Highland chief Glengarry, and others, deposed that in offering them money he alleged that he continued in the interest of King James, and pressed them to make a show of pacification, that they might be ready to serve him at some future time—the "outward compliance" which James had himself recommended. Breadalbane contrived that the inquiry should stand over from time to time, till the session of parliament came to an end. He had pleaded his pardon from the crown ; but the offences charged were subsequent to that pardon. Burnet says "he pretended he had secret orders from the king to say anything that would give him credit with them ; which the king owned so far that he ordered a new pardon to be passed for him." ‖ It is impossible to fathom the depths of the intrigues of the Scottish statesmen and great lords at this period. Burnet in his narrative of the Glencoe massacre says of Breadalbane : "That he might gratify his own revenge, and render the king odious to all the Highlanders, he proposed that orders should be sent for a military execution on those of Glencoe." ¶ We believe in no such refinement of Breadalbane's cunning. He and Argyle were glad to sweep out the MacDonalds, who annoyed them. Dalrymple would have exterminated the whole Celtic population of Jacobites, papists, and thieves—for the greater part were such in his mind—as his predecessors in power had often hunted them down as wild beasts. Not three months before Dalrymple put the order of January 16th before William to sign, he wrote to Breadalbane that no prince but William would have not been tempted to hearken to the earnest desires of all those he trusts in his government, "to have made the Highlanders examples of his justice, by extirpating them." * William acceded to the one exception to his general clemency, urged upon him by Dalrymple, Argyle, and Breadalbane ; for it was a measure justified to his mind by the "laws of war." It is one of the most lamentable evils of these laws, that in some cases a violation of the rights of humanity ceases to be regarded as a crime ; and that in all cases implicit obedience to orders is the paramount duty of a soldier, however revolting to his moral sense.

Sir Walter Scott, recalling his early recollections, says that "on the 5th of November, 1788, when a full century had elapsed after the revolution, some friends to constitutional liberty proposed that the return of the day should be solemnized by an agreement to erect a monument to the memory of King William, and the services which he had rendered to the British kingdoms." How was the proposal defeated ? By an anonymous letter in one of the Edinburgh newspapers, "ironically applauding the undertaking, and proposing as two subjects of the entablature for the projected column, the massacre of Glencoe, and the distresses of the Scottish colonists at Darien." We have related the one story with a scrupulous regard to facts. We shall have to tell the other distressing narrative with the same scrupulosity. Sir Walter Scott impresses upon his grandson this lesson : "You may observe from this how cautious a monarch should be of committing wrong or injustice, however strongly recommended by what may seem political necessity." † The great novelist left his juvenile readers, and his confiding adult readers, to the full belief that King William was the principal person to be accused as the author of both calamities. There probably it not a more striking instance of the blindness of a morbid nationality than in this mode of attributing "wrong or injustice" to a sovereign who, in the one case, was wholly under the guidance of his Scotch ministers, acting in the spirit of all Scotch statesmen toward the Highland clans ; and in the other case was wholly under the control of the English parliament, uttering the voice of the English nation in the commercial jealousies of the age. We have reached a period when all the false nationalities and party sympathies embodied in romance, and in histories more fictitious than fiction, have very nearly done their work ; when we may look at kings and statesmen through that achromatic glass which shows them under no false coloring in their public characters. We may therefore doubt, with a Scottish historian who belongs to this more advanced age, whether, in a period when the Highland chief was acting after his kind in the indulgence of a fierce revenge—when the Scottish statesman was acting as Scottish statesmen had done for ages before him—it was likely that a "far-seeing and deeply judging prince" should desert his nature and habits so much as "to countenance, suggest, and urge on the slaughter of those poor Highlanders." ‡ The anonymous libeller who would have inscribed "Glencoe" on the entablature of a column to William, if he had read the evidence, would have known perfectly well that this slaughter was devised by Scottish statesmen of the Lowlands, and carried through by Scottish captains of the Highlands. He would have known that the treachery of this military execution was the device, in the old crafty and ferocious spirit of clan hostility, of the native soldiers to whom the slaughter was intrusted. He probably knew that Glencoe was not the last of the Highland massacres, sanctioned by no intervention of King William, but by the old "letters of fire and sword" granted by the privy council of Scotland. These letters were not granted for any political object, but in the ancient spirit of revenge, by which a favored clan was authorized to destroy another less favored. Six years after the Glencoe massacre the Laird of McIntosh obtained letters of fire and sword against MacDonald of Keppoch. McIntosh and his followers, with the assistance of the governor of Fort William, are authorized to hunt and take; if necessary to put to death; and if they retire to strongholds, to "raise fire and use all force and warlike engines." This process, then a legal one, was not sent out against the king's rebels—for the pacification of the Jacobite clans had been accomplished—but to obtain restitution of lands alleged to be unjustly held by a clan that did not care for being "put to the horn."* It were well if those who repeat glibly "how cautious a monarch should be," etc., would lead their readers to some real knowledge of the condition and manners of the Highlanders of those days, and of the mode in which the authorities of Scotland had for generations been accustomed to treat them. They would perhaps then be inclined to assign to its proper cause—a hatred of the political and religious principles of the king of the revolution—the imputation that to his "hard-heartedness" is to be ascribed "the massacre of Glencoe; an enormity which has left a stain on William's memory that neither time, nor the services that he was providentially the instrument of rendering to these kingdoms, can ever efface."†

In narrating the circumstances which retarded the union of the kingdoms of England and Scotland—a measure of which William observed, "I have done all I can in that affair, but I do not see a temper in either nation that looks like it"—Defoe says, "The affair of Glencoe was another step to national breaches." To us, looking calmly upon this affair at the interval of a hundred and sixty-six years, it would appear the most extravagant of national delusions to set up this as "a ground of national animosity." From the beginning to the end it was a Scottish affair. Not an English statesman was concerned in advising the proceeding. The character of the monarch who signed the order, as King of Scotland, is far more truly exemplified in one sentence of the proclamation of indemnity, which ought to have been the rule of conduct for those who urged on the massacre—"to interpret this indemnity in the most favorable and ample manner."

CHAPTER CXXVII.

Marlborough dismissed from office—Parliamentary debates—Independence of the judges—the king leaves for Holland—Threatened invasion—Declaration of James—Battle of La Hogue—Siege of Namur—Grandval's plot to assassinate William—Battle of Steinkirk—Parliament—Crime and public distress—Commencement of the national debt—The Licensing Act expires—Place Bill—Bill for triennial parliaments—The king's veto—Murder of Mountfort—Trial of Lord Mohun.

"The king was pleased, without assigning any reason, to remove my Lord Marlborough from his employments." Such is the brief notice of an important event by the wife of the great peer. Much fuller is her account of the circumstances which caused a serious disagreement between Queen Mary and her sister, the Princess Anne. The queen, three weeks after the dismissal of the earl, wrote to her sister that "it is very unfit Lady Marlborough should stay with you, since that gives her husband so just a pretence of being where he ought not." Mary said, "I need not repeat the cause he has given the king to do what he has done, nor his unwillingness at all times to come to such extremities, though people do deserve it." Anne refused to be separated from her beloved Mrs. Freeman; and Mrs. Freeman being commanded to leave the palace, Mrs. Morley left with her. Anne chose her abode at Sion House; and the nation was scandalized at a quarrel between the occupier of the throne and the sister who might one day be called to occupy it. It is easy to imagine that no circumstance in the lives of William and Mary produced more misery than this rupture. The dismissal of Marlborough occurred on the 10th of January, at the very time when, in the view of some candid persons, William was occupied in planning the slaughter of an obscure Highland clan. It was a period to the king of great political anxiety. Lady Marlborough says she could never learn "what cause the king had for his displeasure." The popular feeling regarded the earl's dismissal as a just punishment "for his excessive taking of bribes, covetousness, and extortion on all occasions from his inferior officers."‡ In another passage Evelyn attributes Marlborough's disgrace to his "having used words against the king." What Marlborough had really done has been revealed in a letter of James. The lieutenant-general of William, who also held the domestic office of his gentleman of the bedchamber, had concerted with the Jacobites to effect the recall of James by the subtlest of plots. He was organizing a party to propose and carry in parliament a motion that all the foreigners in the employ of the crown, civil or military, should be sent out of the kingdom. The object was to produce a rupture between the king and the parliament. Then, says the letter of James, "my Lord Churchill would declare with the army for the parliament; and, the fleet doing the same, they would have recalled me." James adds that some of his own imprudent friends, dreading that the scheme of Churchill had for its ultimate object to make the Princess Anne queen, discovered it to Bentinck, and thus "turned aside the blow."*

The parliament was adjourned on the 20th of February, having met on the 2d of the previous October. It was a session of great debate, but more remarkable for the discussion of important measures than for their final enactment. The rival claims of the old East India Company and of the new were the subject of earnest argument, not unmingled with party feelings. But nothing was finally decided, and a bill for the regulation of the India trade was suffered to drop.† A most important measure for regulating trials in cases of high treason was passed by the Commons; but becoming the subject of a great controversy between the two houses, as to the right of peers to be tried by the whole body of the upper house, as well during a recess as during the sitting of parliament, that valuable bill also fell through. A few years later the jealousy of the Commons was removed. Another measure of great public advantage was defeated by the king's veto. It was the first time in which William had exercised this power. The judges had been made independent of the crown as to their term of office. They were appointed by William and Mary "Quamdiu se bene gesserint:" they could not be arbitrarily removed. But their salaries had not been fixed, as they ought to have been. The houses passed a bill for legally establishing this judicial independence; also providing that each judge should be paid a thousand a year. But they charged the salaries upon the hereditary revenues of the crown, without the previous consent of the king having been accorded. The king, says Hallam, "gave an unfortunate instance of his very injudicious tenacity of bad prerogatives in refusing his assent." A later historian says that the circumstances under which the king used his veto have never been correctly stated. "William could defend the proprietary rights of the crown only by putting his negative on the bill. . . . It was not till the provisions of the bill had been forgotten, and till nothing but its title was remembered, that William was accused of having been influenced by a wish to keep the judges in a state of dependence."‡ This great constitutional principle was determined by the Act of Settlement of 1701 (13 Gul. 3, c. 2), which provides that after the limitation of the crown under that statute shall take effect, "Judges' commissions be made Quamdiu se bene gesserint, and their salaries ascertained and established; but upon the address of both houses of parliament it may be lawful to remove them."§

The king set out for Holland on the 5th of March. At the beginning of the session he had told the parliament that an army of sixty-five thousand men would be required, and the houses voted that number. The distribution of the land force gave about eleven thousand men for England, thirteen thousand for Ireland, two thousand ‡ Macaulay, "History," vol. iv. p. 183. There is an exception to Lord Macaulay's wonted accuracy in his remarks on this subject. He says, "That great law [the Bill of Rights] had deprived the crown of the power of arbitrarily removing the judges." The Bill of Rights contains not a word on the subject; neither does the Declaration of Rights.

§ Mr. Hallam has pointed out that we owe the independence of the judges to this statute, and not to George III., as we have long been taught to believe. Blackstone contributed to this popular delusion, by ascribing vast importance to the statute 1 Geo. III., c. 23, which continued the commissions of the judges notwithstanding the demise of the crown—a point before doubtful. The recent editor of Blackstone, Dr. Kerr, has pointed out that "the learned commentator much exaggerates the value" of the statute of George III.

for Scotland, and thirty-eight thousand to serve beyond sea. The proportion of regular troops for the defence of England was thus comparatively small; but then the militia of the kingdom could be immediately called out, and the regiments of London and Westminster were always in readiness for service. The navy had been brought into a greater state of efficiency than at any previous period since the revolution. If loyal songs are to be believed in, the war was popular:

"Our army makes Lewis to tremble and quake,
He fearing that Mons we again will retake."*

Weavers, shoemakers, butchers, dyers, hatters—the men of London and the men of the West—were all ready to march under "renowned King William," says the popular doggerel. But something more effective than a broadside ballad was issued to stir up the country to defend its government. It was a declaration by James himself, which was not suppressed by the queen and her council, but reprinted, and widely circulated with appropriate comment. There was in this document not a word of regret for the past; not a word that could hold out a prospect of amendment for the future. It breathed vengeance against nobles and prelates who were proscribed by name; it threatened whole classes with punishment as guilty rebels; the judges and juries who had convicted Ashton and Cross, two of the plotting Jacobites, and the "fishermen and all others who offered personal indignities to us at Feversham." Such was a declaration issued to prepare the people for receiving their ejected king with contrite tears, when he came back at the head of a French invading army. James had at last induced the King of France to hazard the chance of a landing in England. The minister who had constantly opposed that dangerous project was dead. That minister was Louvois. He had been the chief military administrator of Louis for nearly a quarter of a century, but at last became obnoxious to his master. Louvois, says Burnet, "grew uneasy at the authority Madame de Maintenon took in things which she could not understand; and was in conclusion so unacceptable to the king that once, when he flung his bundle of papers down upon the floor before him, the king lifted up his cane, but the lady held him from doing more."† Saint Simon tells something like the same story, with the variation of the king catching up the fire-tongs instead of lifting his cane. Louvois died suddenly, not without suspicion of poison. Saint Simon represents Louis as feeling free when he had got rid of his old servant; and then relates that, when an officer came from James, at St. Germains, with a compliment of condolence, Louis, "with an air and a tone more than perfectly easy" (plus que dégagés) replied, "Give my compliments and thanks to the King and Queen of England, and say to them from me, that my affairs and their affairs will go on none the worse for what has happened." When the great war minister of France was saved by the hand of death from being sent to the Bastile, Louis was free to assist his confident brother at St. Germains with ten thousand French troops, and with the Irish regiments which had entered the service of France. A camp was formed at La Hogue; and James, in the declaration which we have noticed, announced that the Most Christian King had now "lent us so many troops as may be abundantly sufficient to untie the hands of our subjects, and make it safe for them to return to their duty and repair to our standard."‡

On the 24th of April James joined his camp in Normandy. He relied upon his French and Irish army, but he relied as much upon the defection of the English fleet. Not only Admiral Russell, but other officers had been tampered with. Russell, however, had been disgusted into something like a sense of honor and duty by the insane declaration issued by James. He sent word to the rebel-threatener that he ought "to grant a general pardon, and that then he would contribute what he could to his restoration, without insisting upon any terms for himself."§ This crafty renegade had still something of the Englishman about him; for while he proposed to get out of the way with the fleet he commanded, so as to give the invaders an opportunity of landing, he declared that "if he met the French fleet he would fight it, even though the king himself were on board."

On the 15th of May the English fleet was at St. Helen's. It had been joined by the Dutch fleet, the whole force amounting to ninety sail of the line. Russell was in command on board the Britannia. A scene took place in that flag-ship which is happily without a subsequent parallel in English history. A dispatch had arrived from Nottingham, the secretary of state, which Russell was commanded to read to the commanders of the fleet. In his cabin there were men whose names are inscribed among the great naval heroes of our land—Sir George Rooke, Sir Cloudesley Shovel. Such true hearts could have little suspected that he who read to them the magnanimous resolve of the queen was most obnoxious to its covert reproach. Nottingham said, in her majesty's name, that a report was spread abroad that some of the officers of her fleet were not hearty in their service, and that she had ordered many of them to be discharged. She further said that she believed the report was raised by the enemies of the government—that she retained an entire confidence in their fidelity and zeal for the service of the crown and the defence of the country, and was resolved not to displace any one. Then, with one accord, an address to the queen was signed—Russell probably not signing as being too exalted for suspicion to attach to him. It was an address, not cold and formal, but full of the devotion of the heart, concluding in these earnest words, "And that God Almighty may preserve your majesty's most sacred person, direct your counsels, and prosper your arms by sea and land against your majesty's enemies, let all the people say Amen, with your majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects."* There was no time for the enthusiasm of that hour to cool. On the afternoon of that day the French fleet, under Tourville, was seen from the coast of Dorsetshire. On the 17th the English and Dutch fleets were at sea. Tourville had with him only his own squadron, having sailed from Brest, and in his passage to Cape La Hogue had come within view of Portland. Off La Hogue the French transports were receiving troops. Tourville was to convoy this fleet of the invaders. On the morning of the 19th the two fleets came in sight of each other. Tourville immediately bore down upon an armament more than double his number. The wind was favorable to him, and only half of the ships of the allies could come into action. The defection upon which he relied was nowhere to be seen. To vindicate their honor, the commanders of the English fleet urged their men with a zeal that made them invincible, and Russell even told the sailors of the ships that he visited, to throw over any commander that played false, himself not excepted. Carter, Rear-Admiral of the Blue—who is said to have disclosed that overtures had been made to him from the Jacobites—broke the French line at the onset, was mortally wounded, and dying exclaimed, "Fight the ship as long as she can swim." The battle lasted five hours, when the wind changed, and the whole force of the allies was brought together. The victory was complete, the French flying in every direction to their own shores. Tourville's ship, the Royal Sun, the finest vessel of that day, got to Cherbourg, with two other three-deckers. There were no docks at that time to afford security. The great men-of-war were hauled into the shoals. Admiral Delaval attacked them with his fire-ships and his boats' crews, and the pride of the French navy and the two other vessels were burned to the water's edge. Tourville, during the chase, had shifted his flag to the Ambitious, and with twelve other large ships had got into the Bay of La Hogue. Here he lay, under forts and batteries, with the army of James close at hand, and the flags of England and France flying on one of the forts, for James himself was within. On the 23d of May Admiral Rooke led a flotilla of two hundred boats and numerous fire-ships into the bay. The huge vessels fired with little effect. There was a cannonade from the batteries and volleys of musketry from the shore; but on came the rowers, with the old battle-shout. The boats' crews of Tourville fled in confusion. The crews of the French ships abandoning them, the English sailors boarded and set them on fire. At eight the next morning again came Rooke into the bay with his terrible flotilla. The remaining vessels were in like manner burned, after their guns had been turned against the French batteries. "The defeat," says the biographer of James, "was too considerable to be redressed, and too afflicting to be looked upon, nor was it even safe to do it long."†

Saint Simon, mentioning that "the King of England" looked on at this battle from the shore, says, "He was accused of letting some words escape him of partiality in favor of his nation, although none had made good the promises upon which he had counted when he had urged a naval battle." Tourville, says the same authority, had sent two couriers to Louis to represent the extreme danger of relying upon the assurances of James as to the probable good will of the English commanders, and his confidence in the defection of more than half the fleet during an action. Evelyn writes in his Diary of the 5th of June, "Reports of an invasion were very hot, and alarmed the city, court, and people." On the 15th he writes, "After all our apprehensions of being invaded, and doubts of our success by sea, it pleased God to give us a great naval victory, to the utter ruin of the French fleet." The success was recognized by a temporary act of national gratitude, in a distribution of thirty-seven thousand pounds among the sailors, and in the bestowal of gold medals upon the officers. A more permanent demonstration of the feelings called forth by the victory of La Hogue was a declaration by the queen, that the royal palace of Greenwich should become what we now look upon with patriotic pride—the noble asylum for the disabled "mariners of England."

When the news of La Hogue reached the great supporter of James the French army was besieging Namur. The army of the allies, under the command of William, was encamped in the neighborhood. The French general, Luxemburg, with an overwhelming force, prevented any near advance for the relief of the besieged. Louis himself conducted the siege. "The fortified and threatening hill" looks over a "watery glade" of exquisite beauty;* but in the early summer of 1692 the Sambre had overflowed its banks; and the besiegers had to contend with other difficulties than those created by the science of Cohorn, the engineer of the States-General, who was in the citadel. Vauban, the great engineer of France, was in the lines with Louis. The magnificent monarch so far relaxed the rigor of his wonted etiquette as to permit Vauban to dine with him; at which distinction, says Saint Simon, Vauban was overwhelmed. It was a time when the presence of the monarch was of some importance. Boileau describes the king, with the basest adulation of a venal muse, as directing the siege:

"C'est Jupiter en personne."

Saint Simon shows him doing some service in a sensible human fashion, when it rained in torrents, and the trenches were full of mud and water. The soldiers were cursing Saint Médard; for that saint, like his brother of our calendar, was held to be in a rainy humor for forty days if he willed it to rain on his festival day, the 8th of June. Louis, who always travelled with a vast troop of idle lackeys and fine gentlemen of his household, commanded them to work in carrying corn to the army of Luxemburg. The roads were impassable for wagons, and the household troops and fine gentlemen were commanded to bear sacks of grain to the starving soldiers on the cruppers of their horses. Bitterly they complained; but the king would be obeyed. Without his presence, says Saint Simon, the siege would never have been successful. The besiegers were in extremity for want of provisions. Unfortunately Cohorn was wounded. The Governor of Namur and the garrison lost heart, and the town was first surrendered and afterward the citadel.

During the siege of Namur the army of William had often a distinct view of the operations of the French army. On the 1st of June the English were encamped at Ville, on the Mehaigne. The low grounds on each side of the river were so flooded by incessant rains that it was impracticable to cross, so as to attack the enemy on the opposite side. On the 5th the rains had destroyed most of the bridges over the Mehaigne. "I scarce see what we have to do here," writes one in the camp. On the 8th the allied army and the army of Luxemburg were each moving on opposite banks of the river. On the 13th the French army had drawn nearer to Namur, and William continued to follow their movements.† Namur surrendered on the 30th. "The king's conduct," says Burnet, "was on this occasion much censured; it was said he ought to have put much to hazard, rather than suffer such a place to have been taken in his sight." Boileau concludes his ode with a taunt to the enemies of France—"Go to Liège and Brussels, to carry the humble news of Namur taken under your eyes." Louis returned to Paris with his long train of carriages filled with ladies of the court—his poets, his comedians, and the musicians—"according to the old Persian luxury." William remained to watch Luxemburg, and to fight if opportunity offered. In the middle of July the allied camp was at Genappe. Three prisoners had been brought thither from Bois-le-duc, accused of a design to assassinate William. Their movements had been watched for some time. Burnet had made it known that M. Morel, of Berne, who had been incarcerated in the Bastile for seven years on refusing to renounce his Protestantism, and had been released in April, had written to him that he had been out of curiosity to St. Germains to see King James; and that returning in a public conveyance he met with a man named Grandval, whom he had observed in secret conversation with the exiled king. Grandval was very communicative, and said there was a design in hand that would confound all Europe—the Prince of Orange would not live a month. Various other circumstances had led to the arrest of Grandval and two men that he had associated in his enterprise, Dumont, a Walloon, and the Baron de Leefdale, a Dutchman. These two accomplices of Grandval had no desire to carry through the project to which they had agreed. They gave warnings that there was a plot to remove William by assassination. Leefdale came with Grandval from Paris to the Netherlands. Dumont, having previously told something of what he knew to the Duke of Zell, at Hanover, set out to meet Grandval. When apprehended, and brought to the camp at Genappe, a court-martial of general officers commenced sitting on the 23d of July, for the trial of Bartholomew de Liniere, Sieur de Grandval. The examination of the prisoner had been taken, and the witnesses were about to be confronted with him, when "greater matters intervening put a stop to the process of Grandval."*

The "greater matters" were the sudden determination of William to attack Luxemburg, and the disastrous issue of the enterprise. The French army was encamped between Enghien and Steinkirk, a few miles to the north-west of Hal. The headquarters of William's army were at Lambecque. Luxemburg had an agent in the allied camp who gave him information of the movements of the forces opposed to him—a secretary of the Elector of Bavaria, named Millevoix. A letter from this man was accidentally picked up and carried to the elector. His correspondence was discovered; and William, with remarkable presence of mind, took advantage of the discovery, not by hanging the traitor, but by making his treachery serviceable. He dictated a letter of false intelligence to the terrified Millevoix, in which Luxemburg was informed that the English would come the next day toward the French army to forage, and that a portion of the army would be at hand to protect the foragers. At dawn on the morning of the 3d of August the whole force of the allies was marching toward Steinkirk. Luxemburg was incredulous of the news which his scouts brought him, for he relied upon the informant in whom he thoroughly trusted. He at last roused himself. The nature of the ground was in his favor. The march had been tedious, for there were defiles to pass, and the country was inclosed. The Duke of Würtemberg led the vanguard, and drove the advanced brigade of the French from hedge to hedge. But Luxemburg, with the rapidity of genius, had soon the main body of his army in order of battle. The affair was no longer a surprise. We have before us an unpublished letter written by Marshal Conway in 1774, on the occasion of a visit to this battle-field: "From Oudenarde and Enghien by Grammont the road lies through a beautiful country. Near the former we took horses to go and see the ground of the famous battle of Steinkirk, where King William took such good measures to surprise Marshal Luxemburg; but by the activity and quickness of that able antagonist failed in his project, and was repulsed after a long and bloody engagement. The ground here remains, by all accounts, just as it was at that time, now eighty-two years ago."† As the ground was eighty-two years after the battle, we may readily conclude that another term of eighty-two years has made no very material change. Commerce has not here created new towns, though a railway may cut through the hedges and span the hollow ways, where the allied cavalry could not act, and the vanguard began to engage, while the main body of infantry was at some distance. Count Solmes, who was chief in command of the English, sent his horse to their relief; but, says a great military critic, "what signified his marching the horse, where the ground was so strait, and the French had such a nation of hedges, and copses, and ditches, and felled trees laid, this way and that, to cover them." * The eloquent corporal truly describes how five English regiments were cut to pieces; "and so had the English life-guards too, had it not been for some regiments upon the right, who marched up boldly to their relief, and received the enemy's fire in their faces, before any one of their own platoons discharged a musket." These brave fellows were led by Auverquerque. They saved the English life-guards; but they could not save the infantry, who had been left without support. Mackay, their brave leader, fell in the desperate conflict. The blame of this great reverse was imputed to Count Solmes, who had probably to bear the mistakes of others as well as his own. It is clear that the nature of the ground was not perfectly understood, and that the panic to be produced by a sudden attack was too confidently relied upon. William made every effort to bring up his men to relieve the vanguard; but Luxemburg was now reinforced by Boufflers, who heard the firing, and marched from his neighboring quarters. The king, it is said, looked upon the slaughter, and exclaimed, "Oh, my poor English, how are they abandoned." On each side there were about seven thousand killed and wounded. The allies marched from the field of battle in good order, to the camp from which they had unfortunately gone forth, as they believed, to victory. The nation was dispirited. The army was indignant that Solmes, a foreigner, should have been placed in the command of English troops, and then look on while they were slaughtered. In the House of Commons, three months after, the public voice found an indignant vent. That house now fully exercised the right from which it has never since parted, of seeking occasion freely to comment upon warlike operations—sometimes unjustly, often ignorantly, but never without advantage to the discovery of truth. On the 22d of November these words were heard in the house: "None are ignorant of the melancholy story of Steinkirk; every one knows that tragedy. The common soldiers had no opinion of their officers. I move," added Sir Peter Colleton, "that none but natives should command Englishmen." Sir Edward Seymour asked, "What number have you fit for general officers? They are few; and will you think to discharge and send away foreigners till you have generals of your own?" There can be no doubt that during the long vassalage of the Stuarts to France, England had lost all the qualities of a military nation, except the best quality, the spirit of her people—the blood and bone of those who fought in her ranks. She wanted scientific as well as brave leaders, bred in her own bosom. Seymour truly said, "Men are not born generals." There were in the House of Commons at that time, as there have been ever since, officers of rank, who came from active service in the field to the senate, and said honestly what they knew. Lord Colchester, who commanded the third troop of horse-guards, was one of these. He told his story simply and clearly; and his relation confirms the ordinary historical accounts in all essentials: "I find the business of Steinkirk stick with some gentlemen. The chief occasion of the ill-success there was the wrong information given to the king of the ground we were to pass, which was so full of hedges and woods that we could not draw up one body to sustain another; horse and foot were mingled. I saw the attack made by Fagel; Dutch, English, and all nations: they beat the French from hedge to hedge, but their very weight of men bore us down. The French came upon us, and Auverquerque came up, and behaved himself as well as any man in the world. He sent us two Danish regiments, and we retreated to the main body, and from thence to the main camp." † The anger of the house centred upon Solmes. "When this attack was formed," said Colonel Cornwall, "Solmes was there, with ten battalions to sustain them. Solmes said, 'That to send more was to slaughter more.'" The king withdrew his countenance from the obnoxious general, who had offended by his haughtiness as well as by his conduct in the battle of Steinkirk. He fell in a second unfortunate battle in the coming year.

The court-martial on Grandval was reopened in a week after the battle. Two of the generals of whom it was originally composed had fallen in the field—Mackay and Lanier. The duty of the court was not very embarrassing; for the prisoner had made a circumstantial confession, "without any constraint or pain, or being in irons." So says the official relation of the court-martial. He declared that the late French minister, Louvois, had in 1691 entered into an agreement with Anthony Dumont about the murder of King William; that upon the death of Louvois the design dropped, but that Barbesieux, the son of Louvois, who succeeded him as secretary of state to the French king, revived the project, and had several conferences with him, Grandval; that he was engaged in the affair with Colonel Parker, in the service of King James; and that with him, Barbesieux and Dumont, the plan was arranged, which was that he should shoot William, when he exposed himself during the campaign. Leefdale was then brought into the scheme. The most material averment of the prisoner was that he had seen James at St. Germains, his queen being present, and that James said, "Parker has given me an account of the business; if you and the other officers do me this service, you shall never want." Grandval was executed in the camp at Hal, according to his sentence. He declared in a letter to a friend that it cost him his life for having obeyed the orders of Barbesieux. The confession of Grandval was printed and circulated in several languages. No answer was made to its circumstantial statements, vouched for by ten distinguished officers of various nations who composed the court-martial.

The king returned to England on the 18th of October. The outward signs of a cordial welcome awaited him. There were illuminations as he passed through London to Kensington. There was a loyal address from the corporation of London; and the king dined at Guildhall on the lord mayor's day. There was a solemn thanksgiving for his safe return, and for the great victory at sea. But there were many symptoms of political and social distempers which made sober men uneasy. In September the queen had issued two proclamations—one for the discovery of seditious libellers, the other for the apprehension of highwaymen. The one proclamation was far more effective than the other. The libellers worked their secret presses, and the furious zealots circulated their productions without any material injury to the government. The people grumbled a little more under the pressure of taxation, and under other evils of their daily life, when they read inflammatory pamphlets from Jacobites and nonjurors; but a return to the times before the revolution was the farthest from their wishes. There was a good deal of alarm in that autumn of 1692, from the daring crimes that sometimes seem epidemic in a nation. Hence the proclamation against highwaymen. We have mentioned a robbery of the tax-collectors in Hertfordshire.* Similar gangs of banditti robbed mails and stage-coaches even in the day-time. William on his return took strong measures to put down these enormities. Many highwaymen were discovered and executed, and a regiment of dragoons was used as a preventive police, and patrolled all the great roads leading to the capital. Burglars were almost as bold and as numerous as footpads and highwaymen. We doubt whether there was any especial distress connected with this particular juncture; though it is said that there was a failure of the harvest—that the heavy rains had been fatal to the crops—that no fruit ripened—that the price of the quarter of wheat doubled. † Evelyn indeed writes in his Diary of the 1st of October, "This season was so exceedingly cold, by reason of a long and tempestuous north-east wind, that this usually pleasant month was very uncomfortable. No fruit ripened kindly." But he says nothing of a bad harvest in England. He says, "France is in the utmost misery and poverty for the want of corn and subsistence." The harvest of 1692 is represented as plentiful, so that England was exporting corn. ‡ Nevertheless there can be no doubt that among a people who had not previously borne such heavy burdens of taxation as four years of war had imposed upon them—and whose industry was not sufficiently developed to enable them to bear their burdens without being weighed down—there must have been much suffering and more discontent.

The king opened the parliament on the 4th of November. He thanked them for their large supplies; he would be compelled to ask for a further supply to maintain a force by sea and land. He was sensible how heavy this charge was upon his people. It afflicted him to learn that it was not possible to be avoided without exposing the kingdom to inevitable ruin and destruction. He hoped for their advice and assistance, which had never failed him. The House of Commons set about giving its advice; but it did little more than display a good deal of ill-humor as to the conduct of the war. There were several important matters bearing upon the future condition of the country, arising out of the proceedings of this session, which we shall briefly notice.

Turning over the index of the ponderous statute-book, to look for acts that have had a permanent influence on the condition of the country, we might perhaps pass over one act that bears this lengthy title: "An act for granting to their majesties certain rates and duties of excise upon beer, ale, and other liquors for securing certain recompenses and advantages in the said act mentioned, to such persons as shall voluntarily advance the sum of ten hundred thousand pounds toward carrying on the war against France." * Under this statute commenced the national debt of England. The million of money which was to supply a portion of the expenses of the war "in a manner that would be least grievous," as the preamble says, was expected to be voluntarily advanced on the credit of the special provision of the new duties of excise, which were to be set apart as they were paid into the exchequer. The ten hundred thousand pounds were speedily subscribed; for the industry of the people had created capital which was seeking employment, although they had been far more heavily taxed during four years than at any previous period. Louis, although he was familiar with the system of loans, was somewhat amazed at the comparative ease with which taxes were raised and a million of money borrowed in England upon the credit of the taxes. He is said to have exclaimed, "My little cousin the Prince of Orange is fixed in the saddle; no matter; the last louis-d'or must carry it."† This was really a just view of the premises of success, though the great king's conclusions were fallacious. The people of England were in a far better condition than the people of France to fight on without expending all to the last louis-d'or. The working and accumulating middle class was far more powerful in the one nation than in the other. There can be no doubt that the means first created by the act of 1693 for the investment of superfluous capital have largely contributed to the progressive development of the national resources. There can be no doubt, on the other hand, that the facilities of borrowing by the creation of stock have often led to extravagant expenditure in wars that have averted no real danger nor secured any public advantage.

There can be nothing more true than the assertion of Mr. Ricardo that "there cannot be a greater security for the continuance of peace than the imposing on ministers the necessity of applying to the people for the taxes to support a war." He has further observed, speaking the language of common-sense, which is the language of all true political economy, that "the burdens of a war are undoubtedly great during its continuance, but at its termination they cease altogether. When the pressure of war is felt at once, without mitigation, we shall be less disposed wantonly to engage in an expensive contest, and if engaged in it, we shall be sooner disposed to get out of it, unless it be a contest for some great national interest."‡ Although the statesmen and the people of the reign of William III. felt that the war against the preponderance of France, and the consequent subjection of England, was for a great national interest, they also felt that the burden could not be borne in the existing state of the country without resort to the system of loans. In the case before us they did not contemplate a permanent loan. In the next year, when the Bank of England was established upon the condition of lending a sum of money to the government, of which the principal could not be demanded by the lenders, though the borrowers had the privilege of paying it off, a permanent debt was begun to be contracted. The system of borrowing went on for three years, till at the peace of Ryswick the debt amounted to twenty-one millions and a half. Nevertheless, so strong was the objection to the continuance of that system that, although engaged in a most expensive war for five years after the accession of Anne, the debt was reduced to sixteen millions. In half a century more it had increased to seventy-five millions. It was then the received opinion of financiers that if it ever reached a hundred millions the nation must become bankrupt.

When we look at the one million borrowed on life annuities in 1693, and the eight hundred and three millions constituting the public debt of the United Kingdom in 1858, we may be amazed at the vast amount of the burden which has been gradually accumulating, but we also can now distinctly perceive how that burden has been borne. It has not weighed down the country, because all the material resources of the country have been increasing with it. The increasing wealth—of which this vast debt owing by the nation to the nation is a symbol—produced by the incessant applications of capital and labor, of science and invention, has increased the ability of the great body of the people to participate in the advantages to be derived from a ready and secure investment of their savings, with the condition that the sum so invested might be easily transferable. To this cause may be attributed the ease with which the government of that day could obtain loans by the creation of public funds at a fixed rate of interest, chiefly upon annuities. That facility shows the growing importance of the trading class, who most readily lent their surplus capital. Money, also, was no longer hoarded by those who had no means of employing it commercially; although, for a considerable period, there were vast numbers who had not sufficient confidence in the government to lend. The time was far distant when there would be three hundred thousand persons receiving dividends upon stock, and when one million three hundred and forty thousand persons would also lend their small accumulations through the agency of savings banks. The country was steadily growing more prosperous, as the national debt went on increasing to six times the amount at the period when inevitable bankruptcy was predicted. It was six hundred millions at the peace of Amiens. The eighteenth century, deficient as it was in many social improvements which we now command, was a period of rapid progress in agriculture and manufactures; and with this progress came a greater command of food and clothing, better dwellings, less frequent and less fatal epidemics for the great bulk of the people. The loan of 1693 has furnished data for a remarkable inquiry into the prolongation of life in the eighteenth century, consequent upon the better condition and therefore improved health of the population. That loan was a tontine. Every contributor of 100*l.* might name a life, to receive a fixed dividend during the duration of that life. As the annuitants dropped, their shares of the dividends were also to be divided among the survivors, till the whole number of annuitants was reduced to seven. In 1790, during the ministry of Mr. Pitt, another tontine was negotiated. The comparative results, as exhibiting the probable duration of life at the two periods, have been worked out by Mr. Finlaison, upon the assumption that the 438 females and 594 males named in 1693, and the 3974 females and 4197 males named in 1790, were the youngest and the healthiest lives that the shareholders could select. Taking the dates at which the annuities of 1693 fell in, and estimating those of 1790 that had fallen or were still remaining in 1851, the calculation showed that in 1790 the expectation of life had increased one fourth.*

In 1692 "An act for continuing certain laws that are expired and near expiring" was passed, in which the act of Charles II., continued by that of James II., "for preventing abuses in printing seditious, treasonable, and unlicensed books and pamphlets, and for regulating printing and printing-presses," then about to expire, was continued to the 13th of February, 1692, and to the end of the next session of parliament. If that renewed act should expire, the press, exempted from the superintendence of a licenser, would to a great extent be freed; its real freedom would depend upon the law of libel and its honest application. The licenser of the Stuarts, Sir Roger L'Estrange, was ejected from his office at the revolution. "His sting is gone," says John Dunton. That worthy chronicler of publishers and authors sketches the characters of the successors of the Tory licenser, saying, very libellously, "he would wink at unlicensed books if the printer's wife" kept up to the example of too many wives of that age. He describes Mr. Fraser "commonly called Catalogue Fraser, from his skill in books;" Dr. Midgley, "no bigot;" Mr. Heron, with "an air of pleasantness in his countenance;" and "our last licenser, before the act of printing expired, Edmund Bohun, Esqre.," "a furious man against dissenters," and "a pretty author himself."* Edmund Bohun brought his own house down over his head. He carried his party feeling into his official occupation, but had very strange notions which his party would not avow. He was bitterly attacked by a writer of very questionable notoriety, Charles Blount; and was more effectually damaged by a scheme of the same person "to ensnare and ruin him."† Blount wrote a pamphlet, which Bohun readily licensed—for it rested the rights of the sovereigns of the revolution upon a principle which would confer upon them absolute power. On the 22d of January complaint was made to the Commons that a pamphlet, entitled "King William and Queen Mary Conquerors, contained matter of dangerous consequence to their majesties, to the liberties of the subject, and to the peace of the kingdom." The house examined the matter, ordered the pamphlet to be burned by the common hangman, and prayed the crown to remove from his office Mr. Edmund Bohun, the licenser, who had suffered the pamphlet to be printed. With the removal of this licenser the system of licensing came to an end. The act for regulating printing expired. The house was in a libel-burning mood, with regard to the same description of offence: "Dr. Burnet, Bishop of Salisbury's book burnt by the hangman, for an expression of the king's title by conquest, on a complaint of Joseph Howe, a member of parliament—little better than a madman."‡ Some were for impeaching the bishop. The pastoral letter in which the doctrine was held was written in 1689. There could be no impeachment, for there had been an act of grace in 1690. The House of Commons has never failed to rejoice in any exhibition of the power of some member to make a bad joke. At the cry of "Burn it, burn it," the book was sent to the flames at Charing Cross.

There were two attempts made in this session to produce what may be called a reform in parliament. The Commons passed a bill excluding all placemen from sitting in the house who should be elected after February, 1693. Men holding office of every kind, civil and military, were in parliament. It was unwisely proposed to exclude all persons who should in future hold office under the crown. It was prudently determined by the sitting members not to exclude themselves. They passed no "Self-denying ordinance." The Lords rejected this measure by a very small majority. A bill providing that the existing parliament should end on the first of January, 1694, and that no parliament should in future sit more than three years, was introduced to the House of Lords by Shrewsbury, who represented the Whigs. It passed both houses. On the last day of the session the king rejected the measure, in the words of Norman French which would now be the most fatal words ever spoken by a sovereign. The constitution has worked itself clear of such contending powers. The use of the veto was not then thought "an exercise of prerogative which no ordinary circumstances can reconcile either with prudence or a constitutional administration of government."§ The bill for triennial parliaments was passed in the next year, without opposition from the crown. The most memorable circumstance connected with the bill which William rejected was, that having asked the advice of Sir William Temple, that advice, to pass the bill, was communicated to the king by the humble friend of the retired statesman, his secretary, Jonathan Swift.

Slightly connected with the political transactions of the beginning of 1693 was a tragical event that occasioned great public scandal. "After five days' trial and extraordinary contest, the Lord Mohun was acquitted by the Lords of the murder of Mountfort, the player, notwithstanding the judges, from the pregnant witnesses of the fact, had declared him guilty. But whether in consideration of his youth, being not eighteen years old, though exceeding dissolute, or upon whatever other reason—the king himself present some part, and satisfied, as they report, that he was culpable—sixty-nine acquitted him, only fourteen condemned him."‖ The people cried out that when blood was shed by the great there was no justice for the poor. Members of the House of Commons rejoiced that, in the last session, they had so strenuously opposed an extension of the privileges of the Peers, who thus sheltered one of their own guilty members. William Mountfort, the player, according to Colley Cibber, was in tragedy the most affecting lover; in comedy he gave the truest life to the fine gentleman. In 1694 he was in his thirty-third year—"tall, well-made, fair, and of an agreeable aspect." Nine years before he was patronized by Jeffries, when at the height of his power; and at a lord mayor's feast the jovial chancellor made Mountfort "plead before him in a feigned cause, in which he aped all the great lawyers of the age in their tone of voice, and in their action and gesture of body"—very much to the scandal of Sir John Reresby, who records the fact. This accomplished actor was the favorite of the town. But Mrs. Anne Bracegirdle was "the darling of the theatre." She was "the universal passion," but she admitted no favorite. Among the rakes and fops who frequented the one theatre that now enjoyed the monopoly of the drama, it was a fashion "to have a taste of tendre for Mrs. Bracegirdle."* Among those who toasted this lively brunette over their bumpers of claret were a Captain Hill, and his friend and admirer, the debauched young peer. The captain had addressed the actress in terms which she rejected with contempt. He became jealous, and his jealousy fixed upon Mountfort; for Hill had writhed at seeing the handsome actor in love-scenes, when the lady smiled upon her admirer with all the semblance of real passion. Hill, with the assistance of his noble friend, determined to carry off Mrs. Bracegirdle. They also determined to have no more trouble with the presumptuous player. They forced the actress into a coach as she was coming out of a house with her mother; but she was rescued, and the courtly pair departed, vowing vengeance on Mountfort. They loitered about the player's house till midnight. As he approached his home, Lord Mohun met him in Norfolk Street, entering into friendly conversation. Hill came behind, struck Mountfort on the head, and then ran him through the body. The grand jury found a true bill against Mohun and Hill for the murder. Hill escaped. The judges, at the request of Carmarthen, who presided at the trial, had given the opinion upon the case to which Evelyn alludes.

CHAPTER CXXVIII.

Ministerial changes—Preparations for the campaign—Louis and William with their armies—Louis returns to Versailles—Battle of Landen—Naval miscarriages—A ministry formed—Government by party—Preponderance of the Whigs—Financial difficulties—Establishment of the Bank of England—Expedition against Brest—Illness of the queen—Her death.

King William had closed the session of the English Parliament on the 14th of March. He had made some important changes in official appointments. Sir John Somers had been promoted to the dignity of keeper, the great seal having been so long in commission that "all people were now grown weary" of the dilatory and expensive proceedings in chancery.† Russell was removed from the command of the fleet; for, in consequence of fierce differences between him and Nottingham, the secretary of state, they could not have held office together. At this juncture Burnet notices the formation of a party "that studied to cross and defeat everything." One of the principal leaders of this party was Sir Christopher Musgrave, who "upon many critical occasions gave up some important points, for which the king found it necessary to pay him very liberally."‡ The memory of this senator has been preserved from the utter oblivion to which such patriotism is best consigned, by four lines of the great satirist of the next reign:

> "Once, we confess, beneath the patriot's cloak,
> From the crack'd bag the dropping guinea spoke,
> And jingling down the back-stairs told the crew
> Old Cato is as great a rogue as you."§

The amount of business done in this way was very considerable. The bribe at Kensington was too often found necessary to neutralize the bribe from Versailles. William grew more and more cynical and sullen under these degrading affairs of statecraft, and gladly rushed away to hunt in Holland or to fight in Belgium.

His Most Christian Majesty—"Jupiter en personne"—is again about to take the field. What privations he is now to undergo for the glory of France! He is fifty-seven years of age. He had been fifty-two years king; but his real sovereign power did not commence till the great minister, Mazarin, had closed his long career of intrigue. Then the magnificent sovereign burst forth in all the grandeur that can result from the implicit belief of one man that he is born to uncontrolled command, and that all that remains for millions of subject beings is to obey. The first maxim of government that Louis laid down was that kings are absolute lords; that all property was theirs; that the lives of their subjects were theirs also. He had the old feudal nobility of France at his feet. Their political power had burned out in the wars of La Fronde. All that was left to them were their exclusive privileges, and their capacity of grinding the occupiers of land by every variety of exaction. They had nothing in common with the great body of the people; they had no common rights to maintain; they were no longer the protectors of the vassals from a greater tyranny than their own. All the miseries of feudalism remained, with none of its security. The great lords of the soil had all become slaves of the court. They were yet, to a certain extent, brave and warlike. They fought in their embroidery at Steinkirk, as their fathers had fought in their armor at Agincourt. But their reckless gallantry had no higher principle for its support than that of the liveried menial whose bravery is founded upon the arrogance and ostentation of his master. Their adulation of their grand monarque was in some respects a trade. He was the fountain of all honor and all preferment; the grosser their flatteries the more certain their rewards. He was the sun that imparted life to all within its sphere. Where that sun did not shine, there was one universal thick darkness. But where did it not shine? It was the great central power that vivified all France. The sun rose upon France when the chief valet went forth from the royal bedchamber and said, "The king is awake." Then the princes of the blood, and the dukes and counts who were waiting in the antechamber, enter in solemn state, with the pages of the wardrobe, who bear the surtouts and the wigs, with other inferior habiliments that majesty may condescend to wear. As the sublime operations of shaving and hand-washing go forward, those who have the privilege of "la première entrée" gather round to behold how the Phœbus of France is gradually unfolding its beams. As that sun becomes more and more brilliant, "les grandes entrées" take placé, and marshals and bishops look on with humble adoration while a duke hands Louis his shirt, and a marquis assists him to pull on his stockings. The waistcoat, the coat, the blue ribbon, and the sword complete the courtly investiture of this more than mortal, who stands in the relation of Providence to France.* Such was the morning opening of the terrible routine day of Versailles—of its dreary etiquettes—its heartless splendors—its odious profligacies—the absolute king himself the merest slave of the artificial life which he enforced as the basis of his power. From such a monotony the king of France is about to seek relief in once more looking upon the pomp and circumstance of war. He departs from Versailles with his vast cavalcade of ladies, of cooks and valets, of actors and musicians. He puts himself at the head of the army of Boufflers, while Luxemburg with another army is near at hand.

On the 24th of March William left London to embark at Harwich. The wind was contrary, and he returned for a few days to Kensington. The court life of that suburban residence is as striking a contrast to the court life of Versailles as the little villa is insignificant itself when compared with the proud palace of the French king. The Kensington which William bought of Lord Nottingham was then surrounded with only twenty-six acres of plantations and gardens—"a patched building," says Evelyn. Another observer of the time says, "The walks and grass are very fine." Queen Mary directed the laying out of the gardens, and William rejoiced to watch the growth of the evergreens in which he delighted. It was a seat well suited for a king of simple tastes. Versailles was well suited for an ostentatious king, who counted it among his great works to have expended ten millions in subjugating nature by art—building a vast palace and creating magnificent gardens in a desert of sand and swamp.* A few days' quiet, and William is again hurrying with small retinue to the Hague. He has, as usual, to unite the discordant members of the confederacy, to soothe the rivalries of princes who each wanted some supreme command, to tempt some with money, some with promised honors. At the beginning of June Louis was with the army of Boufflers, who had taken up a position at Gembloux. The ladies of the court were left in safety within the walls of Namur. The other army commanded by Luxemburg was only half a league distant from that of Boufflers. William had intrenched himself near Louvain. He had thus posted himself to prevent an advance of the French upon Liège or upon Brussels. However inferior in numbers, he was resolved to hazard a battle if the enemy should advance. He took no sanguine view of his situation when such a mighty force was so near, having a perfect command of supplies. St. Simon, who was serving in this campaign as a captain of cavalry, says of William, "We have since known that he wrote several times to his intimate friend, the Prince de Vaudemont, that he was lost—that he could only escape by a miracle." Luxemburg urged Louis to advance. To the astonishment of the French armies the king announced his determination, on the 8th of June, to return to Versailles, and to send part of the great force into Germany. St. Simon attributes this resolution to the remembrance of the tears which Madame de Maintenon had shed at their parting, and to the letters in which she urged the return of her royal lover or husband. The same shrewd witness of what was clearly regarded as pusillanimity in the great king, describes the bursts of laughter among friends, the sneers, the whispered indignation, which even the most extravagant loyalty could not suppress. Louis retraced his steps to Namur, and on the 25th of June he arrived with his ladies at Versailles.

Boufflers had left the army of the Netherlands with the detached force sent to the Rhine. Luxemburg was now in the sole command of the French army, which was still superior to that of William. But this ablest of the generals of Louis by his skilful manœuvres contrived to weaken William's force. William had learned that Luxemburg was advancing to lay siege to Liège, and he determined to detach a large body to assist in its defence, leaving his own intrenched camp near Louvain, and marching with his remaining fifty thousand men to a favorable position on the River Gette. The feint of Luxemburg was successful. He suddenly turned from the road to Liège, and on the 28th of July William was aware that he had been deceived, and that the enemy was coming fast upon him with a greatly superior army. He would not retreat. All that could be done was to strengthen his position. In one night of incessant labor intrenchments had been thrown up, redoubts had been constructed, the hedges and mud walls of the two villages which the allies occupied had been converted into barricades. "It is incredible," says St. Simon, "that in so few hours such an extent of regular defences could have been created." On the morning of the 29th of July their value was to be tested.

When Luxemburg suddenly changed his apparent determination to move upon Liège, he ordered the fascines to be burned, with which each battalion had been provided for the siege. By a rapid march of eight leagues he had reached a plain within hearing of the multitudinous sounds of William's camp. All the night these noises were heard, and "we began to fear," says St. Simon, "that the enemy was about to retreat." The sun had scarcely risen when the batteries of the allied army gave effectual proof that no flight was meditated. The French artillery could not be brought up till an hour afterward. "We then began to see," says St. Simon, "that the affair would be difficult." The allies occupied the heights, and the two villages of Neerwinden and of Bas-Landen, one on the right and the other on the left. A long intrenchment, on the high ground, connected one village with the other. As the French cavalry advanced, the batteries from their commanding intrenchment did great execution. The great struggle was for the possession of these villages, especially of Neerwinden. The French infantry attacked with the impetuosity of their nation, and they were repulsed by the English characteristic obstinacy. At Neerwinden their general,

* De Tocqueville says of the centralizing system, "The French government having thus assumed the place of Providence."

* St. Simon.

Montchevreul, was killed, and the young Duke of Berwick was taken prisoner. The French cavalry endeavored to force the intrenchments, and were suffered to approach within pistol-shot of the allied infantry, when, says St. Simon, "the enemy gave such a well-directed volley that the horse wheeled round, and retired faster than they came." During four hours had this struggle been carried on. Twice had the French infantry been repulsed, and thrice the French cavalry. St. Simon relates how Luxemburg called the princes of the blood and his fellow-marshals to a conference at a spot out of reach of the cannon of the allies, and there for half an hour earnestly debated what course should be adopted, under the circumstances of such obstinate resistance. A third time it was resolved to attack Neerwinden, but with such an overwhelming force as should carry the victory, if victory were to be won. The household troops of Louis, headed by the Prince of Conti, attacked with irresistible fury. When they had carried the walled gardens and cleared the intrenched street, the carbineers and the cavalry poured in. The allies began to retreat as the French gained possession of Neerwinden, from the top of whose clock-tower the curé of the village looked down upon the terrible struggle. Suddenly William appeared at the head of his English guards; and the famous household troops of France, "until now invincible," says St. Simon, gave way before him. But all was in vain. The intrenchments of the main line could not be adequately defended, while the brunt of the conflict had to be borne in the two villages on the extreme right and left. The line was broken; a retreat was necessary; but it was not a disorderly retreat. William, according to the sober narrative of St. Simon, fought to the last, and he with the elector of Bavaria passed over the bridge which the allies had constructed over the Gette, when he saw that there was no reasonable hope in a further contest. A more enthusiastic relation thus paints the king: "Gallant mortal! This moment, now that all is lost, I see him, galloping across me, corporal, to the left, to bring up the remains of the English horse along with him to support the right, and tear the laurel from Luxemburg's brows, if yet 'tis possible—I see him, with the knot of his scarf just shot off, infusing fresh spirit into poor Galway's regiment—riding along the line—then wheeling about, and charging Conti at the head of it—Brave, brave, by Heaven! cried my uncle Toby—he deserves a crown." It is the fire of genius which thus lights up the traditions of Sterne's boyhood. The daring of William "when all was lost," was not "to tear the laurel from Luxemburg's brow," but to cover the retreat of his scattered forces, as they had to cross the temporary bridges, or plunge into the fords and climb the steep banks of the Gette. The exhausted victors remained upon the ground they had won. There had been twelve hours of fighting. Twenty thousand of both armies fell in that terrible battle-field, which the French call Neerwinden and the English call Landen. The victory of Luxemburg had no direct results. The retreat of William involved no greater disaster. He was not a fortunate general, but no one could deny his courage and his indomitable energy. He was one of those who possess the rare faculty of considering no misfortune, however severe, to be irretrievable. On the night of the battle he wrote a note to his friend Portland, in which he says, "These are great trials, which God has been pleased to send me in quick succession. I must try to submit to his pleasure without murmuring, and to deserve his anger less." In three weeks he had gathered all his forces around him at Brussels. The detachment that had been unfortunately sent to Liège had joined the headquarters in safety. The crisis, William said, had been terrible; but he thanked God it had ended no worse. The only successful result of the campaign in which Louis took the field with a hundred and forty thousand men, to sweep the allies from the Netherlands, was the taking of Charleroy, to which siege William offered no opposition. The biographer of James pours out his complaints that the court of France had not availed itself of the advantages gained over the allies, especially "at the famous battle of Landen," to be zealous in the matter of his restoration to the crown of England; "for there never was greater hopes of terrifying the English into their duty than at this time." His Most Christian Majesty did not avail himself of the favorable occasion. James had published a declaration in April, which promised all sorts of good things to his rebellious subjects, in which promises no one confided. The dream so long indulged of "terrifying the English into their duty" was the last hope; and that was doomed to disappointment. The French, says the biographer of James, "began to be so weary of the war, and were indeed so terrified themselves by the great scarcity which happened that year, that his Most Christian Majesty thought fit to make offers of peace, by mediation of the crown of Denmark." He adds, "It is not improbable but when the English saw the French so disheartened after such mighty advantages, that it allayed their apprehensions of the king's being forced upon them, and consequently their endeavors of restoring him themselves." *

During the absence of the king, England had undergone other disasters besides that of Landen. She saw the operation of the allies unsuccessful in every quarter. The French army which had been detached from Gembloux crossed the Rhine, and enabled another French force to take Heidelberg, and repeat the ravages which had previously disgraced their arms in the Palatinate. Catalonia was invaded, and the fortress of Rosas was taken by the French. The Duke of Savoy sustained a memorable defeat at Marsiglia. Worst of all, through the mismanagement of naval affairs, the rich Smyrna fleet of English and Dutch merchantmen, which was to be convoyed by English and Dutch men-of-war, was intercepted by Tourville, and captured, destroyed, or scattered. In the utter want of correct intelligence, the English admirals, Killigrew and Delaval, had thought the squadron safe when they had sailed to a certain point beyond Ushant; for they believed that Tourville was in Brest harbor. He had come out, and had joined the Toulon fleet. Rooke, against his remonstrances, was left with a very inadequate force, and the other admirals sailed homeward, ready to avert any attempt upon the English coasts. Off Cape St. Vincent Rooke learned that a French fleet was in the Bay of Lagos. He soon found himself in presence of an enemy of four times his strength. The Dutch fought bravely, while Rooke made all speed with part of his unfortunate convoy to Madeira. The loss to the mercantile interest of England and Holland was enormous. The suffering merchants of London sent a deputation to the queen, to pray for inquiry into the cause of this misfortune; and Mary's conciliatory reply disarmed some portion of the anger of the people. It was a time of great excitement. Violent pamphlets against the government were scattered abroad from secret presses. A printer named William Anderson was indicted for high treason, was convicted, and was executed. It requires a rather violent stretch of historical partisanship to affirm that such a conviction was legal, although the tracts inculcated a general insurrection, and the nation was exhorted to free itself from its tyrant. There was no proof of the printing of these tracts at the press of Anderson beyond what resulted from a comparison of the impressions of the types used with the types seized on his premises. Even if the proof of printing had been complete, we may conclude that there is "much danger in the construction which draws printed libels, unconnected with any conspiracy, within the pale of treason, and especially the treason of compassing the king's death, unless where they directly tended to his assassination." † The punishment of Anderson only increased the virulence of the Jacobite pamphleteers, as must ever be the case when extreme punishments are resorted to as the readiest means of prevention for political offences. The hanging of Anderson in London, and the torturing of Nevil Payne in Edinburgh, ‡ did more injury to the cause of William than the defeats of Steinkirk or Landen. He came to put down the injustice and cruelty of arbitrary power; and yet, said his enemies, with some truth, tyranny still walks abroad under the mask of freedom.

At the beginning of November William was again at Kensington. The parliament was to meet on the 7th. A great change in the administrative system of England was about to take place. The king for five years had endeavored to govern by choosing his ministers from each of the two great parties of the state; sometimes giving the preponderance to the Whigs, at other times to the Tories. These ministers carried on the public affairs of their several departments without very well defined principles of action, amid personal hatreds and jealousies which were too often highly injurious to the national interests. An experiment was now to be made to substitute for this individual direction of public affairs the administration of a party.

* "Life of James II.," vol. ii. p. 516.

† Hallam, "Constitutional History," chap. xv.

‡ We omitted to mention (ante, p. 645) that the warrant for the torture of Nevil Payne bears William's signature; a mere formal act, perhaps, but one which attaches obloquy to his memory.

The heads of departments were to be united by some common consent upon political principles. "Party divisions," says Burke, "whether on the whole operating for good or evil, are things inseparable from free government." He held it to be a duty for public men "to act in party," with all the moderation consistent with vigor and fervency of spirit,*—a duty not very easy at any time, and almost impossible in the earlier stages of representative government, when all were going through a sort of education in constitutional principles. William was about to change some of his ministers; at the same time to select new advisers from those who would "act in party;" who would submit their own wills to a general agreement; who would constitute what we now understand as a ministry, whose possession of power under the authority of the sovereign, and with the command of a parliamentary majority, implied the superior influence of the general principles which constituted their bond of political union. William had become convinced that he could best carry on his government through the party which had mainly accomplished the revolution. He would not compose his administration exclusively of Whigs, but there should be such a preponderance of those who held Whig principles that the Tory party, so closely bordering upon the Jacobite party, should be neutralized in what we may now call a cabinet. The functions of the privy council had become merged in the cabinet council. In a debate in 1692, on advice given to the king, one member exclaimed, "Cabinet council is not a word to be found in our law-books. We knew it not before. We took it for a nickname."† Another member described what the cabinet was: "The method is this: things are concerted in the cabinet, and brought and put upon them for their assent, without showing any of the reasons. That has not been the method of England. If this method be, you will never know who gives advice."‡ The objectors to a cabinet desired that every counsellor should, in the acts of council, set his hand to assent or dissent. This was to secure individual responsibility for evil measures—a responsibility which has vanished in the united responsibility of a ministry. However strong was the parliamentary jealousy of a cabinet, the exclusion of the privy council from the real business of the state became more and more established in the reign of William. But the jealousy remained. In a clause of the statute of the 12 & 13 William III., "for the further limitation of the crown," it was enacted that "all matters and things relating to the well-government of the kingdom, which are properly cognizable in the privy council, by the laws and customs of this realm, shall be transacted there." This was a prospective clause, to take effect after the succession contemplated by the act. It was repealed by the 4 & 5 of Anne, c. 20, where the clause is recited.§ To make the supreme administration of affairs—the questions of armaments that required profound secrecy, and of diplomacy whose success depended upon ministerial reserve — "properly cognizable in the privy council," has been impossible even if it had been salutary, since the power and influence of England gradually assumed the extension and proportions which began to characterize her policy subsequent to the revolution. As representative government gradually compelled the sovereign to choose an administration founded upon the preponderance of a party, so this administration by party gradually broke up that unseemly division of the servants of the crown into factions, which was occasionally manifested until the middle of the eighteenth century.

The Earl of Sunderland had become a confidential adviser of King William. "By his long experience," says Burnet, "and his knowledge of men and things, he had gained an ascendency over him, and had more credit with him than any Englishman ever had."‖ Sunderland's "knowledge of men and things" had been acquired in a long course of shaping his opinions by his conviction of what he thought the most expedient and profitable system for his own advancement and security. He had publicly supported the most tyrannous actions of James, however he might have secretly opposed some of them. To please his master he had declared himself a papist. To make himself safe in the revolution which he saw at hand, he had betrayed that master. He vanished from the scene of active politics when William became king, retired to Holland, and again declared himself a Protestant. He was excluded from William's act of grace as one of the chief instruments of the late tyranny. But he came back to England, and made himself a necessity for the new government. He had cut off all hope of being reconciled to the Jacobite party; he could be very useful to the party of the revolution. "His long experience" made him master of all the complications of political action. He was the representative in 1693 of that class of unprincipled politicians of which Talleyrand was the representative when the Bourbons were restored to France. His advice was not to be despised, however the man might be odious. Speaker Onslow, in his Notes upon Burnet, says, "I remember to have heard from a great personage, that when the Earl of Sunderland came afterward to be in King William's confidence, and pressed him very much to trust and rely more upon the Whigs than he had done, the king said he believed the Whigs loved him best, but they did not love monarchy; and though the Tories did not like him so well as the others, yet, as they were zealous for monarchy, he thought they would serve his government best. To which the earl replied, that it was very true that the Tories were better friends to monarchy than the Whigs were, but then his majesty was to consider that he was not their monarch."* Sunderland, out of his knowledge of men and things, knew that the republican party had ceased to exist; and William saw that Sunderland's distinction between the affection for monarchy, and the love of the monarch de facto, was a sound one. William did trust and rely more upon the Whigs than he had done. Somers had been made his keeper of the great seal; the choice was wise. The attorney's son had rendered the highest service in that great crisis which was to establish the government of England upon the basis of law. He was the leader of his party, as much by his moderation as by his eloquence and learning. Russell, who had more than once been tempted to betray the government he served, but when the hour of trial came did his duty to his country, was restored to the command of the fleet. Thomas Wharton, the son of a Puritan peer, had led a life of dissipation in the time of Charles the Second, and continued his course of profligacy under the sober régime of William. The man was hated, and yet he was popular. The hate with which he was regarded by the Tories was perhaps the result of his political consistency. When he died, a Tory wrote his elegy:

> "Farewell, old bully of these impious times, > True pattern of the Whigs, and of their crimes."†

With Somers, Russell, and Wharton was joined, in William's new ministry, Charles Montague. He had cast off the honors of a second-rate poet to become a first-class politician. His parliamentary eloquence was almost unrivalled. His financial abilities were more necessary to a government conducting a most expensive war even than his eloquence. One more Whig was to be won, and he was Shrewsbury. He resigned the office of secretary of state in 1690, when William favored the Tories. He had been tampered with from St. Germains, and was faithless to his trust. But he had seen his error, and was now to be called back by William to a hearty allegiance. The seals were again offered to Shrewsbury. The king had a personal regard for him; but he refused to accept the office which Nottingham had relinquished. Before the meeting of parliament a lady wrote to him, by the king's command: "He assured me," says her letter, "that when he valued anybody as he did you, he could easily forget some mistakes."‡ Again Shrewsbury refused office. A female friend of this lady wrote to the coy earl, hinting that a dukedom would be the reward of his compliance. The ladies persevered for several months, and at last Shrewsbury yielded, and had his dukedom and the Garter. The chief female negotiator on the part of the king was Mrs. Villiers—one whom the scandal of the time regards as his mistress—one of whom Burnet makes no direct mention, but to whom he is supposed to have alluded when he says of the Prince of Orange and Mary, in 1686, that "the perfect union between them had of late been a little embroiled." maid of honor to the Princess of Orange—afterward married to the Earl of Orkney—was a woman of remarkable ability, with whom Swift delighted to talk for hours; who, in 1713, gave the great writer her picture; but who was not formed for the usual female conquests, however great her mental powers. "I think," writes Swift to Stella, "the devil was in it the other day when I talked to her of an ugly squinting cousin of hers, and the poor lady herself, you know, squints like a dragon." *

The king and his new ministers did not shrink from demanding from the parliament a larger supply than ever for carrying on the war. Eighty-three thousand troops were voted for the service of 1694; and the naval estimates were also largely increased. The Whig majority in the House of Commons was strong enough to bear down all unreasonable opposition. There were violent debates on the naval miscarriages, but no blame was thrown on the conduct of the late disastrous campaign. How to raise the large sums necessary to maintain the land and sea forces was a matter of anxious discussion. A land-tax, a poll-tax, stamp-duties, a tax on hackney-coaches, and a lottery, were the expedients. High and low were the adventurers in this new system of state gambling, as Evelyn records: "In the lottery set up after the Venetian manner by Mr. Neale, Sir R. Haddock, one of the commissioners of the navy, had the greatest lot, 3000*l.*; my coachman 40*l.*" But money was still wanting. The necessity gave birth to one of the greatest public establishments of this or any other country, the Bank of England.

The statute under which this national institution was formed bears a very ambiguous title: "An act for granting to their majesties several rates and duties upon tonnage of ships and vessels, and upon beer, ale, and other liquors, for securing certain recompenses and advantages in the said act mentioned, to such persons as shall voluntarily advance the sum of fifteen hundred thousand pounds toward the carrying on the war against France." † The subscribers for the advance of a loan, upon the conditions set forth, were to be constituted a corporate body "by the name of the Governor and Company of the Bank of England." The money really required to be advanced was twelve hundred thousand pounds. ‡ The subscription list was filled in ten days. The trading community had been sufficiently prepared for a right appreciation of the project which was carried in the House of Commons by the energy of Montague. The scheme of a bank had been the subject of discussion for three years. William Paterson—a man whose name is associated with this most successful scheme of a great national bank for England, and with another most unfortunate project of a great national system of colonization for Scotland—had in 1691 submitted proposals to the government somewhat similar to the plan which was carried out in 1694. His scheme was ably supported among commercial men by Michael Godfrey, an eminent London merchant; and when the government at last adopted it, Godfrey's influence in the city was as useful as Montague's eloquence in parliament. The original plan of a national bank was met by every sort of objection. Some said it was a new thing, and they did not understand it. Others said the project came from Holland, and there were too many Dutch things already. § In 1694 "the men who were supposed to have most money opposed and appeared against it [the bank] with all their might, pretending it could not do without them, and they were resolved never to be concerned. ‖ Tories said that a bank and a monarchy could not exist together. Whigs said that a bank and liberty were incompatible, for that the crown would command the wealth of the bank. A clause was introduced in the act, which prevented the Bank of England making loans to the government without authority of parliament, which neutralized the Whig objection. With this restriction the Bank of England has yet, in all times, been a powerful ally of the government. The system of small loans came to an end, as thus described in a paper called "The Wednesday Club," written by Paterson himself, as his biographer affirms: "The state officers and privy counsellors of that time were brought to stoop so low as to become frequent solicitors to the common council of London, to borrow only 100,000*l.* or 200,000*l.* at a time, on the part payment of the land-tax, all payable within two years, and then to stipulate and receive guineas at 22*s.* per piece, besides still further securing allowances on such occasions, which one may suppose to have been considerable. As the state officers deigned to become suitors to the common council, so were the particular common councilmen to the inhabitants of their respective wards, going from house to house, as our parish officers do in case of briefs for fire, for building and repairing churches, or the like." *

The king prorogued the parliament on the 25th of April, and again set out for the continent at the beginning of May. The campaign was in no degree remarkable for its gains or its losses. But the French had been arrested in their march to European dominion. They were held at bay. The naval plan of warfare was vigorously conceived in the cabinet of William, but it was defeated by what was once thought accident, but which is now proved to have been treachery. A great French fleet under Tourville had sailed from Brest to the Mediterranean. A portion of the allied fleet of English and Dutch under Russell was to look after Tourville, and another portion, under Berkeley, was to form a secret expedition. Troops commanded by Talmash were taken on board Berkeley's squadron. The two admirals parted company west of Cape Finisterre. Russell sailed to the Mediterranean; Berkeley to Brest, which it was supposed was left without adequate defence. Berkeley and Talmash would not credit the report of their own officer, that the French were prepared for their reception. Eight English vessels entered Camaret Bay, and were received with the fire of many batteries. Talmash attempted to land his soldiers from boats, when strong bodies of cavalry and infantry appeared on the beach, and drove them back in confusion. The cannon of the fortifications that had been constructed in a few weeks swept away more than a thousand brave English. Talmash himself was mortally wounded, but lived to reach Portsmouth, whither the armament had returned in all haste. The discomfiture was caused by the purpose of the expedition having become known to the French government. Vauban had been sent to Brest, and his science and promptitude had soon defended the entrance from the bay to the harbor with bombs and cannon, placed in the most commanding positions. William at the end of June wrote to Shrewsbury from the camp of Roseback, "You may easily conceive my vexation when I learned the repulse our troops had experienced in the descent near Brest; and although the loss is very inconsiderable, yet in war it is always mortifying to undertake anything that does not succeed." † A few days later the king wrote: "I am indeed extremely affected with the loss of poor Talmash; for although I do not approve of his conduct, yet I am of opinion that his too ardent zeal to distinguish himself induced him to attempt what was impracticable." ‡ It is asserted that the resolution to attack Brest was betrayed to James by Godolphin, and also by a letter from Marlborough. § Of Marlborough's treachery to his country there is the unquestionable evidence of a letter written by him to James on the 4th of May, in which he says, that it has that day come to his knowledge that the expedition preparing at Portsmouth is to be commanded by Talmash, and designed to burn the harbor of Brest, and to destroy the men-of-war that are there. He then says, "This would be a great advantage to England; but no consideration ever can or shall hinder me from letting you know what I think may be for your service." ‖ That Marlborough had in view the destruction of a rival general, Talmash, is to load his memory with a charge of guilt even more atrocious than his systematic perfidy in affairs of state. Yet he did not lose a moment in soliciting a return to high employment when Talmash was no more. In a letter of Shrewsbury to the king he says: "It is impossible to forget what is here become a very general discourse, the probability and conveniency of your majesty receiving my Lord Marlborough into your favor. He has been with me since this news, to offer his service, with all the expressions of duty and fidelity imaginable." ¶ William gave a very short answer to the recommendation of his secretary of state: "As to what you wrote in your last letter concerning Lord Marlborough, I can say no more than that I do not think it for the good of my service to entrust him with the command of my troops." * The failure at Brest was attempted to be retrieved by miserable expeditions against defenceless towns on the French coast. Dieppe, Havre, and Calais were bombarded. This wretched mode of attack upon an enemy's harmless people, though begun by the French, was felt to be useless and exasperating —"a cruel and brutish way of making war—an action totally adverse to humanity or Christianity." †

William returned from the continent on the 9th of November. He had to learn, what is as damaging to a government as an unsuccessful attempt in war, that a state trial under a special commission at Manchester, of some Lancashire gentlemen accused of high treason, had resulted in an acquittal. The government was set on to this prosecution by one of those dangerous spies that always start up in unquiet times, and too often foment the conspiracies they are employed to discover. Before the trial, after swords and armor had been found in old houses, and arrests had been made, this Lancashire plot was turned into ridicule. At the trial the chief informer, when his brother spy had given evidence against the prisoners, swore that the alleged plot was an invention of their own. The counsel for the crown threw up his brief; the prisoners were acquitted; and the presiding judges were hooted as they left Manchester.

The parliament was opened by the king on the 12th of November. The Commons adjourned for a week. When they met for business they applied themselves in earnest to vote the supplies, and to discuss a bill "for the more frequent meeting and calling of parliament." This is the famous Triennial Bill, which the king had rejected by his veto in one session of parliament, and which the Commons had refused to pass in another session. The bill was now passed by both houses without much opposition. On the 22d of December William came to Westminster. Great was the anxiety to know what words would now be uttered by the officer who spoke that voice of the crown which confirmed or disallowed a measure of the two houses. The words uttered were the old form of assent, "Le roy et la royne le veulent." The king looked unhappy, but it was not a disquietude of state which moved him. Queen Mary was dangerously ill at Kensington.

"The small-pox raged this winter about London," writes Burnet. To comprehend at this time the significance of the word "raged," we must carry our minds back, far beyond the period when Jenner discovered vaccination—beyond even the period when Lady Mary Wortley Montague made inoculation fashionable. When Burnet adds that "thousands" were dying of this fatal disease, we must understand him literally. When the small-pox entered a house, it was considered as terrible a visitation as the plague. William went sorrowfully from the parliament house to Kensington. Mary had been ill two days. She had never had the small-pox; but her regular physicians disputed about the symptoms. Ratcliffe, the most skilful "in all early and quick discovery of a distemper"—but, "proud of his fame in his profession, which fed his natural haughtiness, and made him think himself above, and refuse the attending of the highest personages when he had taken any prejudice against them"—declined at first to attend the queen when he was sent for.‡ He came at last, and pronounced the fatal word "small-pox." William was in despair. "He called me," says Burnet, "into his closet, and gave a free vent to a most tender passion. He burst out into tears, and cried out that there was no hope of the queen, and that from being the happiest, he was now going to be the miserablest creature on earth. He said, during the whole course of their marriage he had never known one single fault in her; there was a worth in her that nobody knew besides himself." Mary's fortitude and resignation were above all praise. The religious consolations which her faithful friend and counsellor, Archbishop Tillotson, would have administered to the dying queen were to be bestowed by his successor, Tenison. Tillotson had died five weeks before. When Tenison made Mary aware of her danger, but with "some address not to surprise her too much," she was perfectly calm. "She thanked God she had always carried this in her mind, that nothing was to be left to the last hour." Queen Mary died on the 28th of December, in the thirty-third year of her age. All parties agreed in acknowledging the beauties of her character. Burnet, the Whig, says, "She was the most universally lamented princess, and deserved the best to be so, of any in our age, or in our history." Evelyn, the Tory, writes, "She was such an admirable women, abating for taking the crown without a more due apology, as does, if possible, outdo the renowned Queen Elizabeth." She had many arduous duties to perform in the repeated absences of the king; and not the least important was the distribution of ecclesiastical preferments. With a deep sense of religion she marked her preference for those divines who were moderate in their opinions, and earnest in the proper discharge of their high functions. When there were state affairs to attend to, she never shrunk from the proper labors of the sovereign. Her tastes were simple and unostentatious; her morals of unblemished purity; her charity was universal. Her deep attachment to her husband was founded upon her admiration of his high qualities. William's grief for her loss "was greater," says Burnet, "than those who knew him best thought his temper was capable of; he went beyond all bounds in it. When she died his spirits sunk so low that there was great reason to apprehend that he was following her." Queen Mary was sumptuously interred in Westminster Abbey, although, "on opening a cabinet, a paper was found, wherein she had desired that her body might not be opened, nor any extraordinary expense at her funeral, whenever she should die: this paper was not found in time to be observed."* The funeral cost fifty thousand pounds. A more worthy expenditure of public money in her honor took place when William determined to erect Greenwich Hospital, in compliance with that desire which she had expressed after the battle of La Hogue, to provide an asylum for disabled seamen. Mary, in following the fortunes of her husband, and accepting with him the sovereign power of these kingdoms to the exclusion of her father, discharged a higher duty even than that of filial affection. But she was always solicitous for that father's personal safety. The paltriness of James's character was manifested upon his daughter's decease, in a manner which St. Simon thus records: "The king of England [James] prayed the king [Louis] that the court should not wear mourning. All those who were related to the Prince of Orange, including M. de Bouillon and M. de Duras, were forbidden to wear it. They obeyed and were silent; but this sort of revenge was considered very petty."

CHAPTER CXXIX.

Extreme grief of William—Parliamentary corruption—War in the Netherlands—Siege of Namur by the allies—Namur taken—William's reception in England—State of the currency—A new parliament—Measures for a new coinage—Trials for treason regulated by law—The assassination plot.

The death of the queen appears to have prostrated William. Shrewsbury could hardly approach him, till a month after, in consequence of "the retired manner his majesty has lived in since his last great misfortune." † His "former application to business" had not yet returned with the healing power of strenuous occupation. His political correspondence with the grand pensionary of Holland was suspended. The general before whom he retreated at Landen was no more; the strange life of Luxemburg—the crook-backed voluptuary who appeared to have no higher object than sensual ease, but who on the battle-field was all fire and decision—came to an end. Louis thought that William would rejoice. William heeded not this important event, and expressed his belief that he himself was no longer fit for military command. The French court sent Harlay, the president of the parliament of Paris, to sound the Dutch as to the possibility of a peace. Pale and very thin was the envoy. Are you a sample, said the rough republicans, of the wretched condition of France? Let me send for my wife, replied the clever lawyer, and she will give you a notion of our thriving state.‡ Harlay, who had no accredited mission, did not put the Dutch in good humor by his joke. There was still to be a struggle before peace was established.

William gradually recovered his serenity. The houses of parliament went on as usual with their labors. The proposed renewal of the Licensing Act was rejected without a division in the Commons. The press had been more than commonly bold, even seditious. But the representatives of the English people did not choose to interfere with that noble principle which, half a century before, had been proclaimed to all the civilized world by the most eloquent of freedom's advocates: "Though all the winds of doctrine were let loose to play upon the earth so truth be in the field, we do injuriously, by licensing and prohibiting, to misdoubt her strength. Let her and falsehood grapple. Whoever knew truth put to the worse in a free and open encounter?" *

The proceedings of this session disclosed, what was no secret to men of all parties, the frightful corruption by which statesmen in power and statesmen in opposition were moved to support or to resist some measure in which large pecuniary interests were involved; or to screen some public delinquent. Guy, a member of parliament and secretary of the treasury, was sent to the Tower for receiving a bribe, in connection with some inquiries into the conduct of a colonel of a regiment, who had appropriated the money for which he ought to have paid the quarters of his troops. Trevor, the speaker of the House of Commons, was proved to have received a bribe of a thousand guineas from the corporation of London, for assisting in passing "An act for relief of the orphans and other creditors of the city of London" †—that act under which, when a poor man buys a sack of coals in this winter of 1858, he has still to pay a tax to this long-tolerated phantom of a departed greatness. Trevor had to put the question from the chair whether he himself was guilty of a high crime and misdemeanor, and had to say, "The ayes have it." He was expelled the house. The East India Company had spent a hundred and seven thousand pounds in secret service money, as an examination of their books had proved to a parliamentary committee. Eighty-seven thousand pounds had thus been distributed in 1693 and 1694. Sir Thomas Cook, the chairman of the company, had the management of these delicate matters. He was member for Colchester. In his place in parliament he refused to answer inquiries. The Commons then passed a bill compelling him to answer, under enormous penalties. Upon the bill going to the upper house, the Duke of Leeds—the Earl of Danby of Charles II., the Marquis of Carmarthen of 1689—spoke strongly against the bill, and, laying his hand on his breast, protested that he was perfectly disinterested in the matter. The inquiries went on, implicating others; and the Commons finally impeached Thomas, Duke of Leeds, president of the council, for that he did, "in breach of the great trust reposed in him, by himself, his agents, or servants, corruptly and illegally treat, contract, and agree, with the merchants trading to the East Indies, for five thousand five hundred guineas, to procure their charter of confirmation." ‡ The duke had appeared at the bar of the house, and had to a certain extent acknowledged his delinquency, by admitting that he had helped a friend to get the money. That friend was one Bales, who admitted that he had received the money to bribe the duke, and had given it to a Swiss, who was the confidential manager of the duke's private business. The Swiss fled; the parliament was prorogued; and the impeachment fell to the ground. The king's personal friend, Portland, was found to have been proof against these temptations, having refused a bribe of fifty thousand pounds.

The king was no doubt rejoiced to get away from this tainted atmosphere to the bracing air of a campaign. He was first reconciled to the Princess Anne, and then departed for the continent; having, when he prorogued the parliament on the 3d of May, said, "I will take care to place the administration of affairs, during my absence, in such persons on whose care and fidelity I can entirely depend." The Duke of Leeds was not one of those persons. Burnet, writing in the reign of Queen Anne, says of the princess, "Now that he [William] was to go beyond sea, she was not set at the head of the councils, nor was there any care taken to oblige those about her." § The bishop no doubt alludes to Marlborough and his duchess; and adds, "this looks either like jealousy and distrust, or a coldness toward her." Lord Dartmouth, in a note upon this passage, says, "The princess was not only next to him in succession, but there was a party which might have made a claim for her against him. She was a very good woman, and not likely of herself to give in to it. But she was not of the strongest understanding, and always influenced by others, who might have found their account in it." Marlborough took the more prudent course. Shrewsbury writes to Russell that the Princess Anne has lost no opportunity of showing her zeal to the king and the government; and that "our friend" [Marlborough] seemed resolved to encourage this union. "I do not see," adds Shrewsbury, "that he is likely at present to get much by it, not having yet kissed the king's hand, but his reversion is very fair and great." * The energy and perseverance of William were at length to be crowned with success. It was a real advantage to him that Luxemburg was gone. It was a greater advantage that Louis had appointed as his successor an accomplished courtier but a feeble general, Villeroy, and that this sycophant of the great king intrusted an important command to the Duke de Maine, the most favored of the illegitimate children of Louis. But the numbers and the high discipline of the French armies would have probably interfered with any signal advantage on the part of the allies, if William had not exercised in this campiagn many of the highest qualities of a great commander. The opening of the campaign, says St. Simon, was a beautiful game of chess; the Prince of Orange, the Elector of Bavaria, and the Earl of Athlone moving in detached bodies; and Villeroy, Boufflers, Harcourt, and Montal, regulating their own movements by those of their enemy which they saw, or by those which they expected. William, "who had well taken all his measures to cover his main design," suddenly turned his course toward Namur. The Elector of Bavaria and the Brandenburg army arrived at the same point. That strongest fort of Europe was invested by this united force at the beginning of July. Vauban had materially strengthened the fortifications since it had been taken by the French. The court of Louis thought William's attempt a rash one, and that it would signally fail. "I was of another opinion," writes St. Simon; "I persuaded myself that a man of the sagacity of the Prince of Orange would not commence so important a siege without well seeing how he was to come out of it." William's movement had been so admirably planned and rapidly accomplished that Boufflers had scarcely time to reinforce the garrison of Namur, and to take the command of the fifteen thousand men who were now within the walls. Villeroy expected to destroy that part of the allied army under Vaudemont which remained in Flanders, and then to relieve Namur. Vaudemont, by consummate prudence—aided by the incompetence and cowardice of the Duke de Maine—effected a retreat to Ghent. Villeroy took two small fortresses, Dixmuyde and Deynse, sending their garrisons into France in violation of a convention for exchange of prisoners. He bombarded Brussels, effecting a tremendous destruction of private property, "in reprisal," says St. Simon, "of the attacks on our coasts." He then marched with eighty thousand men to attack the besieging army at Namur; but Vaudemont had joined his force to that already on the banks of the Meuse and Sambre. Meanwhile the siege had proceeded with a vigor almost unparalleled. The letters of William himself furnish the best materials for tracing the progress of the siege, without perplexing ourselves or our readers with "the differences and distinctions between the scarp and counterscarp, the glacis and covered way, the half-moon and ravelin," with which "my uncle Toby did ofttimes puzzle his visitors and sometimes himself too." † In a letter to Shrewsbury on the 17th of June the king imparts his design of besieging Namur, "a very great undertaking—God grant that it may succeed." ‡ On the 1st of July he says, "This night we propose to open the trenches at the gate of St. Nicholas." On the 9th the English, Scotch, and Dutch battalions carried the lines "which the enemy had constructed to cover their works." On the 18th William writes, "Affairs here go on tolerably well, though not as expeditiously as I could wish. Yesterday we made our lodgment in the counterscarp, and I now flatter myself that we shall soon be masters of the town. I cannot sufficiently applaud the firmness and valor of the troops. It is very grievous to lose so many brave men, but it cannot be avoided in a siege like this." § It was on this occasion that William exclaimed to the Elector of Bavaria, who stood by his side, "See my brave English! See my brave English!" On the 28th of July the king writes to his secretary of state: "Although you will doubtless have heard of the surrender of Namur before you receive this letter, yet I would not omit informing you myself that we obtained possession of this place this afternoon. The day after to-morrow we shall open the trenches before the citadel, and I hope that God will also bless this enterprise; and that we shall soon be masters of it." * On the 15th of August Portland writes to Shrewsbury: "The king having slept little last night, and been on horseback the whole day, has ordered me to tell you, sir, that it is impossible for him to write this evening. Affairs here are at a great crisis. The siege of the citadel advances rapidly; the breach begins to be practicable, and I think a little time will render us masters of it, unless the enemy succor it by gaining a battle, since they approach us with a very numerous army." The two armies, that of William and of Villeroy, stood for three days in presence of each other, while the siege was proceeding under an incessant bombardment. On the 19th of August, the French army retired. The Elector of Bavaria had the immediate charge of the siege, while the king was watching Villeroy; and when it was known that the French had moved off, the storm of the citadel of Namur commenced. Portland had summoned Boufflers to surrender upon the retirement of Villeroy, but the French commander still held out. The assault was undertaken by the Bavarians, the Dutch, the Brandenburgers, and the English. The Brandenburgers had among their leaders the Prince of Anhalt-Dessau, a young man of nineteen, who afterward had the honor of introducing important changes in military science. "He invented the iron ramrod; he invented the equal step; in fact, he is the inventor of modern military tactics." † The Dutch and Brandenburgers accomplished their duty with little difficulty. The Bavarians suffered severe loss. The English, under Cutts, were at first driven back; but their intrepid commander, though wounded, led them on again, and they carried a battery which had swept away many in its deadly fire. Two thousand men were sacrificed in this terrible assault. Boufflers demanded a truce to bury the dead. He also intimated a desire to capitulate, but asked for a delay of ten days, when he would yield if not relieved. This request was refused; another storm was threatened; but on the twentieth he agreed to surrender with the honors of war.‡ On the 26th of August the French garrison, now reduced to five thousand men, marched out. But the brave marshal was detained a prisoner. William resolved to keep him till the garrisons of Dixmuyde and Deynse should be restored. Louis sent full powers to Boufflers to comply; and he was released after ten days' detention. On the day after the surrender William wrote to Shrewsbury, to announce the capture of the citadel of Namur: "With all its circumstances it is assuredly a great event, and we cannot sufficiently offer up our thanks to God for this success, from which we shall doubtless derive considerable advantages." § On the same day Portland wrote to Shrewsbury: "The English have greatly signalized themselves in this siege, by their share in the vigorous actions which have occurred, in which they have been too much animated by the presence of the king himself. But, thank God, he is very well. The fatigue he has suffered is incredible, as well as the care and trouble he has undergone, and is able to support." ‖ When we contemplate this feeble-bodied man with the most heroic spirit, one day in the trenches, another day on horseback from morning till night, expecting a battle with Villeroy, we can understand the confidence which he had won, in spite of repeated miscarriages and disappointments. The English, who were never wanting in their estimate of personal bravery, would follow such a leader through every hazard of war. The coolness of this model of self-command was among his most valuable qualities. One day, when William was in the trenches, the deputy-governor of the Bank of England placed himself at his side. "Mr. Godfrey," said the king, "why do you expose yourself?" The Londoner replied, "Not being more exposed than your majesty, should I be excusable if I showed more concern?" William, who had an especial objection to men going beyond their commission, replied, "I am in my duty, and therefore have a more reasonable claim to preservation." A cannon-ball in a few minutes finished the career of the over-zealous amateur. But while we admire the resolution and perseverance of William, and the undaunted courage of all the troops of the allies, we must not forget that much of the success was due to the science of the engineer Coehorn, the great rival of Vauban. When Namur was taken by the French in 1692, the forts which Coehorn had constructed for its defence could not resist the besiegers. He was now to devise the most scientific means of attack upon works which he had constructed, and which Vauban had perfected. He had the gratification of seeing this place of strength pass out of the hands of the power that had held it for three years.

The return of William to England was hailed by the popular enthusiasm which naturally attends success. The good man struggling with misfortune may be the noblest sight in the world, but it calls forth no huzzas or bell-ringings. The king reached Kensington through the illuminated streets on the night of the 10th of October, and immediately went to business. A proclamation was issued for a new parliament. In a week William set forth upon a most unusual mission, to propitiate the people by showing himself among them. He visited Newmarket; was entertained by the Earl of Sunderland at Althorp, and by the Duke of Newcastle at Welbeck. He hunted in Sherwood forest, amid oaks which tradition associates with the memory of the courteous outlaw who once reigned there by the title of his long bow and his broad arrows. He looked upon those towers of Warwick, where the great king-maker gave law, at a time when the throne rested upon feudalism, and representative government was a dream. William was making this holiday tour, to incline those who had to choose representatives to send men well affected to the principles of liberty which had placed him upon the throne. At Oxford he had personally to feel that too often the seats of learning are the last to be illumined by the progressive spirit of a generation—the last to perceive that they are halting while the great body of a nation are moving onward. The record of Evelyn is quite sufficient to note this fact: "The king went a progress into the north, to show himself to the people against the elections, and was everywhere complimented, except at Oxford, where it was not as he expected; so that he hardly stopped an hour there, and having seen the theatre, did not receive the banquet proposed." The elections generally were favorable to the government. The Whig party acquired a considerable accession of strength. The taxes were heavy; the currency of the kingdom was in a frightful state of depreciation; the price of grain was unusually high—and yet the nation manifested no alarming discontent. The Jacobites plotted; but they were as far from success as ever.

Looking at the depreciated state of the coinage in 1696, it is difficult to say how far the high price of grain was the natural result of a succession of bad seasons. The years from 1692 to 1699 are known as "the seven barren years." In Scotland there was a dearth approaching to famine. Legislation might have had something to do with the high prices. A bounty upon importation was established in 1689, which might not have sufficiently stimulated production to meet the ordinary wants of the people under the extraordinary drain of the war. The average price of wheat from the restoration to 1691 was about forty-eight shillings a quarter. From 1692 to 1699 the average price was about sixty-two shillings. A very factious member of parliament, Sir John Knight, made a speech in 1694, in which he complains that corn is sent out of the country "for the use of our Dutch allies, to enable them to live cheap, by making the same dear at home." He would have shown a better knowledge of the matter if he had said that the Dutch bought the corn cheaper than the natural rate, through the bounty, and then sold it in England again at a profit. The necessity, however, for feeding the armies abroad must have had a material influence on the market. But even the needful consumption and inevitable waste of four campaigns was not wholly without some compensating good: "In Norfolk and Suffolk, and in Lincolnshire, there was a wonderful improvement in husbandry and tillage; for the war was of great advantage to the farmers, who exported corn into Holland." *

The defective state of the coinage was now to be effectually re-dressed. The evil had become insupportable. The established prescription of the gallows was found to be no remedy for the disease. In July, 1694, we read, "Many executed at London for clipping money, now done to that intolerable extent, that there was hardly any money that was worth above half the nominal value."* A writer of the period, who speaks with full knowledge of his subject, says that "the almost fatal symptoms of the general corruption of the silver money, like covered flames or distracted torrents, universally broke out upon the nation, as it were at once. Guineas on a sudden rose to thirty shillings per piece; all currency of other money was stopped: hardly any had wherewith to pay; public securities sank to about a moiety of their original value, and buyers had to be found even at these prices; no man knew what he was worth; the course of trade and correspondency almost universally stopped; the poorer sort of people plunged into inexpressible distress, and, as it were, left perishing, while even the richer had hardly wherewith to go to market for obtaining the common conveniences of life." This writer adds that "the intolerable corruption of the coin was alone sufficient to have provoked any nation on earth to extremities. . . . Nevertheless, the remainder of gratitude in the people to their deliverer, King William, was even still such, that they bore these inexpressible afflictions with an inimitable temper and patience."† It is difficult to understand these seemingly exaggerated phrases of "fatal symptoms," "inexpressible distress," "intolerable corruption of the coin," without some explanation. Those of us who lived in the latter years of George III. can recollect the time when there was not a sixpence, shilling, or half crown, in circulation, that was not worn perfectly smooth. These coins, which had originally come from the Royal Mint, were not counterfeits. They passed as counters. But their real value was not tested by their circulation in common with any new coinage. In 1695, of the various coinages of Elizabeth, of James I., and of Charles I., it was computed that five millions were in circulation, in common with about half a million of the new coinages of Charles II., James II., and William III. The old money, which had no milled edge, had been gradually clipped, so that at last the current silver coin had been diminished in weight nearly one half. Of this clipped money four millions were considered to be in circulation; while one million six hundred thousand pounds of unclipped coin were hoarded, or only appeared occasionally in remote places.‡ As fast as new silver coins were issued from the mint they disappeared. They were worth twice as much as the old clipped coin. While a single unclipped shilling was circulating in the same town with the shilling that was not intrinsically worth more than sixpence, traders would perpetually demand the honest shilling from their customers, and not being able to get it, would put a higher price upon their commodities to bear a proportion with the clipped shilling. The laborer who was paid his weekly wages in the depreciated coin could only obtain a small loaf instead of a large one. The dealer who had to make remittances in guineas, or in bills which represented guineas, was obliged to give at least thirty shillings to obtain the guinea. The money-changers and bankers were making large fortunes out of the perplexities of all those who had to sell or to buy. Evelyn grumbles that "Duncombe, not long since a mean goldsmith, had made a purchase of the late Duke of Buckingham's estate at near 90,000*l.*, and reputed to have near as much in cash:"

> "And Helmsley, once proud Buckingham's delight, > Slides to a scrivener or a city knight"§

The new parliament was opened on the 22d of November. The most important part of the king's speech was that in which he said, "I must take notice of a great difficulty we lie under at this time, by reason of the ill state of the coin, the redress of which may perhaps prove a further charge to the nation." How were these words to be interpreted? Was the nation to bear the great loss of converting four millions of money, intrinsically worth only two millions, into money of the true standard? Was the public to sustain a loss of two millions? The subject had been widely agitated. It had been proposed to issue money of less than the intrinsic value to replace the old—to make a ninepenny shilling that would pass for twelvepence. Though the great merchant, Dudley North, who was also a great political economist, opposed the plan that was ultimately carried, he saw that a coin could not be treated as if it were only a counter: "What is true may be remembered, which is, that money went to foreign markets, and would not, as at home, pass by a stamp or denomination, but must be weighty"*—must pass at its real weight. He had proclaimed the sound doctrine, "that debasing the coin is defrauding one another." Locke demolished the theory of the little shilling in a masterly tract. His opinion was, that after a certain time the old money should only pass by weight, and that upon this principle it should be exchanged for a silver coinage of which a shilling should be worth twelvepence. By this plan the state would have effected the restoration of the currency without a national cost—but at the price of what individual misery! When the House of Commons came to debate this important question, the resolutions proposed by Montague, the chancellor of the exchequer, were finally agreed to. A new coinage of intrinsic value was to be issued; the loss of the clipped money was to be borne by the public, for which a special fund was to be provided by a house-tax and a window-tax. This was something like a revival of the hearth-money, but cottages were exempt. Up to the 4th of May the clipped money would be received in payment of taxes. The old money had then mostly disappeared; but the mechanical resources of that time were not sufficient to produce the new money in sufficient quantity to carry on the exchanges of the people. The difficulty was in some measure relieved by the issue of exchequer-bills. The difficulty was conquered when Newton was appointed master of the mint, and by vast exertions, connected with the establishment of provincial mints, gradually sent forth a supply of circulating medium equal to the demand. The distress and confusion had been enormous; but those who had thought the great change was ill-managed, at last said, "Better and worse in the means is not to be reflected upon, when a great good is obtained in the end."†

On the day on which the royal assent was given to the Recoinage Bill, the bill "for regulating trials in cases of treason and misprision of treason" also became law. This salutary measure had been repeatedly lost by the opposition of the Commons to a clause introduced by the Peers, with reference to trials of members of their own order.‡ The Commons no longer opposed the wishes of the upper house. One of the most important of the clauses of this statute, by which some of the injustice of the old modes of trial was obviated was, that prisoners should be admitted to make their defence by counsel learned in the law. History has properly recorded the effect produced by Anthony Ashley Cooper, Lord Ashley, the author of the "Characteristics," in his maiden speech in the Commons. When he rose to speak, he hesitated, looked bewildered, was still silent amid the encouraging cheers of the house, and at last said, "If I, sir, who rise only to give my opinion on the bill now depending, am so confounded that I am unable to express the least of what I proposed to say, what must the condition of that man be, who, without any assistance, is pleading for his life, and under apprehensions of being deprived of it?" We need not ask whether this stroke of genius was premeditated. Very soon after the meeting of parliament an unpleasant question arose which affected the popularity of the king. The Commons, though the factious hostility to William had greatly abated, came to a resolution to mark their dislike of some token of lavish favor which he had shown to his Dutch friends. He had ordered a grant to the Earl of Portland of a magnificent estate in Denbighshire, being a part of the hereditary domain of the crown. A sensible address was carried unanimously, in which William was told that the manors now intended to be granted had been usually annexed to the principality of Wales, and settled on the Princes of Wales for their support; and that such grant was in diminution of the honor and interest of the crown. The king answered the Commons who went up with the address, "Gentlemen, I have a kindness for my Lord Portland, which he has deserved of me by loving and faithful services; but I should not have given him these lands if I had imagined the House of Commons could have been concerned. I will therefore recall the grant, and find some other way of showing my favor to him." It was well that a constitutional king should learn a lesson which had never been taught to the Stuarts, when they alienated the domains of the crown for the endowment of their minions and of their illegitimate children.

On the 24th of February the king went to the House of Peers, and told the assembled Lords and Commons that he was come that day upon an extraordinary occasion: "I have received several concurring informations of a design to assassinate me; and that our enemies at the same time are very forward in their preparation for a sudden invasion of this kingdom." He had given orders, he said, regarding the fleet; he had sent for troops home; some of the conspirators were already in custody, and measures were taken for the apprehension of the rest. The houses immediately determined upon a joint address to the king; carried a bill for the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act; and passed another bill that the parliament should not be dissolved by the death of William. It was then resolved in the Commons that the members should enter into an association, testifying and declaring "that his present majesty King William is rightful and lawful king of these realms," and pledging themselves in the following words: "We do mutually promise to engage to stand by and assist each other to the utmost of our power, in the support and defence of his majesty's most sacred person and government, against the late King James and all his adherents. And in case his majesty come to any violent or untimely death, which God forbid, we do hereby further freely and unanimously oblige ourselves to unite, associate, and stand by each other, in revenging the same upon his enemies and their adherents, and in supporting and defending the succession of the crown, according to an act made in the first year of the reign of King William and Queen Mary, entitled 'An act declaring the rights and liberties of the subject, and settling the succession of the crown.'" A similar association was formed by the Peers. But the words "rightful and lawful king of these realms" were changed to these—"That King William hath the right by law to the crown of these realms; and that neither King James nor the pretended Prince of Wales, nor any other person, hath any right whatsoever to the same." Some members of each house hesitated to sign, but they formed a small minority, and the nation generally entered with unwonted cordiality into a similar engagement. The project of the invasion of the kingdom and the concurrent assassination of the king, which thus roused the nation to rally round the throne, was a plot of no ordinary magnitude. There are ample materials for a connected narrative of this event, the most important in some respects of the reign of William; and those documents which recent years have brought to light render some aid in the solution of an interesting historical problem, Whether the atrocious scheme of assassinating his rival was suggested, or adopted, or encouraged directly or indirectly, by James himself.

The original autobiographical Memoirs of James that touch upon this interesting period have been preserved.* He tells us that having been informed at the beginning of 1696 that the affairs of the Prince of Orange did not wear so favorable an aspect as formerly—that the country party gave him trouble and vexation—his own friends, called Jacobites, thought it "a good occasion to blow the coals." These friends proposed that he should land in England with ten or twelve thousand men, when they were sure "the greatest part of the nation would rise and restore him." James communicated this "to His Most Christian Majesty," who promised the troops, but thought it would be best that these ardent Jacobites "should rise first." The narrative thus continues: "Upon this, the Duke of Berwick was sent over to head them in case they could be persuaded to rise first; and about the same time several officers, and other persons who had served, desired leave to go over into England and Scotland upon their private concerns." These "gentlemen of the guard" and others, who went over to England upon their private concerns, "had directions to join themselves with any that should rise and declare for the king, being most of them men of experience." The Duke of Berwick was the illegitimate son of James.

On the 27th of December Sir George Barclay, a Scot who had served under Dundee, received a commission from James, which, he says, in his narrative published in the Life of James, "was exactly as follows: 'James R. Our will and pleasure is and we do hereby fully authorize, strictly require, and expressly command our loving subjects to rise in arms and make war upon the Prince of Orange the usurper of our throne and all his adherents, and to seize for our use all such forts, towns, strongholds within our dominion of England, as may serve to further our interest, and to do from time to time such other acts of hostility against the Pce. of Orange and his adherents as may conduce most to our service, We judging this the properest, justest, and most effectual means of procuring our restoration and their deliverance; and we do hereby indemnify them for what they shall act in pursuance of this our royal command. Given at our court of St. Germains en Laye, the 27th of December, 1695.'" On the 27th of December Barclay says: "I parted from St. Germains, having none with me but Major Holmes, and about the 27th old style [January 6th] arrived in London." The narrative of Barclay, in some respects very important, in others very meagre, is to be satisfactorily pieced out by various evidence collected by the ministers of William. In Romney Marsh lived one Robert Hunt, who describes himself as yeoman. He had for some years "been employed by the party in all their correspondence with France." He deposed that Barclay and Holmes came over together some time in January, and about the same time sixteen or eighteen persons came over. At the beginning of February, "a tall young gentleman," who was particularly recommended by one Mr. Pigaut, at Calais, came over alone; and Hunt had heard since, and believed, this person was the Duke of Berwick. After Barclay had received the hospitalities of the smuggler's cottage in Romney Marsh, came two men in company, Harris and Hare. Harris deposed that he had served King James in Ireland as an ensign of foot, and since in France. On the 4th of January (new style) King James sent for him, and Hare his comrade; said he should send them to England; he had ordered money for that journey, and they were to follow Barclay's orders. The king then went on to say they would find Barclay every Monday and Thursday evening, between six and seven o'clock, in Covent Garden Square, and might know him by a white handkerchief hanging out of his coat pocket. Looking over a list, James added that they were to go by the names of Jenkins and Guinneys while in England. Harris and Hare met Barclay in London. They were ordered to keep close till there was an occasion for their service, and were put on a sort of establishment at five shillings a day.

We have now traced Barclay to his great scene of action, and may revert to his own official narrative. He became acquainted, soon after his arrival, with Mr. Charnock, who complained to him that he and others had a design on foot which would have facilitated the return of King James, but that his majesty would never permit them to put it in execution. Sir William Parkyns, a few days after, explained what that design was. They wanted nothing but his majesty's leave. "It was to form a party to fall upon the Prince of Orange." James, in his own Memoirs, states that in 1693 a proposal had been made to him "of seizing and bringing away the Prince of Orange, and of making a rising in and about London"—but he "would not hear of it, looking upon the project as impracticable." It was again proposed, he says, and again rejected. In 1695 it was a third time proposed by one Crosbie, alias Clench, who came from another set of men, who "made no doubt of seizing the Prince of Orange and carrying him off, but desired a warrant signed by his majesty to empower them to do it." James, as he says, rejected this matter, and charged Crosbie not to meddle in it. This very "indiscreet and insolent man," as the Memoir goes on to say, went not only to his own club, but to several of another club, "as Mr. George Porter, Goodman, Sir William Parkyns, and Charnock; engaged them to join with him; and, to gain the greater credit and reputation with them, assured them that an order would speedily be sent to him for the executing of it." When Charnock and Parkyns opened their design to Barclay "to fall upon the Prince of Orange"—something more intelligible than the delicate proposal of "seizing and bringing away the Prince of Orange"—Barclay says, "I did much approve of it, if it could be carried on with that secrecy and conduct as a thing of that consequence ought to be; upon which I immediately asked them if it was possible to find so many good men as would be requisite, and would undertake a brave action without asking of questions." They were certain of it. Upon this, the confidential agent of King James produced his commission for "acts of hostility against the Prince of Orange." He had parted with his master at St.

and so, he says, "presuming, therefore, upon the commission I had from his majesty to make war upon the Prince of Orange and all his adherents, I thought myself sufficiently authorized to engage with them to attack that prince when his guards were about him; upon which I showed them my commission, which they were much pleased with."† Barclay, says James, "proposed to attack the Prince of Orange with forty horse on the road as he went to or came from hunting at Richmond; whereas his commission imported no such thing."

In the Memoirs of James we find that "the day his majesty left St. Germains, being the 28th of February, he met at St. Denis a servant of the Duke of Berwick, with a letter from his master to the Earl of Middleton, which gave an account of his being come back. . . . By some expressions in his letter, it was plain he had not succeeded in it [his negotiation] as expected." According to the deposition of Hunt, "the tall young gentleman" who arrived at Romney Marsh at the beginning of February returned from London within a week. The transport ships of Louis were to rendezvous at Calais on the 25th of February; and on that day Louis sent a message to James to let him know that "he thought it fit his majesty should go down forthwith to the sea-side, but not to let the men embark till he was sure the Jacobites were up in England." Why did James go down to the sea-side when it was plain the Duke of Berwick had not succeeded in raising the Jacobites in England? Barclay was in London with his commission. James saw the Duke of Berwick, and heard from him in "what condition he had left things in England." And still "he continued his own journey to Calais." We hear little more in the words of James himself. The compiler of his life says, "He still hoped something might happen, on which he could raise a request to let the troops embark first, and for that reason continued his journey to Calais; where he was no sooner arrived, but, according to his usual good fortune, found himself at the end of his expectation, by meeting the news of several gentlemen being seized on account of an attempt upon the Prince of Orange's person." It was, of course, necessary for the friends of James to deny his complicity in a scheme of assassination. He himself says that he, "finding nothing more was to be done, returned to St. Germains, longing to see Sir George Barclay, to know what he could say for himself, seeing his power for levying war was in general terms only." ‡ Berwick was himself perfectly well aware how Barclay and his friends had interpreted this general power.

The incidents of the discovery of the plot for taking the life of William furnish a signal instance, in addition to other evidences in English history, of the difficulty, if not impossibility, of many persons being associated in a conspiracy of so momentous a nature without detection. Barclay says in his narrative, that he had learned that one Captain Fisher, who lived in King Street, Westminster, had made several proposals for raising men for the service of King James; that Barclay, disguised, saw him; and that Fisher proposed "to attack the Prince of Orange between the two gates as he passed from Hyde Park to St. James's Park." Barclay says that he heard this, and other proposals, but never let Fisher know of any design he had on foot; but asked him "to give me notice when the Prince of Orange went a hunting, pretending I had a mind to see him hunt." On the 11th of February Fisher was in communication with the Earl of Portland. He told him there was a design against the king's life. What details he gave are not very clear. In a subsequent deposition he said that he was introduced to Sir George Barclay by one Johnson, alias Harrison, a monk, at a public house in Bow Street, where the scheme of the attack at Hyde Park gate was proposed; and that on the 5th they discoursed about seizing the king at Kensington House in the night, by scaling the garden wall. On the 13th Fisher went again to Portland. The cautious friend of William was not forward in giving credit to such statements; or he thought it more prudent to say nothing till his information was more distinct. On the evening of the 14th Portland, on entering his lodgings at Whitehall, found an unknown person in the antechamber, who begged to speak with him in private. "My lord," he said, "persuade the king to stay at home to-morrow; for if he go abroad to hunt he will be assassinated." Portland went to the king, and persuaded him, with great difficulty, to remain at home. Barclay, in his narrative, shows that he had not been idle since he opened his commission to Charnock and Parkyns: "I was at Kensington itself, and Major Holmes with me; and everywhere else about London where that prince [William] used to go, both to know the ground, and what judgment I could make of it, in case any occasion should offer." The place fixed upon was Turnham Green. He describes this convenient spot where the king was expected to pass, as "something narrow with hedges and ditches on each hand, so that a coach and six horses cannot easily turn, at least on a sudden; and at the very entrance of the green there were some little shrubs and bushes, which would put men under some sort of cover." The king would take this road to the water-side, where he usually took boat to cross to the Surrey side of the Thames. The 15th was the day planned for the attack with blunderbusses, musketoons, and well-sharpened swords. The reluctant resolve of William to forego his hunt disconcerted the arrangement. Parkyns had provided his five men well mounted; Porter and Charnock their five each; Barclay had given money to Holmes and Charnock to buy twenty horses and their furniture; the men he had ready under pay, with a list of their lodgings.* The king stayed at home; but on the following Saturday he would be made sure of.

Between the 15th of February and the 22d another of the conspirators was closeted with Portland. His name was De la Rue. There were now three persons who had given warning of the plot. Two had furnished a somewhat circumstantial account. On the evening of the 21st the man who had exhorted Portland to warn the king to stay at home was brought before William himself. Cutts was present, in his office of captain of the guards. Portland was there also. The man was a Roman Catholic named Pendergrass. For a long time he refused to give the names of any of the conspirators. He was not threatened, but exhorted. He at last required an assurance that his evidence should not be used against any of the criminals, and William gave his word of honor that it should not be so employed except with his own consent. He then wrote down a list of names. He especially desired to screen his friend Porter; and Porter himself, though one of the foremost in the scheme, was subsequently admitted as evidence. Barclay was recommended to Porter by Charnock and Parkyns; but he hesitated about trusting him; "not," says he, "that I mistrusted his loyalty, but that I heard he was much given to drink, and open-minded." On Saturday morning, the 22d, the conspirators assembled at Porter's lodgings; Pendergrass was among the number. They were in high glee. Their spies at the palace sent word that the king would certainly hunt that day—that the coaches had gone from the Mews at Charing Cross to take him to Kew ferry; that the guards had gone to Richmond. They were taking a parting glass at the Blue Posts in Spring Gardens, before starting separately, so as not to attract attention, when Keyes, one of their number, formerly a trumpeter in the Blues, who had been in constant communication with some of his old comrades, came to say that the coaches and the guards were come back. They hurriedly dispersed. The next day twenty prisoners were arrested. Barclay escaped.

A special commission was issued for the trial of the prisoners. The first tried were Charnock, Keyes, and King, on the 11th of March. Charnock—who had been a fellow of Magdalen College, Oxford, when James took his arbitrary measures against that society, and then became its popish vice-president—was an indefatigable agent of the Jacobites. He defended himself with ability; for the act which allowed prisoners counsel, and gave them other advantages under a charge of high treason, was not to come into operation till the 25th of March. It was unjust and impolitic in the government to press on the trials under this circumstance. The convictions of the accused would unquestionably have been as certain if the privileges of counsel, of a copy of the indictment, and of a list of witnesses, had been allowed them. Their crime was proved beyond a doubt by the evidence of Pendergrass, and of their more guilty accomplices. Their executions followed quickly upon the verdict of the jury. Burnet relates that Lord Somers told him that Charnock sent an offer to the king to disclose all he knew of the consultations and designs of the Jacobites, if his life were spared, but that William "was afraid to have such a scene opened, and would not accept of this offer." According to Dalrymple, Charnock said "he would disclose the names of all those who had employed him in England, if his punishment was changed from death into perpetual imprisonment. The king generously answered, 'I desire not to know them.'" Charnock on the scaffold delivered a paper to the sheriff, in which he denied that James had authorized assassination by any commission. But in a letter to a friend he justified the assassination of such an usurper as Cromwell or as William. "He thought either of them might be treated as one would do a thief or a robber, whom it is lawful in one's own defence to attack, and kill too, if nothing else will do." He quotes the authority of Grotius, that a subject of a dispossessed prince might lawfully kill the usurper of the supreme power. We take this doctrine of Charnock from an abstract in the "Life of James;" but the right of a subject to kill an usurper is thus qualified —"that indeed he requires the legal proprietor's commission, which Mr. Charnock said they had in general terms." * The original paper in the Bodleian Library is abstracted by Lord Macaulay, who gives the following sentence from it in a note: "Nobody that believes his majesty to be lawful King of England can doubt but that in virtue of his commission to levy war against the Prince of Orange and his adherents, the setting upon his person is justifiable, as well by the laws of the land, duly interpreted and explained, as by the law of God." †

There were five other trials connected with this formidable conspiracy. Sir John Friend, a rich London trader, had not taken part in the assassination plot, although he knew of it; but he had made large preparations for assisting in a foreign invasion. Sir William Parkyns, as we have seen, was an active participator in the design to kill the king. Three other conspirators, Rookwood, Cranborne, and Lowick, were tried. They were all convicted, and all suffered the death of traitors.

The effect upon the temper of the nation of the discovery of this Jacobite plot is forcibly expressed in the "Diary" of Evelyn: "Though many did formerly pity King James' condition, this design of assassination, and bringing over a French army, alienated many of his friends, and was likely to produce a more perfect establishment of King William."

The complete discomfiture of the plans of St. Germains is thus mentioned by the compiler of the "Life of James:" "This intended attempt being thus discovered, it raised such a ferment in the nation as put an end to the king's real design of landing, by making it impossible for his friends to assemble, they having enough to do to secure themselves from the strict and universal search which this discovery occasioned." No one who looks carefully at the evidence in this affair can doubt that "the king's real design of landing" came to an end when he knew that Sir George Barclay had not been able to carry out his commission "to make war upon the Prince of Orange," by stopping that prince's coach as it was dragged through the miry and narrow lane at Turnham Green, and with his eight good men, armed with pistols and "strong pushing swords," putting to death the hated usurper who was unlawfully called King of England.

CHAPTER CXXX.

William in the Netherlands—His financial embarrassments—Great crisis of commercial difficulty—Revival of credit—The new currency established—Attainder of Sir John Fenwick—Negotiations for peace—The Peace of Ryswick—Opening of St. Paul's Cathedral—Parliament—Reduction of the army—Dangers of an insufficient force—The East India Company—Statute against Socinians—Reformation of manners—Societies for Promoting Christian Knowledge, and for the Propagation of the Gospel—Licentiousness of the Stage—Embassy to France—French embassy to England—Czar of Muscovy in England.

After these harassing events had taken their course, William departed for the continent, to encounter dangers and difficulties far more oppressive than the risks of a battle—more insupportable to such a man than any dread of the assassin's knife. He left London in the very crisis of the monetary change, and was in Holland on the 7th of May. On the 22d of May the king wrote to Shrewsbury from the Hague. He informed his secretary of state that the French army had first taken the field; that the allied troops assemble as well as they can, but find it difficult to join, as the enemy had far advanced in great force. There was another reason, he said. The troops "in Flanders are so much in want of money that they can scarcely move; and if the treasury do not find prompt means to furnish supplies, I know not how I can possibly act." * On the 25th of May Shrewsbury wrote to William in great alarm: "We discoursed this morning with several of the most eminent goldsmiths, and with some of the bank, and had the dismallest accounts from them of the state of credit in this town, and of the effect it would soon have upon all the traders in money; none of them being able to propose a remedy, except letting the parliament sit in June, and enacting the clipped money to go again, the very hope of which locks up all the gold and good money, and would be to undo all that has been done." † The lords justices, who had the charge of affairs in William's absence, were to a great extent helpless. They saw clearly what locked up all the gold and good money; but to retrace their steps would have been fatal. Their position was one of extreme difficulty. Public clamor was loud in its demand "that clipped money should be current again; that the standard should be advanced, and the price of guineas improved." Temporary aid which they expected had failed the government. An act had been passed in the previous session for establishing a national land bank—a bank which was to lend money on mortgages, and to lend also to the state. Land and trade were two rival interests. Trade, or the moneyed interest, would not subscribe any portion of the two millions and a half that were required to establish the land bank; and land was looking for aid to the new scheme, in the shape of loans, and had no cash to spare in the shape of subscriptions. The scheme utterly broke down; and, at the same time, through the difficulties connected with the recoinage, the Bank of England could not pay its notes in specie. There was one universal panic throughout the land. There was a bold issue of small exchequer-bills, of which there was considerable distrust. The Bank of England indorsed their notes with a promise to pay in the new money when it came forth, and meanwhile to pay interest at the rate of 15 per cent. Merchants and smaller traders exchanged their promissory notes. But in spite of every expedient the nation was quickly coming to the condition of semi-civilization—barter. Of all the sufferers in this crisis it is impossible to conceive a man placed in a more distressing condition than the sovereign who was to fight the battles of his country at the head of a great European confederation. "In the name of God, determine quickly to find some credit for the troops here, or we are ruined," he writes on June 4th. "We are here reduced to greater extremities than ever, for want of money; and if we do not soon receive some remittances the army will be disbanded," is his language on the 23d of July. On the 30th he says, "The letter from the lords justices has quite overcome me, and I know not where I am, since at present I see no resource which can prevent the army from mutiny or total desertion." The king then adds a most remarkable sentence: "If you cannot devise expedients to send contributions, or procure credit, all is lost, and I must go to the Indies." From such a man these words cannot be regarded as the mere impatience of disappointment. The army, whose mutiny or total desertion was imminent, stood between Louis of France and the subjugation of Holland. If Holland became a province of France, England would soon be in the same condition, with a Stuart viceroy under the conquering Bourbon. What then remained? To found a great maritime and commercial empire in the Dutch settlements—to call up the spirit of colonial freedom to balance the despotism of the old world. On the 31st the king sends Portland to England to arrange about assembling parliament: "Rather than perish all must be risked." Shrewsbury wrote a desponding answer to Portland's communications; and then William in his reply expressed that noble sentiment which every Englishman ought to bear in mind in the day of public calamity and fear, "May God relieve us from our present embarrassment, for I cannot suppose that it is his will to suffer a nation to perish which he has so often almost miraculously saved, though we have too well deserved it."* The heroic confidence of William had revived. "He was a man that knew how to meet adversity. His life had been one continued struggle with difficulties; but it had been the fixed rule of that life to encounter them with an unshaken fortitude, and a rigid adherence to what he considered to be right."† He would not "go to the Indies." The nation that God had "so often almost miraculously saved" would be saved again, even in the dire extremity of this time. It has been said with great truth, "The vessel of our commonwealth has never been so close to shipwreck as in this period."‡

On the 15th of August there was a great meeting of the general court of the Bank of England to discuss an earnest appeal that had been made to them by the king's ministers, for an advance of two hundred thousand pounds. Very reluctantly had this application been made. Shrewsbury was in despair. He wrote to the king, "A loan from the city is much doubted, by the incapacity which has appeared in many to discharge the bills which have been drawn upon them from all parts. If the application to the bank should not succeed, God knows what can be done." But he adds, "Yet anything must be tried and ventured, rather than lie down and die."§ The application to the bank did succeed. Immediate relief to the necessities of William, however small, was obtained. But he was not in a condition to carry on the campaign with any vigor. His difficulties were set forth with considerable exaggeration by the French. The Jacobites were everywhere rejoicing. But time was working that change, from temporary financial distress to growing ease and eventual relief, which is almost certain when the resources of industry are not exhausted, and the great body of the people are not alienated from a government. The embarrassments of the English had induced the Duke of Savoy to make a separate peace with France. Everywhere there were signs of a defection from the alliance of which William was the heart and soul. He came home at the beginning of October. He met the parliament on the 20th of that month. In him the indomitable resolution with which he had encountered so many adverse contingencies spoke out, when he said, "It is fit for me to acquaint you that some overtures have been made, in order to the entering upon a negotiation for a general peace; but I am sure we shall agree in opinion, that the only way of treating with France is with our swords in our hands; and that we can have no reason to expect a safe and honorable peace but by showing ourselves prepared to make a vigorous and effectual war." This was not the language of a bankrupt king; it was not addressed to a bankrupt nation. There were evident symptoms that the great difficulty of the currency was in some degree passing away. Had the government evinced the slightest disposition to recede from the measure of recoinage, to reduce the standard, to raise the denomination of the coin, the evil would never have been cured. The very first measure of the Commons was to pass this resolution—"That they would not alter the standard of the gold and silver, in fineness, weight, or denomination; and that they will make good all parliamentary funds since his majesty's accession to the crown, that have been made credits for loans from the subject." The effect of this true statesmanship, for which the honor is mainly due to Montague, was instantaneous. The expectations of those who hoarded guineas in the belief that a guinea would pass for thirty shillings—of those who hoarded crowns in the belief that what was worth five shillings would exchange for commodities at the value of seven shillings and sixpence, were at an end. The true money flowed into circulation. Trade revived. The financial and commercial crisis was past. The nation was solvent. A hundred and twenty-six years afterward, one of the ablest of English statesmen, in resisting a motion against the resumption of cash payments on the ground of agricultural distress, rested his most powerful arguments on the great historical precedent of 1696, and concluded his convincing speech by moving, in the very words of Montague's resolution, "That this house will not alter the standard of gold and silver, in fineness, weight, or denomination."* England fought through the great currency change of 1822 as England had thrown off the far heavier weight looking at the nation's comparative resources, of the change in 1696. The same spirit of the people was manifested at each crisis. A financier of the earlier period thus speaks of his contemporaries: "While our neighboring nations expected we should sink under this burden, and some were even prepared to receive us as a province, the strength of mind, constancy, and magnanimity of our people overcame it all."†

The two houses of parliament were occupied, during this session, with the extraordinary proceedings under a bill of attainder against Sir John Fenwick. The historical narratives of this event are, for the most part, as lengthy as the parliamentary debates. A very slight summary is all that we can attempt to give of an affair which has far more to do with the history of party than with the history of the nation, and of which the only thing of any real importance, after an interval of more than a century and a half, is the constitutional question of procedure by attainder.

In the deposition of Goodman, one of the witnesses for the crown in the assassination plot, he implicated Sir John Fenwick, as being, in conjunction with Friend, Parkyns, and others, in correspondence with James upon a projected invasion, and that Fenwick used to send over a list of the forces in England, and of their disposition. Porter, another of the conspirators, gave his testimony to a similar effect. Fenwick attempted to fly into France, under the assumed name of Thomas Ward; but in June he was apprehended at New Romney, in Kent. Fenwick was highly connected; he was a baronet of an ancient family. A letter which he had addressed to his wife, upon his apprehension, was intercepted. He exhorted her to make all friends. "I know nothing," he said, "can save my life, but my Lord Carlisle's going over to him [King William], backed by the rest of the family of the Howards, to beg it." In another passage he says, "I cannot think what else to say, but the great care must be the jury. If two or three could be got that would starve the rest, that or nothing can save me." Fenwick, being ordered for trial, offered to give evidence of great importance, and was visited in prison by the Duke of Devonshire, at the king's desire. In a written paper he implicated Shrewsbury and Godolphin, Marlborough and Russell, as having been in communication with James at various times. The paper was transmitted to William, who probably knew as much of these general treacheries as Fenwick could tell him. He transmitted the paper to Shrewsbury, saying, "You may judge of my astonishment at his effrontery in accusing you. . . . You will observe the sincerity of this honest man, who only accuses those in my service, and not one of his own party."‡ William was desirous that Fenwick should be brought to trial before the public affairs demanded his own return to England. There was a difficulty. Goodman had been tampered with, and could nowhere be discovered. Fenwick, in his letter to his wife, had said, "Money, I know, would do it; but alas, that is not to be had." The indefatigable aunt of the Earl of Carlisle did accomplish the means of preventing the evidence of Goodman before a jury. Two witnesses were required by law in cases of treason; one only was forthcoming. It was resolved to proceed against Fenwick by bill of attainder, in which the deficient legal evidence could be supplied by the previous deposition of Goodman before the privy council, and by the evidence of two grand-jurymen as to what he had sworn when the bill of indictment was found by them. This proceeding was altogether irregular, although the crime of Fenwick was conclusively established. The most prolonged and violent discussions therefore ensued, both in the Lords and Commons, as to the passing of this bill. In the Commons the majority for the bill was only thirty-three; in the Lords only seven. "The debates," says Burnet, "were the hottest, and held the longest, of any that I ever knew." Fenwick, previous to the bill being moved in the Commons, had been brought to the bar, and persisted in refusing to make any further confession. Lord Hardwicke, in a note on Burnet, says, "The king, before the session, had Sir J. Fenwick brought to the cabinet council, where he was present himself. But Sir John would not explain his paper."* In another note he says: "My father was told by the Duke of Newcastle that his father, the first Lord Pelham, then a lord of the treasury, and a stanch Whig, voted against the bill, because he thought it hard to put a man to death, who on compulsion, that is, to save his life, had told disagreeable truths. And the management of party was such that Sir J. Fenwick was prevented from speaking out lest he should exasperate the great men on both sides, who knew he could tell tales. The consequence was that he was afraid to affirm his own tale, and lost his life."† He suffered death on the 28th of January. The proceeding by attainder is a blot upon the reputation of the Whigs, as defenders of public liberty. The conversion of such a solemn act into a revengeful party proceeding is disgraceful to many of the statesmen of that time. "It is now well known that Fenwick's discoveries went not a step beyond the truth." ‡

The king closed the session of parliament on the 16th of April, 1697, and on the 26th embarked for Holland. He had promoted Somers to be lord chancellor, instead of keeper of the great seal, and had created him a peer. Russell was created Earl of Orford. Montague obtained the higher office of first lord of the treasury. The campaign in the Netherlands was distinguished only by one considerable event—William rescued Brussels from a second bombardment. He outmarched the French generals by a rapid night movement over the plain of Waterloo, and through the forest of Soignies, and encamping near Brussels, intrenched himself, and saved the city.

In his speech at the close of the session of parliament, the king had alluded, though not in very decided terms, to the possibility that an honorable peace might be agreed to. The difficulty of concluding a general pacification was less on the part of France than on the part of some of the allies. Spain was haughty and intractable, though she had rendered little assistance in the war. The Emperor of Germany wanted the war prolonged, with a view to his own interest in the succession to the crown of Spain. Plenipotentiaries were appointed by the several powers to discuss the terms of a treaty with the ministers of France. They disputed long as to the place of meeting. At last it was agreed that their conferences should be held at Newburg House, a palace belonging to William in the village of Ryswick, between the Hague and Delft. The Earl of Pembroke, and others on the part of England; Harlay as the representative of France; the accredited agents of Spain, of the emperor, of Sweden and of other minor powers—these met twice a week with solemn bows and ceremonial speeches. At the end of June they had concluded nothing, with their infinitude of protocols. The French and English armies were facing each other in the neighborhood of Brussels. This state neither of peace nor war was not suited to the decisive temper of William. In each of the armies there was a man who could interpret in a straightforward manner the wishes of their respective sovereigns. Portland was thoroughly in the confidence of William. He sent a message to Boufflers, who had been his prisoner for a few days after the capture of Namur, when they formed that sort of intimacy that often springs up between generous enemies. Portland desired half an hour's private conversation with Boufflers, at some place between the two armies. Boufflers asked the consent of his sovereign, and received it, with the condition that he should repair "to this rendezvous with all the dignity becoming a marshal of France who commands one of my armies." § He was to speak as little as possible, and to draw from Portland all he could—a very general rule in that mysterious science called diplomacy. They met on the 8th of July at the village of Brucom, a short distance from Halle, standing apart from their attendants in an orchard. They had four subsequent discussions in open places, where walls could tell no secrets. Portland was authorized to say at the first interview, that William, on the part of England and of the States-General, was satisfied with the terms of territorial arrangement that Louis had proposed, provided satisfaction should be given upon points which concerned himself personally. At the sixth and last interview they met in a small house, and the points of the negotiation were put into writing. William demanded that Louis should sanction no attempt to disturb the existing order of things in England, by James and his friends, and that the Stuart exiles should remove from France. There is the show magnanimity in the answer of Louis, that his honor was wounded—"wounded by the proposal that has been made to me to name expressly in the treaty, and to engage to remove from my kingdom, a king who has found no asylum except with me, and no alleviation of his misfortunes except in the manner in which I have received him." As to the objection that while James was in France the secret practices of his party would be encouraged, even against the wishes of Louis, the great king answers in the tone that only absolute power can assume: "All Europe is sufficiently aware of the obedience and submission of my people; and when I shall please to hinder my subjects from assisting the king of England—as I engage to do by promising not to assist, directly or indirectly, the enemies of the Prince of Orange, without any exception—there is no reason to apprehend that he will find any assistance in my kingdom."* Portland waived the point that James should be mentioned by name, provided that Louis agreed not to favor rebellions and intrigues in England, when William would give the like assurance with regard to any factions or rebellions in France. The high-blown pride of Louis was signally manifested at this presumption of William. He writes to Boufflers: "You shall answer to this proposal that this equality of condition cannot take place; and that the submission of my subjects, and the tranquillity of my kingdom, give me no reason to fear either faction or rebellion."† William, however, succeeded in carrying the reciprocal condition. He refused the demand of Louis that a general amnesty should be granted to all the adherents of James. He would pardon offences of men who would live quietly, but he would not consent to such a stipulation on the part of a foreign power. The Treaty of Ryswick was concluded between France, England, the States-General, and Spain, on the 22d of September. An extended term was given to the Emperor of Germany to accede to the treaty.

On the 26th of November (N.S.) William made his entry into London. Never was public joy more manifest. The evil times had passed away; there was now hope that the nation would go forward in a career of prosperity under a stable government. On that night of universal gratulation, while fireworks were displayed and pitch barrels were blazing in every open place of London, William wrote from Kensington to his friend Heinsius, "I arrived here this evening, after having passed through the city amid the lively acclamations of the people. I do not recollect having ever seen so great an assemblage of well-dressed people. It is impossible to conceive what joy the peace causes here." Well might England rejoice. Her constitutional king was acknowledged by the proud monarch who had so long treated him only as the Prince of Orange. He had vindicated the choice of the nation by nine years of incessant struggle against difficulties which would have crushed any common man. He had established the freedom and independence of the country which had chosen him as its head. When the negotiations were going forward, James issued what he termed a solemn protestation against "all whatsoever that may be treated of, regulated, or stipulated, with the usurper of our kingdoms," and "against all the proceedings of his pretended parliament, and whatever tends to the subversion of the fundamental laws of our kingdom, particularly to those relating to the succession to our crowns." He urged upon all princes and potentates to consider how dangerous the precedent of peace with an usurper would prove to themselves; "and since ours is the common cause of all sovereigns, we call for their assistance in the recovery of our kingdoms." ‡ The unhappy man had not yet learned that there is something higher than "the cause of all sovereigns"—the cause of their people.

The 2d of December, 1697, was a memorable day in England. It was the day of general thanksgiving for the peace. It was especially memorable in London; for on that day the new cathedral of Saint Paul's, which, for twenty-two years, had been gradually rising out of the ashes of the old cathedral, was opened for divine worship. The king was to have attended this opening; but he heard Burnet preach at Whitehall, for he was told that if he went to Saint Paul's the streets would be so filled with spectators that all the parish churches would be forsaken. No crowd was assembled within the walls of the noble temple on that day of national thanksgiving; for the choir alone was constructed with a view to the performance of the ordinary ritual of Protestant worship. There, Compton, Bishop of London, preached; there, the lord mayor and aldermen represented the commonalty of London. Great public occasions have been since, when the vast spaces beyond that choir have been filled with multitudes. There is one annual solemnity when the voices of thousands of children unite here in hymns of adoration. But not till a hundred and sixty-one years had gone by, since the magnficent fabric of Wren had been opened for divine service, was the experiment made of assembling a vast congregation beyond the comparatively narrow limits of the choir, to join in the chants of our noble liturgy, to listen to the preacher who was now to speak to such an assemblage as were once spoken to by the preachers of the Reformation at Paul's Cross. To the mind of the great architect the notion could never have presented itself, that three thousand people would have been seated in attendance on the evening service of each Sunday night of a cold and wet winter—the greater number in the area where the choir, the nave, and the transepts join. Wren could not have imagined that, above those piers which carry the majestic concave to which no one ever looked up without a sense of its grandeur, the vast circle of the dome would be illuminated with many hundreds of jets of flame—brilliant as stars, shedding down a light as of noonday—produced by an invention unknown to his age of scientific discovery. On those Sunday nights of December, 1858, while the simplest chants of the cathedral service, and the commonest hymns of a rural congregation, were sung by a choral band of unusual number and skill, the voices of the vast assembly swelled louder than the organ-peal, as if they felt that, for the first time, the colossal fane which rises sublimely over the smoke and mists of London had been applied to its proper uses; that the decent solemnities of the Anglican Church had now acquired a grandeur which, could the pure-minded philosopher who sleeps in the crypt below the dome have foreseen this change, he would have thought that a far nobler destination for the great monument of his genius had been reached than all the pomp of Saint Peter's on its highest festivals.

The parliament was opened by William on the 3d of December. The most important passage in the royal speech was this: "The circumstances of affairs abroad are such, that I think myself obliged to tell you my opinion, that, for the present, England cannot be safe without a land-force; and I hope we shall not give those who mean us ill the opportunity of effecting that, under the notion of a peace, which they could not bring to pass by a war." He spoke the language of the sovereign of a free nation when he said, "That which I most delight in, and am best pleased to own, is, that I have all the proofs of my people's affection that a prince can desire; and I take this occasion to give them the most solemn assurance that, as I never had, so I never will nor can have, any interest separate from theirs." The House of Commons behaved with becoming gratitude to William, in fixing the royal revenue at a liberal amount for his life. They were somewhat precipitate, greatly to his annoyance, in their determination to reduce the army to ten thousand horse and foot. Before the opening of parliament the question of maintaining an army during peace had been warmly canvassed. The king wrote to Heinsius: "The members who have come from the provinces seem to be strongly prejudiced against this measure, and infinite pains are taken to discredit it in the eyes of the public by speeches and by pamphlets."* In January the Commons limited the vote for the maintenance of troops for the current year to three hundred and fifty thousand pounds. William again wrote to Heinsius to say how greatly he was embarrassed: "You cannot form an idea of the indifference with which all foreign affairs are now considered. People here only busy themselves about a fanciful liberty, while they are forced to acknowledge that they were never so free, and have nothing to apprehend from me."† In alluding to the clamor for what he calls "a fanciful liberty," William has reference to that popular jealousy of a standing army, which burst out the instant that the army abroad had done its work. The notion then set forth in very able tracts that "a standing army is inconsistent with a free government, and absolutely destructive to the constitution of the English monarchy," has long since passed away. But "the indifference with which foreign affairs are considered" has, again and again, been a cause of deep anxiety, not only to lavish ministers, but to disinterested patriots. The arguments that were urged in 1697 against leaving the kingdom in a defenceless state may be applied, with little change, to our own times. "If," says the author of a letter once attributed to Somers, "we were in the same condition that we and our neighbors were an age ago, I should reject the proposition of a standing army with horror. But the case is altered. The whole world, more particularly our neighbors, have now got into the mistaken notion of keeping up a mighty force; and the powerfullest of all these happens to be our next neighbor, who will very probably keep great armies. We may appear too inviting, if we are in such an open and unguarded condition that the success of an attempt may seem to be not only probable, but certain. England is an open country, full of plenty, everywhere able to subsist an army; our towns and cities are all open; our rivers are all fordable; no passes nor strong places can stop an enemy that should land upon us." The writer then contrasts the secrecy and dispatch with which an absolute government can carry forward its designs, while the measures of a free government must be contrived and executed without the same promptitude and the same concealment. This is good sense at any period; nor is the writer less sound when he points out the essential difference "between troops that have been long trained, who have learned the art and are accustomed to the discipline of war, and the best bodies of raw and undisciplined troops."* These arguments were of little avail. William, with his accustomed imperturbability, wrote to Heinsius, "I shall get on as well as I can. It is fortunate, however, that they have resolved to give half-pay to all the officers who shall be disbanded. I estimate their number at fifteen hundred, or nearly so; so that, if we could afford it, we should have the means of forming again a considerable army."†

The most important proceeding of this session of parliament was the bill for settling the long-disputed question of continuing the monopoly of the old East India Company or for establishing a new company. Fierce were the disputes between these rival traders; and these disputes took that form of party advocacy which is most violent when pecuniary interests are involved. The government, then composed almost exclusively of Whigs, favored the pretensions of the adventurers who desired to be formed into a new company, for they had promised to set on foot subscriptions for raising two millions sterling, to be lent for the public service upon interest at eight per cent. The old East India Company had offered to advance seven hundred thousand pounds, at four per cent. The necessities of the time made the offer of the highest sum most acceptable. The Whigs carried the new company against the Tories, who supported the old company. The favored adventurers were to be called "the English Company." The body which had been chartered by Queen Elizabeth, and called "the London Company," was to cease trading in three years. But the old company had obtained territorial possessions of small extent, and had now made an important acquisition by the purchase of Calcutta, where they had built a stronghold, known as Fort William. The new company had provided in this bill for the charge of sending ambassadors from the crown to the potentates of the East. They proposed that the king should now send an ambassador extraordinary to the Great Mogul, in whose dominions the original traders had their chief factories and settlements, to desire his favor for the new company. Sir William Norris, member for Liverpool, accordingly set forth with ample allowance for his dignity. But Aurungzebe was not propitiated by the professions of the representative of the merchants who came to rival those to whom he had already granted his sublime protection. The ambassador was unable to contend against the prescriptive privileges which had been bestowed upon Englishmen a century before, and which had been confirmed by the successors of Jehangir. The great "Alemgir," or "Conqueror of the World," ordered the ambassador to depart from Agra. The discomfited envoy had no choice but to obey, and he died on his way home. In four more years the rival companies were united.* From that period we may date the gradual extension of the power of the one East India Company, which was ultimately to win for England an empire in Hindostan far more extensive than that of the Mogul conquerors in the height of their grandeur.

In his speech on the opening of parliament the king said, "I esteem it one of the greatest advantages of the peace that I shall now have leisure to rectify such corruptions or abuses as may have crept into any part of the administration during the war; and effectually to discourage profaneness and immorality." Two months after, the Commons went up with an address to the king, praying that he would issue his proclamation commanding all magistrates to put in execution the laws against such profaneness and immorality; and they added a request that he would take measures "for suppressing all pernicious books and pamphlets, which contain in them impious doctrines against the Holy Trinity, and other fundamental articles of our faith." As the king intimated in his answer, that it was necessary to make some more effectual provision for suppressing the pernicious books and pamphlets to which the address alluded, an act was passed, by which it was provided that if any person who had been educated in the Christian religion, or had made profession of the same, should by writing, printing, or teaching, deny the Holy Trinity, or deny the Christian religion to be true, or the Holy Scriptures to be of divine authority, he should, for the first offence, be disqualified for any office; for the second, be rendered incapable of bringing any action, of purchasing lands, or of being guardian, executor, or legatee. He was moreover to be subject to three years' imprisonment.† That portion of the statute which related to persons denying the doctrine of the Trinity was repealed by the act of 53 George III. The law of 1698, with this exception, still remains unrepealed or unmodified. But it is perfectly clear that any attempt to enforce it would be wholly opposed to the spirit of this age—not that we are less earnest in religious feeling than the generation that passed this statute, but that we have learned that opinions are not to be put down by indictments, as long as they are not disgustingly obtruded upon society as an insult to its decencies. In the attack made by the act of William upon "blasphemous and impious opinions" regarding the doctrine of the Trinity, the difficulty, if not impossibility, was involved of so accurately measuring the difference between orthodoxy and heterodoxy as to enable plain men to decide upon points upon which divines themselves were disputing. Thomas Firmin, a London citizen, was one of the leading advocates of the popular schemes of that day, "for setting the poor to work;" that is, by providing the labor out of a common public stock which could not be provided by commercial enterprise, and thus increasing production without reference to the demand of the consumers, or making more poor by underselling the producers who were previously in the market. Firmin was, however, a man of real benevolence, and though his schemes upon any large scale would be impracticable, his exertions rescued many poor children from idleness and starvation. "He was in great esteem," says Burnet, "for promoting many charitable designs; for looking after the poor of the city and setting them to work; for raising great sums for schools and hospitals, and indeed for charities of all sorts, public and private." This practical Christian was the friend of Tillotson; "he was called a Socinian, but was really an Arian." He was as diligent in propagating his theological tenets as in his less questionable labors. According to Burnet, those who were at work to undermine the government "raised a great outcry against Socinianism, and gave it out that it was likely to overrun all; for Archbishop Tillotson and some of the bishops had lived in great friendship with Mr. Firmin, whose charitable temper they thought it became them to encourage." The clergy themselves came to dispute among themselves, and thus to be divided by their adversaries into "real and nominal Trinitarians." The spirit of controversy that was again called forth "made the bishops move the king to set out injunctions, requiring them to see to the repressing of error and heresy, with all possible zeal, more particularly in the fundamental articles of the Christian faith: and to watch against and hinder the use of new terms or new explanations in these matters. This put a stop to these debates, as Mr. Firmin's death put a stop to the printing and spreading of Socinian books." * How far the statute which immediately followed Mr. Firmin's death was conducive to the repression of infidelity, may be sufficiently estimated by its progress in the next two reigns, when the test of wit and wisdom, of refinement and taste, was to be a free-thinker after the fashion of Shaftesbury or Bolingbroke.

The Socinian books might have vanished; but the profaneness and immorality, which could not so readily be touched by act of parliament, had to be combated by an organization very peculiar to this country. The principle of association was to come to the aid of the government. Societies for the reformation of manners had for some time been in activity. They originated with the Puritans. They were encouraged by dissenters after the revolution; and they gradually embraced men of various modes of worship. Their business was to lay informations before the magistrates, of swearers, drunkards, Sabbath-breakers, and other offenders, and to appropriate that portion of the fines which were earned by common informers, to purposes of charity. The objection which ever was, and ever will be, against the most honest exertions of such societies is—that they are not impartial in their visitations. Defoe indignantly attacked the unequal distribution of punishment "in the commonwealth of vice," and boldly said "till the nobility, gentry, justices of the peace, and clergy, will be pleased either to reform their own manners, or find out some method and power impartially to punish themselves when guilty, we humbly crave leave to object against setting any poor man in the stocks, or sending him to the house of correction for immoralities as the most unjust and unequal way of proceeding in the world." †

Whatever were the immoralities of the upper classes—whatever was the laxity of some of the clergy—there was a spirit growing up which is the best proof of an extending sense of Christian obligation. When the influential members of a community have come to recognize the duty of association, for objects of benevolence of a wider range than their own parish, town, county, or kingdom, there is a principle stirring within them which, if not exaggerated into false enthusiasm, will make them more regardful even of the wants at their own doors. Such an association was that of the "Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge;" such was the "Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts;" both established about this period. These societies were chiefly created and brought into a condition of practical utility by the efforts of one man. A society had been formed in 1649 under an act of the parliament of the commonwealth, "for the promoting and propagating the Gospel of Jesus Christ in New England." It subsisted till after the restoration; but in that period —one of the decline of genuine Christianity—it fell into disuse. Thomas Bray, a native of Shropshire, born in 1656, was educated at Hart Hall, Oxford. While he held the benefice of Sheldon he published a very useful work, "Catechetical Lectures." The governor and assembly of the colony of Maryland, having established a legal maintenance for ministers of the Church, Dr. Bray was appointed a commissary, or general superintendent. One of his first labors, after selecting proper persons to be sent, was to provide libraries for their use. Another of his valuable designs was to establish lending libraries in England and Wales for the use of the clergy. He was truly the founder of those parochial libraries, established by act of parliament in 1708, which, if they had been carried forward with corresponding energy, would have tended to dissipate some of that ignorance among the people generally which it has been a main object in our own time to remove. To this admirable man was mainly owing the establishment of the two great and venerable societies which still maintain their utility in connection with the Church of England.

With a clergy even more zealous and united than the churchmen of the end of the seventeenth century—a clergy learned, logical, argumentative, but rarely touching the hearts of their hearers—the counteracting influences to such a society as that for promoting Christian knowledge were very great. Not the least of these opposing influences was the licentiousness of the stage. In 1697, Sunderland, as lord chamberlain, had issued an order to prevent the profaneness and immorality of the acted drama. In 1699 the master of the revels represented that the actors did not leave out such profane and indecent expressions as he had ordered to be omitted. The king therefore issued his command that nothing hereafter should be acted contrary to religion and good manners. How this command was obeyed, let Congreve, Farquhar, and Vanbrugh inform us. The master of the revels might refuse "to license any plays containing irreligious or immoral expressions," as he was commanded; but the master of the revels probably made no attempt to remonstrate against performances in which the phraseology might be tolerably decent, but of which the whole structure of the action was to represent chastity as the thin disguise of scheming women, and the pursuit of adultery as the proper business of refined gentlemen; to make the sober citizen the butt of the profligates who invaded his domestic hearth; to exhibit the triumphs of intellect in the schemes of venal lackeys to aid the intrigues of their masters, and of odious waiting-maids to surround their mistresses with opportunities of temptation. Was this a true picture of society? We believe not. None of these writers, with all their wit and vivacity, ever looked beyond the periwigs and point laces, the stomachers and towering caps, that they saw in the side boxes. The great middle class was wholly unknown to them—that class which, although it had cast aside some of those severities of Puritanism which confounded innocent gayety with vice, was not inclined to adopt the principle inculcated by the dramatists, that stupidity and decency were inseparable. There was an earnest public in England that disliked the stage because it was corrupting. Defoe was of this number, and he wrote against the drama with little of his usual discrimination. Jeremy Collier took a bolder course, and smote down the individual writers who made plays "the greatest debauchers of the nation," as Burnet says. He had even Dryden at his feet when the great poet acknowledges, "In many things he has taxed me justly. . . . It becomes not me to draw my pen in defence of a bad cause, when I have so often drawn it for a good one." Dryden maintains, however, that Fletcher's "Custom of the Country" is more offensive than any of the plays then acted. "Are the times," he asks, "so much more reformed now than they were five and twenty years ago?" * Unquestionably they were more reformed. But the morality of the age of the restoration still tainted the stage of the revolution. Charles the Second brought to England the manners of the court of France in the days of its worst profligacy. Since then the court of France had grown devout and decent. Burnet says, "It is a shame to our nation and religion to see the stage so reformed in France and so polluted still in England." † The court of William and Mary, in its seclusion at Kensington, had little influence upon the world of fashion; and thus there was no perceptible effect upon manners in the decorous example of the highest in the land. Burnet was pretty right in his antithesis—"The stage is the great corrupter of the town, and the bad people of the town have been the chief corrupters of the stage." ‡

The court of Louis the Fourteenth was now to be brought into intimate acquaintance with the court of William the Third. As the parliament had interfered to prevent the King of England emulating, even for purposes of national defence, the great armies of the King of France, William, with a pardonable ostentation, resolved that his ambassador to Versailles should not go without the trappings of a magnificent royalty. He could scarcely afford this most expensive outlay, especially as five days before Portland, the ambassador, set forth with his sumptuous retinue on this friendly mission, Whitehall had been burned down. The Banqueting House was saved with great difficulty. William wrote to Heinsius that the principal portion of the palace was in ashes. "The loss is considerable, but we have no remedy, and we have nothing left but to pray God to preserve us in future from such accidents," writes the equal-minded king. § Portland was received in France with extraordinary courtesy. At every town through which he passed from Calais to Paris, guards of honor attended upon him, and salutes were fired from every citadel. Early in February he had his private audience of Louis at Versailles. Saint Simon has described the superb suite of Portland—his horses, his liveries, his equipages, his hospitable table. He appeared, says this careful observer, with a politeness, with the air of a court, with a gallantry and grace, that were surprising. The French were charmed with him; it became the fashion to see him, to fête him, to attend his parties. And yet this envoy of William exhibited a warmth on one occasion which was scarcely in unison with the habitual calmness of his friend and master. He writes to the king on the 16th of February: "Marshal Boufflers has taken an opportunity of speaking to me of the surprise and indignation which I had expressed, rather publicly, at seeing the Duke of Berwick and others at Versailles; on which occasion I had said that the blood boiled in my veins at their approach, and that I hoped there was no intention of accustoming me to see the assassins of the king my master. He attempted to soften this in a way which led me to infer that my words had been reported, and that he spoke to me by command. For this reason I deemed it necessary to state still more fully what I thought of the residence of King James in France, and of their tolerating and maintaining in this country villains who had attempted your life." * To Louis himself Portland spoke out in the same blunt manner, especially about those he calls "the assassins;" to whom the great king replied, with regal suavity, that "he was not perfectly acquainted with this affair," and that he would never take the step of obliging King James to withdraw from France. William took this matter very quietly. He was not surprised at the reply which Portland had drawn from the king. "It would have been more desirable if you had received such a refusal at the close of your negotiations rather than at the commencement, for it may cause you a good deal of embarrassment throughout, and especially in regard to the most important point of all, the Spanish succession." † Upon this "most important point of all," as William clearly saw, would the future destinies of Europe depend. The death of the King of Spain was then expected; and to avert a war with France, if that event took place, or to find the means of carrying on a war, was the great anxiety of William's life for his few coming years.

Portland made his public entry into Paris on the 9th of March. His letter to William, describing some circumstances of the ceremonial, is very curious. His disputes with the "conductor of ambassadors," about matters of etiquette, are highly amusing. "In my case," he says, "difficulties have been raised on every conceivable point; and as I do not understand the ceremonial, I am embarrassed by them, and can only meet them with obstinacy, which is here rather indispensable." Comedy cannot imagine a richer scene than the burly Dutchman refusing to come down from the top of his staircase to meet the representative of the Duchess of Burgundy, who refused to go more than half way up, "messengers passing backward and forward between us." ‡ When the English ambassador's carriage was at last fairly on its way to the Louvre, Portland was surprised to see the windows and balconies filled with "all the people of quality in the city," and the crowd on the Pont Neuf expressing their wonder at the solemn reception of the representative of a monarch whose effigy they had been burning for eight years on the same bridge. At last he got into the sublime presence of Louis. The king spoke first. The courtiers said "he was never seen to speak to an ambassador first, or in so familiar a manner;" and they were perfectly astonished that Portland was not embarrassed at the sight of the gorgeous assemblage that surrounded the great potentate. §

While this parade was going forward in the most magnificent court of Europe, Count Tallard had arrived in London, to be introduced to William in the humble cabinet at Kensington. The correspondence of this ambassador with his master shows how narrowly every political movement in this country was watched; what anxiety there was to propitiate the ministers of the king, and the leaders of the opposition; how every indication of popular feeling was observed and noted down. The French government had active agents in England, as in every other country, whose business it was to transmit the most detailed reports of all the political matters that came within their view—to record the whispers of the drawing-room and the mutterings of the coffee-house. Such an agent was at work in England to prepare the way for Tallard. The "Memorandum on the Affairs of England," written by the Abbé Renaudet, in February, 1698, contains some curious notices of the government and the people, which are not without a permanent interest. ‖ He thinks that the country will be more difficult to govern during peace than it was during the war. He measures the political disposition of the aristocracy by a very different standard than that prevailing at Versailles. "An English noble does not much mind being on bad terms with the court, inasmuch as he is able to support himself by joining the popular party." He thinks the existing ministry will fall, and therefore it will be necessary for the interests of the French king "to discover, as far as possible, what are the feelings of the two houses on this subject," lest too much confidence should be placed in men who are in an unsafe position. He says that this precaution is the more necessary, as "the English nobility were never more discontented than they are at present with those who possess the entire confidence of the master whom they have set over them. They are all convinced that they have no share in his confidence. They see with indignation the Dutch loaded with wealth and honors, especially the last favorite, who is a young man of great insolence and dissipation." * The sagacious abbé, holding that, "among the Peers, there is a party formed against the court," nevertheless recommends the greatest caution in all transactions with discontented persons, lest "the jealousy of the nation should be roused," to suspect designs "against religion and liberty." Flatter the pride of the nobles, by all kinds of attentions; take their part in trivial matters; strive to gain the friendship of those who are in credit; and do nothing except through a third party, in all that may affect interests hostile to the court—such are the means by which France was to keep up its influence in England—far more dangerous as an intriguing friend than as an open enemy. His last recommendation is the most insidious: "Too much esteem and respect cannot be shown to the prelates of the Anglican Church, several of whom entertain sentiments favorable to King James."

The "Instructions of Count Tallard, his majesty's ambassador extraordinary to the King of England," are conceived in the same spirit of concealed dislike to the government of William, and inculcate the same watchfulness over every manifestation of party hostility or popular discontent. The knowledge displayed of the English political system, and of the temper of the parliament, shows the range and accuracy of the statesmanship of France. The advantage of having access to the accounts of income and expenditure, of commerce, of the state of the army and navy, of the crown revenues, of all that relates to finances, is pointed out. These, being laid before parliament, "are not kept secret; we may, therefore, judge to a certainty, by their contents, of the real state of England." It is evidently a matter of great satisfaction to France that the parliament has exhibited "much less submission" to the king; "that the reduction of the army, of the navy, and of the subsidies disables him from undertaking anything in future without the consent of the nation;" and that, probably, "the difficulties will be found greater in future parliaments." William had already tasted of the bitter cup which was preparing for him. At the beginning of March he wrote to Portland, "I cannot conceal from you that I have never been more vexed and melancholy in all my life than I am now." † He was vexed and melancholy to witness the rash haste with which the parliament resolved to leave the kingdom almost wholly defenceless. A week later, he again wrote to his ambassador at the court of Louis. "I confess that I have so heartfelt a desire to see no more of war during the short period I yet may have to live, that I will not omit anything, which in honor and conscience I can do, to prevent it." He instructed Portland to say for him, that he so ardently desired the preservation of peace that he "was not averse from listening to any proposal calculated to insure its continuance, even in the event of the demise of the King of Spain"—an occurrence which he feared, with the prescience of a sound statesman, might "again plunge all Europe in war." In the same month—when there was a general report that the King of Spain was so enfeebled "that the slightest accident might carry him off in a moment"—William, in a letter to Heinsius, said, "I shudder when I think of the unprepared state of the allies to begin a war, and of the dilapidated state of Spain. It is certain that France is in a condition to take possession of that monarchy, before we shall be able to concert the slightest measures to oppose it. Such is the state of matters here that I shall be able to contribute little toward the land forces." Rouse the allies on all sides to the necessity of remaining armed, was the earnest exhortation of William to the grand pensionary of Holland. "I wish I could be armed too," he sighed, "but I see little appearance of it." *

The lapse of a century and a half produces mighty changes in the political aspects of the world. There was a sovereign in 1698 in England who had no voice in the congress of the Hague—no interests to assert at the peace of Ryswick. He came here in very humble guise—by no means like a ruler who was to found a mighty empire, whose growth has been the terror of Western Europe. "He is mechanically turned, and seems designed by nature rather to be a ship-carpenter than a great prince. . . . He is resolute, but understands little of war. . . . He is a man of a very hot temper, soon inflamed, and very brutal in his passion." † Moreover, he is given to brandy-drinking, and is subject to convulsive motions all over his body. This was Peter I., Czar of Muscovy, who, whatever Bishop Burnet might have thought, had really some notions of government and war—a tall man, with a taint of something savage in his handsome countenance—but one who knew what curbing savages meant. He was a very incomprehensible monarch to the English people. William hired Mr. Evelyn's house at Sayes Court for the czar, that he might see the building of ships in the dockyards at Deptford and Woolwich. Mr. Evelyn's servant writes to his master, "There is a house full of people, and right nasty. . . . The king is expected here this day. The best parlor is pretty clean for him to be entertained in." William paid his visit. "The czar had a favorite monkey, which sat down upon the back of his chair. As soon as the king was set down, the monkey jumped upon him in some wrath, which discomposed the whole ceremonial." ‡ Peter ruined Mr. Evelyn's holly-hedge; and after his day's work as a carpenter at Rotherhithe, upon a ship that was building for him, recreated himself with beer and brandy, and smoked his pipe, at an alehouse on Tower Hill. Burnet writes, "After I had seen him often, and conversed much with him, I could not but adore the depth of the providence of God that had raised up such a furious man to so absolute an authority over a great part of the world." Pieter Timmerman, who worked for wages at Saardam, and cooked his own dinner, became, through his extraordinary process of self-education, the instrument of working out designs of Providence of which we are yet far from seeing the full development.

CHAPTER CXXXI.

Commercial policy of England—System of prohibition—Restrictions upon the trade of Ireland—Restrictions upon the trade of Scotland—Scotch spirit of commercial adventure—African and Indian Company—Scotch colony at Darien.

In the commercial policy of England, at the period of which we are now treating, there were two words of magical power, which represented the system upon which all industrial operations were conducted. These words were, prevention—encouragement. We open the statute-book. At one page we find "An act to prevent." We turn a few leaves, and we find "An act to encourage." There is some home manufacture to be supported; there is some foreign product to be prohibited. To carry out these statutes required a vigilance of no ordinary nature. Officers of the government were constantly scouring over the sands and marshes of the coast, to embarrass the operations of a most indefatigable race, known by the name of smugglers, with which we are still familiar, and by the name of owlers, which has lost its place in our language. Owling and smuggling were carried on upon a large scale, by considerable capitalists. In the session of 1698 the parliament proceeded against some dozen of opulent merchants with foreign names, by impeaching them of high crimes and misdemeanors, for fraudulently importing foreign alamodes and lustrings, and for illegally exporting native wool. They carried on this traffic in vessels regularly passing between France and the English coast, where the smugglers were waiting to bear away the silks to the interior, and the owlers were at hand with a return cargo of wool for Picardy. The delinquent merchants pleaded guilty at the bar of the Lords. One was fined ten thousand pounds; one, three thousand pounds; two, fifteen hundred pounds each; three, a thousand pounds each; and one, five hundred pounds. These sums were applied to the building of Greenwich Hospital.

If the paternal system of prohibition, which all governments are so unwilling to relinquish, had been confined to countries then regarded as natural rivals, if not as natural enemies, a century and a half might have elapsed before even well-informed Englishmen would have regarded the principle as fallacious, and injurious to the real interests of a country. Not half a century has passed since those who advocated a contrary opinion were denounced as hard-hearted political economists. Logicians of this character still linger in a few provincial towns; and even a grave historian dates the certain ruin of our people from the establishment of commercial freedom. Great states in our own day look upon the vast extension of the trade of these islands, but make very small advances to accomplish the same ends by the same means. The most despotic government in Europe dares not encounter the monopolists of iron. The transatlantic government, that claims to be at the head of free institutions, clings to its exclusive tariff. Nations have their infancy as well as individuals. "When I was a child," says the apostle of the Gentiles, "I spake as a child, I understood as a child, I thought as a child: but when I became a man I put away childish things." Nations, in their apparent manhood, do not readily "put away childish things." The go-cart is still necessary to keep their feet from falling. They still delight to play with straws and feathers.

There is probably no manifestation of commercial jealousy more absurd than the interference of England, after the restoration of Charles II., with the free course of the industry of Ireland and Scotland. The rural interests of England had prevented the importation of Irish cattle. In the statute of Charles II. such cattle were called "a nuisance." The Irish farmers took to breeding sheep; and wool being abundant, woollen manufactures were set up. In 1698 the Commons went up with an address to the king, in which they expressed their great trouble that "Ireland should of late apply itself to the woollen manufacture;" and they implored his majesty "that he would make it his royal care, and enjoin all those he employed in Ireland, to use their utmost diligence to hinder the exportation of wool from Ireland—except imported hither—and for discouraging the woollen, and encouraging the linen, manufacture in Ireland." Upon this representation, William wrote to the Earl of Galway, "The chief thing that must be tried to be prevented is, that the Irish parliament takes no notice of what has passed in this, here; and that you make effectual laws for the linen manufacture, and discourage, as far as possible, the woollen." In their address to the king the Commons implored him to "find means to secure the trade of England, by making his subjects of Ireland to pursue the joint interests of both kingdoms. We can now understand how these joint interests would have been better promoted by leaving the productive industry and the commercial intercourse of both countries perfectly free. The reason which the Commons expressed, as to the necessity of the paternal compulsion of the king to make Ireland understand her true interest, was, that the Irish were "dependent on, and protected by England, in the enjoyment of all they have."

The King of England was also King of Scotland. But he was King of the Scots, with a distinct parliament, with a distinct Church, with a people not only indignant at the notion of submission to England, but thoroughly convinced that the day was not yet gone by for a contest for dominion, if the opportunity should arise. Fletcher of Saltoun, who held the necessity of subjecting the indigent and lawless population of Scotland to a condition of feudal slavery, yet believed that England had reached the culminating point of her prosperity; that there was a hardy race in Scotland whose energy would soon outstrip the luxurious nation that had become corrupted by riches. A federal union, between the degenerate race that had nearly run its course, and the vigorous breed that were pressing forward to a nobler goal, was all that the patriotic Scot could consent to—a perfect equality in their several nationalities, but no joint interests. Such were the doctrines that the pride of Scotland eagerly listened to, and which led her to dream of coming struggles with the haughty English for the commerce of the seas and the wealth of colonization. Yet Fletcher had been perfectly right, if he could have gone a step farther, and could have contemplated the period when the "perfervidum ingenium Scotorum" should have entered with England into a career of sympathy instead of antipathy. When, having ceased to manifest her peculiar social tendencies by hanging a boy for blasphemy, as she hanged the victim of religious intolerance, Thomas Aikenhead, in 1696—and by putting twenty-two witches upon trial for their lives, as the Scotch privy council commanded, at the same period—she had carried forward the enlightenment of her system of parochial school education into the development of her people, to form the most intelligent, the most industrious, and the most accumulating members of a British community. We had each a great deal to learn, and a great deal to endure, before that consummation of the united destinies of two countries, so formed for successful amalgamation out of their very differences, could be accomplished. There is nothing more instructive in the history of the human race than the complete union of England and Scotland into one Great Britain. The most remarkable occurrence of the period before the legislative union of the two countries is that conflict for separate interests which saw the King of England, certainly wishing well to the prosperity of both the kingdoms that he had been called upon to govern, hesitating between the jealousies of the one kingdom and the rash assertion of an impossible independence in the other—which saw William embarrassed even to the point of resigning his great scheme of policy to neutralize the dangerous ambition of France by a national enthusiasm which utterly set at nought the dangers and difficulties which it involved for him as the sovereign of two disunited realms. Those who have regarded William as the callous enemy, or the cold friend, of Scotland, in the transactions which we associate with the name of Darien, have scarcely made allowance for the peculiar position of the head of this very divided empire. Those who lived in the time of the events which saw Scotland impoverished and humiliated by the results of an enterprise which was rashly undertaken, ignorantly conducted, and ending fatally, were led to the verge of a civil war by obstinately looking only at one side of a very complicated question.

About six or eight years before the close of the seventeenth century a spirit of commercial activity seems to have sprung up in Scotland, and to have taken a direction somewhat remarkable in a country possessing very little superfluous capital. Yet this direction may be satisfactorily explained. The natural commerce of Scotland was laboring under great disadvantages. The ancient intercourse with France was cut off by the war with Louis XIV. The exchange of commodities with England was interrupted by prohibitions and heavy duties. The trade with the English colonies was absolutely forbidden. The most serious impediment to the commercial progress of Scotland was the Navigation Act of Charles II.—distinctly opposed to the policy of Cromwell, by whose ordinance all goods passing from England to Scotland, from Scotland to England, or from Scotland to any of the English foreign dominions, were to be treated exactly the same as goods passing from port to port in England. The two countries were then regarded essentially as one kingdom in those matters of trade in which the prosperity of each country was involved. Scotland, in the time of William III., could not advantageously trade with the East Indies, in consequence of the monopoly of the East India Company. Nevertheless, it was not legally cut off from that trade, as were English adventurers. It could not trade with the American plantations, in consequence of the Navigation Act. It is not surprising, therefore, that a kingdom which was beginning to feel the benefits of peaceful industry—a kingdom containing a most energetic and industrious population—should desire to seek new fields of enterprise, under the jealousies which prevented their fully participating in the commerce of its richer neighbor. This national desire was manifested in the act of the parliament of Scotland in 1693 "for encouraging foreign trade." It declares that nothing has been found more effectual for the improvement and enlargement of trade "than the erecting and encouraging of companies, whereby the same may be carried on by undertakings to the remotest parts, which it is not possible for single persons to undergo." It accordingly provides that merchants may enter into societies for carrying on trade to any kingdoms or parts of the world, not being at war with our sovereign lord and lady. The East Indies were not excepted.* The general powers of this statute seem to have excited little alarm among the jealous merchants and party legislators of England. They probably knew nothing of this attempt to legislate for rival interests. English statesmen were too much accustomed to look with contempt upon the poverty of Scotland to entertain much dread of her commercial competition. It is recorded that Sir Edward Seymour, in a debate in parliament which touched upon a union with Scotland, applied a coarse proverbial saying about marrying a beggar.†

But at the end of 1695 the favor with which a Scottish commercial project had been received in England stirred up all the national jealousy of the House of Commons. A Scot, who was well known as the originator of the scheme of the Bank of England, had been in London, and under the authority of a Scottish act of parliament, passed in the previous June, had in a few days obtained subscriptions to the amount of three hundred thousand pounds, for constituting a company "for trading from Scotland to Africa and the Indies." This success was secured by the energy of William Paterson, when the English government was in great financial difficulties. The supporters in London of the project for a Scottish trading company were apprehensive of a parliamentary opposition to the scheme. "They think," wrote Paterson, on the 9th of July, to the lord provost of Edinburgh, "that we ought to keep private and close for some months, that no occasion may be given for the parliament of England, directly or indirectly, to take notice of it in the ensuing session, which might be of ill consequences, especially when a great many considerable persons are already alarmed at it." ‡

A new parliament met in November, and in December the Lords and Commons went up with an address to the king, to represent that an act which had lately received his royal assent in his kingdom of Scotland, "for erecting a company trading to Africa and the Indies, was likely to bring many great prejudices and mischiefs to all his majesty's subjects who were concerned in the wealth or trade of this nation." The answer of William was perhaps the only one that he could have given with any regard to prudence: "He had been ill-served in Scotland, but he hoped some remedies might be found to prevent the inconveniences which might arise from this act." § "He had been ill-served in Scotland." Dalrymple, the Master of Stair, had been his principal servant; and for his share in the affair of Glencoe the Scottish parliament had requested the king to signify his disapprobation at this very period. He had promoted the scheme of the company trading to Africa and the Indies. When Sir Walter Scott affirms that Dalrymple was deprived of his office of secretary of state to William, not for his share "in the bloody deed of Glencoe," but for "attempting to serve his country in the most innocent and laudable manner, by extending her trade and national importance," ‖ he uses the privileges of the novelist. William had been "ill-served" in both these matters. The House of Commons went farther than the king. They resolved that the directors of the Scottish company, naming the Lord Belhaven, William Paterson, and others, were guilty of a high crime and misdemeanor, upon the ground that under color of a Scotch act of parliament these directors had levied money, and had done other corporate acts in England, which could not be legally done without the sanction of the English parliament.

With every symptom of a national jealousy unworthy of a people that was becoming commercially great, it could scarcely be expected that in England the very sweeping powers of the "company trading to Africa and the Indies" should not have excited considerable alarm. The ships of the favored company were to be free from all dues; the company were to be privileged to fit out vessels of war; they were authorized to make settlements and build forts in any uninhabited places in Asia, Africa, or America; they might make alliances with sovereign powers; all other Scotsmen were prohibited from trading within their range, without license from them. But the English jealousy of commercial rivalry once roused, there could be no compromise which would make the speculation safe for the London capitalists. They forfeited their first instalments upon their shares. The angry mood of the English legislature had also roused the public spirit of Scotland; and by a general consent it was resolved that a great opportunity of asserting the national independence should not be lost. In six months from the opening of the subscription books the sum of four hundred thousand pounds was subscribed. This subscription was not accomplished by a few large capitalists, such as those who had come forward in London. "The subscription book is an interesting analysis, as it were, of the realized wealth of Scotland, at a time when it was more difficult to raise five pounds than it is now to raise a hundred." There were a few large subscriptions from the nobility and the higher mercantile classes; but the majority of the subscribers were professional men and shopkeepers. The list "affords little indication of that quiet and comfortable class, deposited in a long-enriched social system like the Britons of the present day, who are seeking a sure investment for disengaged capital." * The available funds of Scotland were devoted to the romantic adventure of founding a great Scottish colony, in some favored spot of the new world which was yet shrouded in mysterious anticipations. Not Cortez, stared at the Pacific with more eager eyes than those intrusted with Paterson's secret. The concealed destination of the colony was the famous Isthmus of Panama. A Scottish merchant, named Douglas, shrewdly guessed Paterson's design, in September, 1696, and he exposed the perils and uncertainties of the enterprise. This acute reasoner held the amount proposed to be raised as insufficient for the project, and predicted that the company would have to encounter the determined hostility of the Spaniards. "He" [Paterson] "deceives the company, and imposes upon them—and indeed the nation, which is generally concerned in it—in that he puts them upon attempting so hazardous and costly an undertaking with so little stock. Whereas it is reasonable to believe that, if they were able at last to accomplish it, after a long war with the Spaniards, and to make themselves masters of both seas, it may cost more millions than they have hundreds of thousands." ‡ Nevertheless the national enthusiasm was at its height, filled with dreams of gold and rubies and copper-mines—of untaxed trade, and the mighty power of joint-stocks. "Trade's Release" was the theme of an "excellent new ballad:"

"Come, rouse up your hearts, come rouse up anon!
Think of the wisdom of old Solomon;
And heartily join with your own Paterson,
To fetch home Indian treasures." §

The four hundred thousand pounds which, on the 1st of August, appeared to have been subscribed, were, to some extent, made up "by a method of fictitious support well known in the stock market." The ledgers of the company, which still exist, show that some large subscribers were guaranteed by the directors. ‖ Twenty-five per cent upon the subscriptions was, however, paid up within the year, or very nearly so. With this amount in hand, somewhat less than a hundred thousand pounds, the company began to engage in magnificent undertakings. They did not leave the trade of Scotland to adapt itself to their enterprise of finding new markets for a profitable exchange, but made contracts in various small seats of manufacture, for iron goods and cutlery, for stockings and gloves, for hats, shoes, linen, periwigs, and tobacco-pipes. The Highlands even were stimulated into the production of home-woven tartan. They issued bank-notes; and with this device, and with the general confidence in their credit, they collected stores and built warehouses. But their means were still found inadequate to their ambition. They attempted to dispose of stock at Hamburg, but were interfered with by the English resident. Remonstrances were made to King William, but he afforded no redress to the complaints of his Scottish lieges. "Whether from wisdom," says Mr. Burton, "or the obduracy of his Dutch nature, he long effectively baffled every attempt to extract from him either an act or an opinion." We are inclined to think that if the king had followed the higher wisdom of pointing out to the Scottish legislature that they had sanctioned and stimulated an enterprise fraught with peril, and likely to cause his government serious embarrassment in the difficult and delicate position in which it stood in relation to foreign affairs, he would have brought down upon himself even a greater amount of indignation than was the result of his cold reserve. On the other hand, had he encouraged the project, which many sensible men proclaimed as fallacious, and which the jealousy of his English parliament had denounced, he would have risked a rupture with that parliament, which he scrupulously avoided even under the severest mortifications personal to himself. It was more than difficult for him to steer a just and prudent course as the sovereign of two kingdoms having such conflicting interests in their unnatural separation. The embarrassments arising out of the Darien scheme without doubt gave a stronger impulse to his ardent wish for the union of England and Scotland.

On the 26th of July, 1698, three vessels, purchased from the Dutch, and armed as ships of war, sailed from Leith, with twelve hundred men on board. "The whole city of Edinburgh poured down upon Leith, to see the colony depart, amid the tears, and prayers, and praises of relations and friends." * The destination of the adventurers was unknown to them. Paterson was on board one of the vessels, the Saint Andrew, but in no responsible position. He addressed a report of his proceedings at the end of the next year to the court of directors of the company. At the first, when he suggested that a council should be held to inquire how the vessel was provided for the voyage, he was told by the captain not to interfere with business for which there were ample instructions. The passengers were soon reduced to short allowance. Throughout the voyage the projector of the colony was at issue with the officers of the ship and the council appointed by the directors. The sealed orders were opened at Madeira, and then the destination of the twelve hundred colonists ceased to be a secret. On the 4th of November they landed at a point in the Gulf of Darien. In a letter which Paterson wrote to a friend in Boston, we find that his sanguine spirit had overcome all the unpleasant circumstances of the voyage. "Our situation is about two leagues to the southward of Golden Island (by the Spaniards called Guarda), in one of the best and most defensible harbors, perhaps, in the world. The country is healthful to a wonder, insomuch that our own sick, that were many when we arrived, are now generally cured. The country is exceedingly fertile, and the weather temperate." The riches of the country, he says, are far beyond what he ever thought or conceived. The natives, for fifty leagues on either side, are in entire friendship. The Spaniards, indeed, are much surprised and alarmed—the news of the arrival of the colony has come like a thunder-clap upon them. "We have written to the President of Panama, giving him account of our good and peaceable intentions, and to procure a good understanding and correspondence. If this is not condescended to, we are ready for what else he pleases." † The spot where the colonists landed was a peninsula united to the mainland, and capable at its narrower junction of being fortified. The colony was to be settled on that mainland, which was to be called New Caledonia. Seven gentlemen had been appointed for the government of the settlement. They were thoroughly ignorant of what they ought to do for the management and profitable employ of twelve hundred men, some of whom were of the old buccaneering stamp, and far readier for plunder than for labor or traffic. It had been ostentatiously proclaimed that the Scottish colony was to be the great emporium of free commerce; that the ships of all nations were to exchange in its favored ports without restriction. The projectors were before their time in their doctrine, as set forth in some verses of the day,

"that trade by sea
Needs little more support than being free."

The adventurers had little acquaintance with the difficulties of colonization, and knew not the obstacles that would prevent a body of private men, unsupported by the strong arm of a government, from planting themselves on the Isthmus of Panama, and becoming the medium of commercial intercourse between the Atlantic and the Pacific. There had been terrible visitors there before the Scots—ruffians who had carried desolation into the Spanish possessions on the Isthmus—robbers and murderers who hoisted the black flag—the remembrance of whose atrocities was still fresh. The colonists sent civil messages to the governors of the neighboring Spanish settlements. Their overtures were rejected with disdain. Soon they got into conflict with the Spaniards, in taking part in a dispute between them and some friendly Indians. At Carthagena a vessel of the company, armed with fourteen guns, running into the bay, the captain and crew were seized and condemned to death as pirates. The English resident interfered and saved the men. The authorities of the colony now declared war against Spain, attacked the ships of that power, and turned very readily to the same sort of exploits for which Captain Morgan, the great buccaneer, had been distinguished. The court of Spain, by its ambassador, made a formal representation to the government in London, that its territory had been invaded by the subjects of King William. In our narrative of the remaining events of William's reign it will be seen how indispensable a right understanding with Spain was, for the great objects of England's foreign policy. The proceedings in the Gulf of Darien had alarmed the English government previous to this remonstrance; and notice had been sent to the governors of English colonies in the West Indies, and in America, that the objects of the expedition had been unknown to the king, and that the proceedings of the adventurers had not his sanction. The colonists soon found how improvident had been the arrangements for their establishment. They began severely to feel the want of food. No supply from home had reached them, for Scotland itself was suffering from a fearful deficiency of harvest. The directors of the company wrote to the unfortunate men, who relied upon a sympathy and foresight that would have left nothing wanting, "We have had scarcity of corn and provisions here since your departure hence, even to dearth, and poverty of course occasioned thereby; which, to our regret, hath necessarily retarded us in our designs of sending you such recruits as our inclination did prompt us unto." * By "recruits" they do not mean men which Scotland would have been glad to have shipped off, but provisions that the company had not the means to purchase. They had wherewithal to exchange for food, thought the directors of the company: their cargoes of axes and knives, of shoes and linen, would easily command the necessaries of life. The unhappy settlers could find no exchangers among the Indians. They had sent in vain to Jamaica to obtain supplies. In the huts which they had built pestilence found its seat, side by side with famine. The spring came. Those who remained alive resolved to abandon the land to which they had gone with such eager hopes. They sailed away, sick and feeble, in their three vessels, two of which arrived at New York and one at Jamaica with the remnant of the colonists in a state of indescribable wretchedness. Paterson, who had opposed the departure, was among their number. "I desired them," says he, "not to design, or so much as talk of, going away." The immediate cause of their despair is thus related by Paterson: "Upon the 3d day of May we dispatched the sloop brought in by Pilkington and Sands, to Jamaica, with money and other effects, in order to purchase provisions and necessaries for the colony. . . . Then we began to expect these two sloops: viz., that of Pilkington's and this from Jamaica; also that other supplies would be dropping in, till a reinforcement should come from our country. When, instead thereof, a periagua of ours returned from the coast of Carthagena, which had met with a Jamaica sloop, by whom she had the surprising news that proclamations were published against us in Jamaica, wherein it was declared that, by our settlement at Darien, we had broken the peace entered into with his majesty's allies, and therefore prohibited all his majesty's subjects from supplying, or holding any sort of correspondence with us, upon the severest penalties. And it seems the Governor of Jamaica had been so hasty and precipitant in this matter that these proclamations were published upon the Sabbath day (the like whereof had not been formerly known). But it was to prevent the going out of two sloops bound out next morning, and fraughted with provisions for Caledonia." † Certainly, a severe measure. But Defoe states, in the most unqualified terms, that "whoever has the least knowledge of the affairs of that country, and of the trade of the English colonies, must needs know that, had the Scots Company who had placed themselves at Darien, been furnished either with money or letters of credit, they had never wanted provisions, or come to any other disaster, notwithstanding the proclamations of the English against correspondence." * The whole affair has some resemblance to the expedition of Raleigh to Guiana; more resemblance to the filibustering adventures of our own day. "They," says Scott, "who thus perished for the want of the provisions for which they were willing to pay, were as much murdered by King William's government as if they had been shot in the snows of Glencoe." We are not inclined to retort uncourteously upon this ebullition of nationality, but we can scarcely avoid inquiring whether the court of directors in the city of Edinburgh—who had sent out twelve hundred men to a barren country with insufficient supplies, and in reply to their demands for aid had said, "We have had scarcity of corn and provisions here since your departure," which has prevented us doing "what our inclination did prompt us unto"—were not partakers in the alleged murder? †

In the spring and summer of 1699 the company in Scotland were enabled to do something for their colonists beyond imparting to them their kind intentions. Two vessels with provisions were sent out in May. On the 5th of June Paterson was attacked with the fever of that pestilential region. By the 10th, he says, "all the counsellors and most of the officers were on board the several ships, and I left alone on shore in a weak state." By the 18th of June the fort was abandoned, and the haste to sail away was such that the vigilance of one of the captains alone prevented the guns being left behind. But another expedition had been organized; and in September, thirteen hundred men, ignorant of the unhappy fate of those who had gone before them, set sail from Leith. When the truth became known in Scotland, of their lamentable failure in the scheme which had raised the hopes of the nation to an extravagant height, the directors assumed the warlike attitude of injured princes; sent out another squadron under military command; and ordered their officers to pay no respect to any authority but that of the secretary of state for Scotland. Those who had embarked in May arrived at Darien in the rainy or winter season, to find a scene of desolation where they expected abundance. The expedition which had left in September arrived in the latter part of the winter, when the rains were passing away: the opening of the new year is the beginning of summer in that climate. This numerous body of men, who had come with ardent expectations, but without any well-defined purpose, found themselves wanting in the immediate means of preserving life, on the barren spot where so many of their countrymen had perished. They, as well as those who had preceded them, had been insufficiently provided with a stock of food. For the most part they kept on board the vessels, quarrelling with each other, and ready for any act of mutiny. Accounts at last reached them that the Spaniards were preparing to attack the Scottish settlement with an overwhelming force. Then the old spirit of many a foray and of many a battle was roused. Campbell of Finab, who had come out with the warlike instructions of the company, led two hundred men, by a wearisome march of three days, across the Isthmus, and finding a Spanish force on the river Santa Maria, took the post by storm. The Spaniards fled from this fierce onslaught, and Campbell and his band marched triumphantly back with their spoils of war. During their absence five Spanish men-of-war had arrived. The settlement was blockaded by an overpowering naval squadron. It was surrounded by large bodies of troops by land. A surrender was inevitable. On the 18th of March the settlement was abandoned, upon terms of capitulation which had been agreed upon with the Governor of Carthagena.

The incidents which illustrate this text of Burnet—"the nation was roused into a sort of fury upon it"—would be painful, and almost revolting, to look back upon, if we were not sure that such an event as the Darien scheme could never happen again, and if the very calamity had not been productive of the greatest blessing to Scotland and England, their political, commercial, and social union. When the Scottish parliament took up the whole course of the Darien transactions in a revengeful mood—making no allowance for those trade jealousies which were as rife in Scotland as in England—looking at the position of the king as if he could govern England with his right arm upon one course of policy, and govern Scotland with his left arm upon a totally opposite course—utterly rejecting the notion that anything in the world could be of more paramount importance than the interests of a body of shareholders who had paid up two hundred thousand pounds capital, to carry forward plans which sober-judging merchants and disinterested politicians considered as symptoms of insanity—we can scarcely conceive any more effectual remedy for the national fever than the cold reserve of William. The wrongs of the Indian and African Company were echoed from the English border to the remotest North. The Jacobites were active in proclaiming the iniquity of a king who had sacrificed Scotland to preserve the Dutch possessions in the West Indies. Associations were formed to forbid the consumption of articles of English production. The Scottish parliament was not propitiated by a temperate and conciliatory message from the king, that it had been to him a deep regret that he could not agree to the assertion of the right of the company's colony in Darien; that he was fully satisfied that his yielding in this matter would have infallibly disturbed the general peace of Christendom, and have brought on a heavy war, in which he could expect no assistance. The parliament agreed to a series of resolutions, in which the national grievances of Darien were recapitulated, as if Scotland rejected all considerations of the general peace of Christendom, and stood isolated among the nations, proud and defiant. Whoever defended the king was a libeller of the nation; and to the fire of the common hangman were committed the few printed attempts to induce charity and forbearance. Such a fierce crackling of the thorns under the pot was of course soon at an end. The king appears to have been the only one who could see something bright beyond the passing smoke. The House of Lords addressed him in terms of strong condemnation of the proceedings of the colonists at Darien, and of approbation of the means adopted by the colonial governor to discourage and injure them. William, in his reply, declared that "he cannot but have a great concern and tenderness for his kingdom of Scotland, and a desire to advance their welfare and prosperity; and is very sensibly touched with the loss his subjects of that kingdom have sustained by their late unhappy expeditions, in order to a settlement at Darien. His majesty does apprehend that difficulties may too often arise with respect to the different interests of trade between his two kingdoms, unless some way be found out to unite them more nearly and completely, and therefore his majesty takes this opportunity of putting the House of Peers in mind of what he recommended to his parliament soon after his accession to the throne, that they would consider of an union between the two kingdoms."

Six or seven years passed over, during which the Darien affair was a constant source of irritation in Scotland against the English government and the English people. The East India Company had become prosperous beyond expectation, in the amalgamation of the new company with the old. The more prosperous that great association, the more jealous and angry were the Scots, who believed that their company, unless ruined by the tyranny of King William, might have opened the whole commerce of the East to their favored nation. In the negotiations for the union in 1706, the Scots commissioners clung firmly to the principle that the charters, rights, and privileges of the African and Indian Company should be maintained. The English commissioners as firmly resolved that the condition of free intercourse, which was the basis of the union, should not result in "a perfect laying open the East India trade, or at least erecting a new East India Company in Britain." * A compromise was effected in a manner which smoothed many of the difficulties which the Darien affair presented to the establishment of cordiality between Scotland and England. The lords commissioners for England—"being sensible that the misfortunes of that company have been the occasion of misunderstandings and unkindnesses between the two kingdoms, and thinking it above all things desirable that upon the union of the kingdoms the subjects of both may be entirely united in affection"—

* "History of the Union," p. 67.

† Mr. Burton's narrative of the Darien affair, in his excellent "History of Scotland, from the Revolution," is the most candid and impartial account of these transactions that has been given by any Scottish writer; and though, in our view, he scarcely makes adequate allowance for the tremendous difficulties under which William was placed, his account is not colored by that intense nationality which renders the relation of this unhappy business by Sir Walter Scott and others necessary to be received with a cautious regard to the general politics of that time, and to the condition of society in both kingdoms. Mr. Burton had the advantage of consulting the original documents "connected with this ill-fated company."

agreed to purchase the shares of the particular members of that company. The stock "had been a dead weight upon many families; the sums paid were given over as utterly sunk and lost; and after all this, to find the whole money should come in again with interest for the time, was a happy surprise to a great many families, and took off the edge of the opposition which some people would otherwise have made to the union in general." *

The patriotic aspirations of King William, in the largest sense of patriotism, for the removal of the difficulties with respect to "the different interests of trade in his two kingdoms," were slowly realized. A way was found out "to unite them more nearly and completely." In less than a quarter of a century the fatal rivalries were completely at an end. The merchants of Glasgow and the merchants of Liverpool traded upon equal terms. The two kingdoms, thus united, went forward in a career of prosperity beyond the hopes of the most ardent imagination. In a century and a half, when Great Britain had planted new colonies in regions known only as the lands of savages; when the North American plantations had amalgamated into a great republic; when the gold discoveries of California and Australia had given a new impulse to the commerce of the world—over that Isthmus of Panama where Scotland vainly attempted to establish a settlement amid the hostility of the Spanish claimants of its territory, was constructed a railway, by which the great highways of North and South America were connected by the wonder-working powers of science, devoted to the magnificent object of gradually making the human race one great family.

Question of the succession to the crown of Spain—The partition treaties—Negotiations at Loo—Correspondence of the king with his ministers—First partition treaty signed—The new parliament—The troops disbanded—William's mortification—A rash resolve and a calmer judgment—The Dutch guards dismissed—Penal law against Catholics—Portland and Albemarle—Admiral Rooke in the Baltic—Policy of Louis the Fourteenth.

In 1698 Charles II., the son of Philip IV., had been for thirty-four years King of Spain and the Indies. He had become the head of that corrupt and decaying monarchy when a child of four years of age. His early life had been spent under the tutelage of his mother, and of his illegitimate brother, Don John of Austria. He had one glimpse of happiness in his affection for his young wife, the Princess Louisa of Orleans, whom he soon lost. Under his second wife, a princess related to the emperor, he was governed as in his childish days. His body and mind were equally enfeebled. In June, 1698, Stanhope, the English ambassador, wrote from Madrid, "The name the doctors give to the disease of the king is alfereyn insensata, which sounds, in English, a stupid epilepsy." Charles had no issue. The question of the succession was very complicated. Louis XIV. had married Charles' eldest sister; but, upon their marriage, the Infanta of Spain, by a solemn contract, had renounced for herself and her successors all claim to the Spanish crown. The Emperor Leopold had married a younger sister, and she had made a similar renunciation. Her daughter had married the Elector of Bavaria, and their son, the electoral prince, was the inheritor of whatever claim his mother might have upon the Spanish crown; for her renunciation was considered of none effect from not having been confirmed by the Cortes, as the renunciation of the elder sister had been. The emperor himself was a claimant to the succession in his own person, for he was the grandson of Philip III. of Spain, and first cousin to Charles II. Thus the legitimate heir, the Dauphin of France, was barred by that renunciation of his mother which was considered valid. The next in order of inheritance, the Electoral Prince of Bavaria, had a less doubtful claim, for his mother's renunciation was held invalid. The emperor, who was farthest removed in blood, was not fettered by any contracts. We can readily understand how, with this complication of interests, the question of the Spanish succession influenced the political combinations of Europe. We can also understand the deep anxiety which William felt, when he saw what an opening would be presented by the death of the King of Spain to the realization of the most ambitious projects of France. This was no chimerical dread, in which William stood apart from the people he governed. His most anxious hours had been given to discussions with Tallard, the French ambassador, of the terms of a treaty which would reconcile these conflicting claims. But in May, 1698, Tallard wrote to Louis that the English nation "consider the partition of the succession of the King of Spain as something in which they must take a part. . . . They conceive that their commerce and its interests are at stake, and that it would be ruined if your majesty were in possession of the Indies and Cadiz. . . . You may rely upon it that they would resolve on a war, if it were suggested to them that your majesty desires to render yourself master of the countries which I have just named, and if the King of Spain were to die before a treaty had been made." * Although William readily went into negotiations with France for a partition treaty, he had a deep conviction that the question of succession would not be decided by diplomacy. He said to Tallard, "that it was much to be feared that it would be necessary to have recourse to the sword before it could be settled." He desired peace, he added; he was old and worn out; he should be very glad to enjoy repose. But France was alone to be feared, and he could be guided by no other rule than the interests of the kingdoms which he governed.†

The scheme of a partition of the vast dominions of the crown of Spain unquestionably originated with the court of France. It had been hinted to Heinsius by the French ambassadors, before the beginning of 1698. It was formally proposed to Portland soon after his arrival in Paris, as "a thing of the greatest importance, and which demanded the greatest secrecy." The truth of history is not substantially violated by the humorist, who has so capitally described the compact between Lewis Baboon, John Bull, and Nic Frog: "My worthy friends, quoth Louis, henceforth let us live neighborly. I am as peaceable and quiet as a lamb of my own temper, but it has been my misfortune to live among quarrelsome neighbors. There is but one thing can make us fall out, and that is the inheritance of Lord Strutt's estate. I am content, for peace sake, to waive my right, and submit to any expedient to prevent a lawsuit. I think an equal division will be the fairest way." ‡ John Bull, then represented by "a little long-nosed thin man," thought Louis an honest fellow who would stand by his bargain. It would be scarcely worth while here to pursue the story of treaties that were broken through like cobwebs, if the negotiations only exhibited the folly and danger of that diplomacy which attempts to settle the destinies of peoples by regard alone to the interests of crowns. "It was the fashion to do such things," says the satirist.§ The fashion, unhappily, is not quite obsolete. But there was one essential difference between the partition treaties which William negotiated with Louis, and later treaties, in which the word partition is another term for robbery: "an equal division" had no reference to the especial advantage of England or the States-General, beyond their protection against the first imminent danger of a vast addition to the power of France, or the secondary danger of a similar addition to the power of Austria. William, as King of England and as stadtholder, negotiated these treaties upon purely defensive principles. "I have had the honor," says Defoe, "to hear his majesty speak of these things at large; and I appeal to all those noble persons now living, who were near the king at that time, who I believe often heard him express himself with great caution as to the giving too much to the empire, as equally dangerous to the public peace with giving it to France." ‖ The partition treaties are associated with the subsequent policy of Europe; and they require a little more consideration to understand the objects with which William entered upon them, than is necessary to pronounce that "a more infamous proceeding is not recorded in history." ¶

As the summer of 1698 was approaching, the king contemplated his usual journey to Holland. Tallard wrote to Louis that this intention gave much uneasiness to the nation. The French ambassador saw clearly the difficulties with which William was surrounded: "The King of England is very far from being master here. . . . So much is certain, that the situation of the king is still very precarious, and that the moment which has given repose to all the world has been but the beginning of troubles to this prince."* William went to the country where he was venerated: "His countenance was expressive of the joy which he felt at going to Holland. He took no pains whatever to conceal it from the English; and, to say the truth, they speak very openly about it."† Tallard was invited to follow the king, and the negotiations were resumed at Loo. On the 24th of August they were arrived at such maturity that Portland was authorized by the king to write to Mr. Secretary Vernon, to impart to him the proposed conditions of a treaty: "You may speak to my lord chancellor about it, to whom the king himself writes by this post, that he would likewise talk about it with those he thinks he may trust with the secret, which it is of the highest importance to keep with the utmost care." In the letter of the king to Somers he refers to the fact that the chancellor had been previously apprised by him of the inclination that had been expressed by the court of France "to come to an agreement with us concerning the succession of the King of Spain." Since that time Count Tallard had made certain propositions which Portland had communicated to Vernon, for the purpose of Somers deciding to whom else they should be imparted, "to the end," says the king, "that I might know your opinion upon so important an affair, and which requires the greatest secrecy." William then adds, "If it be fit this negotiation should be carried on, there is no time to be lost, and you will send me the full powers, under the great seal, with the names in blank, to treat with Count Tallard."‡ Vernon, the secretary of state, in reply to Portland, rejoices that there is a prospect of avoiding a war when we are in so ill a condition at present for entering into it again. At this present time, August 20th, Orford, one of the ministers, wrote to Shrewsbury: "Here is no news, but that we daily expect to hear the King of Spain is dead. What will become of us then, God knows. I do not see the king has made any provision for such an accident."§ The king had been laboring for months to make such provision. Somers was in ill-health at Tunbridge Wells when these important dispatches arrived from Loo. By his direction their contents were communicated to Shrewsbury, Orford, and Montague. On the 8th of September Somers wrote to the king an elaborate letter, conveying their joint opinions. They thought that the proposal would be attended with ill consequences, "if the French did not act a sincere part." But they were fully assured that the king "would not act but with the utmost nicety in an affair wherein the glory and safety of Europe were so highly concerned." They thought that there was little hope of preventing France taking possession of Spain, "before any other prince could be able to make a stand," in case nothing was done to provide against the accident of the death of the King of Spain, "which seemed probably to be so very near." They were convinced that the nation was "not at all disposed to the thought of entering into a new war, and that they seem to be tired out with taxes to a degree beyond what was discerned, till it appeared upon the occasion of the late elections." They had doubts upon some of the points of the proposed treaty; but they could not expect that France would "quit its pretences to so great a succession without considerable advantages." Their last conviction is very characteristic of a humbler policy than William contemplated: "If it could be brought to pass that England might be in some way a gainer by this transaction—whether it was by the Elector of Bavaria (who is gainer by your majesty's interposition in this treaty), coming to an agreement to let us in to some trade to the Spanish plantations, or in any other manner, it would wonderfully endear your majesty to your English subjects." The lord chancellor makes not the slightest objection to sending the king a blank commission. "I should be extremely troubled if my absence from London has delayed the dispatch of the commission one day." He adds in a postscript: "The commission is wrote by Mr. Secretary; and I have had it sealed in such a manner that no creature has the least knowledge of the thing, besides the persons named." Before this commission arrived, William had signed the draft of the treaty, with a note at the foot, "in which he declares it to be converted into a treaty, if the King of Spain should die before the exchange of ratifications." So writes Tallard to Louis on the 9th of Septem[illegible]g to [illegible]tion. stating that the treaty itself would not be signed till the 29th of t[illegible]rien month, partly because the full powers had not arrived, on account [illegible]ose the absence of the chancellor from London. Tallard conjectu[illegible]ok- that the most essential reason for the delay was, that the king "wou[illegible]ith not have it known by a date, either in England or in the Hague, that[illegible] a treaty had been signed before they (William's ministers) had been consulted."* Doubtless the king acted unconstitutionally in concluding the terms of a treaty without waiting for the advice of responsible ministers, although it was only a temporary measure. Doubtless, also, the chancellor acted unconstitutionally in sending a blank commission under the great seal, for the appointment of commissioners to conclude a treaty upon the king's sole authority. Lord Campbell states these facts in terms which are scarcely too strong to be employed by a constitutional lawyer of the nineteenth century. But we cannot think that the learned historian of the chancellors is warranted in saying that "Lord Somers so far acted properly that he immediately communicated this letter to four of his colleagues, and they all agreeing with him as to the inexpediency of the treaty, he sent their explicit opinion to the king, with the reasons on which it is founded." We have given an abstract of that "explicit opinion," which is very far from setting forth the "inexpediency of the treaty." When Somers tells the king that the people of England will not sanction a war, and that, knowing this fact, "your majesty will determine what resolutions are proper to be taken," he clearly sanctions a negotiation whose sole purpose was to avert a war. When he tells the king "we are all assured your majesty will reduce the terms as low as can be done, and make them, as far as possible in the present circumstances of things, such as may be some foundation for the future quiet of Christendom," he distinctly sanctions the general expediency of such a treaty. The whole tone of the dispatch is to the effect that the king was a better judge of such matters than the advisers of his domestic policy. He had always been his own minister for foreign affairs; and the urgency of the case furnishes in some degree an excuse for his unconstitutional rejection of ministerial responsibility. Lord Campbell, we venture to think, is more rhetorical than just when he asks, "If the government was to be carried on by the sovereign's personal exercise of the prerogative, what had been gained by the revolution?"† Two years and a half later the constitutional question was more fully raised in the impeachment of Somers. This treaty, known as the first partition treaty, was definitively signed at the Hague on the 11th of October by the Earl of Portland and Sir Joseph Williamson, as the two commissioners whose names were inserted in the blank space of the commission sent by Somers. Without entering into minute details, it may be sufficient to state that in the treaty was stipulated that the kingdom of Spain, with the Indies and the Netherlands, should be assigned to the electoral Prince of Bavaria; that Naples and Sicily should belong to the Dauphin of France; and that the Duchy of Milan should be allotted to the Archduke Charles, the second son of the emperor. These territorial arrangements were rendered in great part nugatory by an event which occurred only four months after the first partition treaty had been signed. The electoral Prince of Bavaria, then in his eighth year, died on the 5th of February, 1699. He had been named by the King of Spain as his successor, by a will made in 1698, with a condition that the vast Spanish dominions should not be dissevered. The partition treaty had become known. William, upon the death of the young prince, keenly felt the embarrassment of his position. He had been persuaded not to communicate the treaty to Spain or to the emperor. On the 10th of February he wrote to Heinsius, "I cannot comprehend how we shall ever be able to declare our having intended the succession to the monarchy for the elector of Bavaria, and still less to communicate it to the imperial court; so that we are in no small labyrinth, and may it please God to help us out of it." The mode of getting out of the labyrinth was to construct a new labyrinth. The plan of construction was somewhat less complex than the first design. There were now only two claimants to the succession, whose interests had to be accommodated. The second partition treaty, which was concluded in 1700, gave Spain, the agre , and the Netherlands, to the Archduke Charles. The Bourcon were now to have the Milanese, or an equivalent territory, in ilie tion to the arrangements of the former treaty. When Somers aft his letter to the king said that the entertaining the proposal of the ter treaty "seems to be attended with very many ill consequences an he French did not act a sincere part," he gave a warning which o illiam did not then heed, but which was ultimately found to con in something of prophetic wisdom. When Louis, upon the death f the King of Spain, broke through the whole spirit of the two treaties by seizing the Spanish crown for his grandson, William, with an honest candor, wrote to Heinsius, "We must confess we are dupes; but if one's word and faith are not to be kept, it is easy to cheat any man." * But at any rate those who acted for England and Holland were honest dupes. They sought no personal gain; they sought no national acquisition. They endeavored to prevent by negotiation what it required years of warfare less effectually to prevent—the union of Spain to the crown of France. Upon the authority of a modern French writer, one who ought to aim at historical accuracy has ventured to say, "By secret articles attached to this treaty, the Spanish colonies beyond seas were to be divided between England and Holland." † Had even the commerce with the Spanish colonies been secured by the partition treaties to England and Holland, the Commons, who in their impeachment of Somers declared that the "treaties were evidently destructive to the trade of this realm," would have hailed the king and his chancellor as the saviors of the country.

The new parliament—chosen as Somers said in his letter on the Partition Treaty, under a state of public opinion which showed "a deadness and want of spirit in the nation universally"—assembled on the 6th of December, 1698. William only arrived in England two days earlier: and before he delivered his speech he wrote to Heinsius, "It is impossible to foresee what will be the upshot of this session; but notwithstanding the short time I have been here I clearly perceive that my greatest difficulty will be in retaining the troops." Nevertheless he did not shrink from repeating the idea which he had constantly endeavored to enforce since the peace of Ryswick, that it was dangerous wholly to disarm. In his speech to the house he now said, "I have no doubt that you are met together with hearts fully disposed to do what is necessary for the safety, honor, and happiness of the kingdom; and that is all I have to ask of you." They had to consider what strength ought to be maintained at sea, and what force kept up on land for this year. "The flourishing of trade, the supporting of credit, and the quiet of people's minds at home, will depend upon the opinion they have of their security; and to preserve to England the weight and influence it has at present in the councils and affairs abroad, it will be requisite that Europe should see you are not wanting to yourselves." Edmund Burke, in quoting this last sentence, describes it as proceeding from a ruler "full of the idea of preserving, not only a local civil liberty united with order, to our country; but to embody it in the political liberty, the order, and the independence of nations united under a natural head." ‡ The predominant idea of William, in the view of the same philosophical statesman was, at this very time, "to compose, to reconcile, to unite, and to discipline all Europe against the growth of France." § This factious and prejudiced parliament could not comprehend the high aims of the man who had delivered England from the degradation which has been so truly described by an illustrious Frenchman. "While Charles II. and James II. reigned, England had belonged [avait appartenu] to Louis the XIVth." ‖ The Commons met William's exhortations with unusual discourtesy. They voted no address in answer to the speech from the throne; and they passed a resolution that all the land forces of England, in English pay, exceeding seven thousand men, should be forthwith paid and disbanded; that the seven thousand should consist of natural born subjects; and that all the forces exceeding twelve thousand men in Ireland, these also natural born subjects, should be paid and disbanded. This resolution was carried on the 16th of December, on a motion made by Harley, the leader of the Tory party. The Whig ministry made a very feeble attempt to resist it; and the king had the bitter mortification of beholding himself humiliated in the eyes of Europe, and of being personally outraged by being deprived of his Dutch guard, and of the faithful Huguenots—both the companions of his toils and dangers during a war of nine years. Truly has it been said, these troops "had claims which a generous and grateful people should not have forgotten: they were many of them the chivalry of Protestantism, the Huguenot gentlemen who had lost all but their swords in a cause which we deemed our own; they were the men who terrified James from Whitehall, and brought about a deliverance which, to speak plainly, we had neither sense nor courage to achieve for ourselves." * The bill for disbanding the troops was carried through with unusual rapidity. Tallard, who had come to England, wrote to Louis, "The House of Commons has acted as in a fury." The agony of mind which the king endured overthrew, for once in that troubled life, entirely his wonderful command of temper and self-sacrificing discretion. He came to the resolution of abandoning the government of England, and of declaring the same to the parliament. Somers, in a letter to Shrewsbury, says, "When he first mentioned this to me, I treated the notion as the most extravagant and absurd that ever was entertained, and begged of him to speak of it to nobody, for his own honor. . . . The last time I saw him he would not suffer me to argue with him, telling me plainly he saw we should never agree, and he was resolved. I told him I hoped he would take the seal from me before he did it; that I had it from him, when he was king, and desired he would receive it from me while he was so." ‡ Somers at first thought the threat of William was "as an appearance only, and to provoke us to exert ourselves." There is ample confirmation that he was thoroughly in earnest, in a passage of a letter to Heinsius: "I am so chagrined at what passes in the lower house with regard to the troops that I can scarce turn my thoughts to any other matter. I foresee that I shall be obliged to come to resolutions of extremity, and that I shall see you in Holland sooner than I thought." In the British Museum there is a document of singular interest—a speech written in William's own hand in French, which he intended to deliver to the parliament. ‡ The following is a translation of the plain words of this characteristic address:

"My lords and gentlemen, I came to this kingdom, at the desire of this nation, to save it from ruin, and to preserve your religion, your laws, and liberties; and for that end I have been obliged to maintain a long and burdensome war for this kingdom; which, by the grace of God, and the bravery of this nation, is at present ended in a good peace; under which you may live happily and in quiet, provided you will contribute to your own security, in the manner I had recommended to you at the opening of the session. But seeing, to the contrary, that you have so little regard to my advice, and that you take no manner of care of your own security, and that you expose yourselves to evident ruin, by divesting yourselves of the only means for your defence, it would not be just nor reasonable that I should be witness of your ruin, not being able to do anything of myself to avoid it, it not being in my power to defend and protect you, which was the only view I had in coming into this country. Therefore, I am obliged to recommend to you to choose and name to me such persons as you shall judge most proper, to whom I may leave the administration of the government in my absence; assuring you, that, though I am at present forced to withdraw myself out of the kingdom, I shall always preserve the same inclination to its advantages and prosperity. And when I can judge that my presence will be necessary for your defence, I shall be ready to return, and hazard myself for your security, as I have formerly done; beseeching the good God to bless your deliberations, and to inspire you with all that is necessary for the good and welfare of the kingdom."

The equal mind soon came back to this extraordinary man. In a few weeks Portland told Tallard that the king "preferred calmness and mildness to what appeared best for his own interest." The King of France, who was shrewdly suspected of having stimulated some of this factious fury in the Commons by the old system of bribes, looked upon the fray with very much of the spirit attributed to the great tempter of evil. In the French archives there is a dispatch of Louis to Tallard, in which the crafty king, reverting to his practices when England was under the Stuarts, says, "In this conjunction it might be proper to assist him [William] to do without the help of his people; and I would do so with pleasure, if, by such means, it were possible to induce that prince to treat with me for the sum which I should give him for the principality of Orange. . . . He would secure his authority in England, and consequently the happiness and tranquillity of his life, by finding means to do without the assistance of parliament." * There is no evidence that this atrocious temptation was offered to William at the time when he said, "matters in parliament are taking a turn which drives me mad," nor at any other time. Tallard had a better knowledge of William's character than his presumptuous master possessed. "He is honorable in all he does; his conduct is sincere; he is proud, none can be more so, though with a modest manner." Such were the terms in which the ambassador spoke of William. He would not have dared to insult this proud and honorable man with a proposal to sell himself to France, that he might become a despot in England. The "calmness and mildness" which the king had resolved to pursue were so signally displayed that his conduct toward the parliament has been called "the meanest act of his reign," and "below his greatness." † He gave his assent to the Disbanding Bill in these words: "I am come to pass the bill for disbanding the army as soon as I understood it was ready for me. Though, in our present circumstances, there appears great hazard in breaking such a number of troops; and though I might think myself unkindly used, that those guards who came over with me to your assistance, and have constantly attended me in all the actions wherein I have been engaged, should be removed from me; yet it is my fixed opinion that nothing can be so fatal to us as that any distrust or jealousy should arise between me and my people." Secretary Vernon sent a copy of the speech to Shrewsbury, and said, "Many people seemed moved with it, and express an inclination to gratify the king in continuing the Dutch guards." On the 18th of March William sent this message to the Commons: "His majesty is pleased to let the house know that the necessary preparations are made for transporting the guards who came with him into England; and that he intends to send them away immediately, unless, out of consideration to him, the house be disposed to find a way for continuing them longer in his service, which his majesty would take very kindly." The house would not even appoint a committee to consider the message, but drew up an address which William, in a letter to Heinsius, called "very impertinent." The king was bluntly told "that nothing conduces more to the happiness and welfare of this kingdom than an entire confidence between his majesty and his people, which could no way be so firmly established as by intrusting his sacred person with his own subjects." The king's answer to this address was a model of forbearance: "I came hither to restore the ancient constitution of this government. I have had all possible regard to it since my coming, and I am resolved through the course of my reign to preserve it entire in all the parts of it." The House of Commons had the power under the constitution of determining the amount of the army by limiting the supplies for its maintenance; and the constitutional king accepted its decision. Mr. Hallam judiciously rejects what he calls "the vulgar story which that retailer of all gossip, Dalrymple, calls a well-authenticated tradition, that the king walked furiously round his room exclaiming, 'If I had a son, by God the guards should not leave me.'" His real temper was far more characteristically displayed in a letter to Galway, in which he says, "I am afraid the good God will punish the ingratitude of this nation." A rash man, with a despotic tendency, might have provoked another civil war, by retaining the Dutch guards, and by bringing over other Dutch guards. William was wiser. He said to the Commons, in his reply to their insulting address, in the hour in which his health and spirit sank under the indignity offered him, "It shall be my study to the utmost of my power to perform the part of a just and a good king; and as I will ever be strictly and nicely careful of observing my promise to my subjects, so I will not doubt of their tender regards to me."

The Commons had carried their jealousy of a standing army, and their hatred of foreigners, to the very verge of political disorganization. The kingdom was left almost entirely without military force. Credit was destroyed by no sum being voted for the discharge of debt; for it was in vain that William had said at the opening of the session, "I think an English parliament can never make such a mistake as not to hold sacred all parliamentary engagements." The political machine had come to a dead lock. Tallard wrote to Louis, "Till the session of parliament is closed there is no hope of being able to advance a step in anything that is wanted to be done, of what nature soever." Nevertheless—setting aside the obvious conclusion that patriotism had a great deal less to do with the temper of the Commons toward the king than the blindness of faction, perfectly reckless in its opposition to his policy of preserving to England its weight and influence in foreign affairs—there was a deep substratum of English spirit beneath all this violence. Tallard had the sense to perceive how deceived Louis would be if he fancied these dissensions opened to him any prospect of bringing back the nation to its old subjection to his will: "Though the affairs of this country are in this state, I must warn your majesty that if the least circumstance should occur which inspired them with jealousy, and if means should be found to persuade them that they ought to be on their guard, the same spirit of liberty and of fickleness which induces them to do all that I have had the honor to intimate to your majesty, would determine them to give their last penny for their defence, or to prevent what they should believe to be injurious to them." * Unchanged and unchangeable England!

The parliament was prorogued on the 4th of May, after having passed a bill which had a personal bearing on the king's exercise of the prerogative. It was to appoint a commission to inquire into the extent of Irish forfeitures of estates, "in order to their being applied in ease of the subjects of England." This measure was tacked to a money-bill, so that it could not be discussed in the House of Lords or rejected by the crown. The king had granted some of these estates to Portland, Albemarle and other favorites, and a very natural and proper jealousy was excited. In previous parliaments a measure for the public appropriation of the lands had been successfully resisted. Nine years before this session the king had undertaken to make no grants till the principle of the application of forfeitures had been determined. But the interference of parliament having ceased, the lands were granted to various persons; "it being an undoubted branch of the royal prerogative that all confiscations accrued to the crown, and might be granted away at the pleasure of the king." This is the doctrine held by Burnet. In the next session of parliament, which commenced on the 16th of November, 1699, the commissioners of inquiry presented their report. The grants made by the king, in spite of the exaggerations of the report, were very enormous. A bill of resumption was brought in, by which the whole of the Irish forfeitures were to be applied to the public uses. In a measure which the Lords had rejected eight years before, one third was to be reserved for the disposal of the king. The present measure was certain to be carried by the Tory majority in the Commons. The Whigs moved an amendment, to resume all grants of lands and revenues of the crown made since the 6th of February, 1684—the date of the accession of James II. This was a much more sweeping resumption than the opponents of William contemplated. But they had the decency not to resist its adoption. The Commons again tacked the Resumption Bill to a money-bill, and fierce disputes ensued between the two houses. The king, though bitterly mortified by the measure itself, saw the extreme peril of any conflict upon such a question, and exerted himself to get the bill passed by the Lords. He gave his assent to it, and immediately prorogued the parliament. The Commons were preparing a resolution that an address should be presented to the king, "that no person, not a native, except the Prince of Denmark, should be admitted to his councils in England or Ireland." The prorogation prevented this last personal affront. Somers, the only one of the Whig ministers that William had retained, now quitted office. The triumphant Tories succeeded in effecting his removal, although they could not succeed in blackening his character by a vote of the House of Commons.

This house, so furious in its hostility to the crown, passed the most disgraceful law of this reign. The tolerant disposition of William had in England made the old penal laws against papists in many respects a dead letter. Tallard wrote to his court in 1698 that the Catholic religion "is here tolerated more openly that it was even in the time of King Charles II.; and it seems evident that the King of England has determined to leave it in peace, in order to secure his own." The "Act for the further preventing the growth of popery" recites that there has been a greater resort into this kingdom than formerly, of popish bishops, priests, and Jesuits. Any person apprehending and prosecuting to conviction any such bishop, priest, or Jesuit, for saying mass, or exercising any priestly function, is to receive a reward of a hundred pounds. The punishment for such convicted persons, or for a papist keeping a school, is to be perpetual imprisonment. Every person educated in the popish religion, upon attaining the age of eighteen, to take the oaths of allegiance and supremacy, and subscribe the declaration against transubstantiation and the worship of saints, and in default of such oath and subscription is declared incapable of purchasing lands, or of inheriting lands under any devise or limitation, the next of kin, being a Protestant, to enjoy such devised lands during life."* Many old and wealthy Catholic landowners would necessarily come under the penalties of this atrocious law. But it is satisfactory to know that the chief object of the statute, which was to drive out these proprietors, was defeated, in most cases, by the more liberal spirit of the time. "The judges," says Mr. Hallam, "put such constructions upon the clause of forfeiture as eluded its efficacy; and, I believe, there were scarce any instances of a loss of property under this law."

To be governed by favorites is the most dangerous position in which a sovereign can be placed. To lavish gifts upon favorites is almost as dangerous even to a sovereign like William, who was not very likely to be governed by any man. The resumption of the Irish grants was a severe lesson to the king. It was very quickly followed by such a manifestation of the jealousy of Portland toward Albemarle as must have taught William that it is scarcely safe for the very highest in station to have any absorbing friendships, such as private men may indulge in. Burnet says that Portland observed the favor of the king for Albemarle with great uneasiness. "He could not bear the visible superiority in favor that the other was grown up to; so he took occasion, from a small preference that was given him, in prejudice of his own post, as groom of the stole, and upon it withdrew from court, and laid down all his employments." The letters of William to Portland, written about the time of the termination of the stormy session of 1699, exhibit a warmth of feeling very different from the supposed coldness of his nature: "Not to enter into a long dispute with you, on the subject of your retirement, I will say nothing to you about it, but I cannot help expressing my extreme grief at it, which is greater than you can imagine; and I am convinced if you felt half as much, you would soon change your resolution. . . . I conjure you to come and see me as often as you can, which will be a great consolation to me, in the affliction which you cause me, not being able to help loving you most tenderly as before." William succeeded, after much importunity, in obtaining the consent of Portland to continue the negotiations for the second partition treaty: "I cannot help telling you that the welfare and the repose of all Europe may depend upon the negotiation which you have in hand with Count Tallard."

The passing of the act for disbanding the army and the reduction of the navy by a vote of the Commons left England in a very weakened condition for internal defence, or for preserving to England its weight and influence in affairs abroad. Yet the king did not abate one jot of his resolution to maintain the attitude before Europe that belonged to the states which he governed. England and Holland were under treaties of alliance with Sweden, and were bound to render her assistance should she be attacked. The king, Charles the Twelfth, was only in his eighteenth year, and it seemed a favorable opportunity for the King of Denmark, the Elector of Saxony and King of Poland, and the Czar of Russia, to form a league against him for the dismemberment of Sweden. The young hero threw himself into the affray with that characteristic energy which afterward astonished the world; and he called upon England and Holland to assist him. The King of Denmark had insolently declared that now the King of England was unsupported by his parliament, he would be able to do little in Europe. "I will teach the King of Denmark," said William, "that I can yet do something." He would ask for no vote from parliament: he "apprehended," says Burnet, "that some of them might endeavor to put an affront upon him, and oppose the sending a fleet into the Sound." He did do something. He sent an armament of English and Dutch ships into the Baltic, under the command of Sir George Rooke, when his remonstrances to Denmark and the other powers were unheeded. Rooke formed a junction with the Swedish fleet, and they drove the Danish navy into Copenhagen. Charles exerted himself with wonderful spirit, and prepared with his allies for a siege of the Danish capital. Frederick IV. of Denmark now professed his willingness to accept the mediation of England and Holland; and a treaty of peace was signed under their guarantee. "The king's conduct on this whole matter was highly applauded. He effectually protected the Swedes, and yet obliged them to accept of reasonable terms of peace."* The King of England, with his eight thousand soldiers and his seven thousand sailors, had manifested a spirit which was probably as impressive upon the minds of European statesmen as the ostentatious array of sixty thousand troops in the camp of Compiègne by the King of France. St. Simon has described this wonderful pageant as he alone could describe the prodigal ostentation of the court of Louis. He resolved to show all Europe, which believed that his resources were exhausted by a long war, that in the midst of profound peace he was as fully prepared as ever for arms. "He wanted to convince the world," says the compiler of the "Life of James II.," that he had concluded the peace "more out of a Christian motive than the want of money." To present a superb spectacle to Madame de Maintenon he announced that he counted upon seeing the troops look their best. The officers vied with each other in the finery of their dresses and the magnificence of their banquets. The temporary houses were furnished with all the splendor of the Parisian saloons. Marshal Boufflers kept open table at all hours. Every luxury which the epicures of France could desire was brought to the camp by unnumbered express carriages. The king showered gratuities of hundreds and thousands of francs upon the officers, according to their several degrees. These gifts were a very small compensation for the extravagant expenditure which the king had stimulated. "There was not a single regiment, officers and men, that was not ruined for several years." Twenty years afterward, says St. Simon, some of the regiments were still in difficulties from this cause. "Truly did the king astonish Europe. But at what a cost!" When sovereigns, as well as private men, rush into prodigal expenditure to convince the world that they have no "want of money," the real want is pretty sure to overtake them. Louis had to endure this bitter experience in his subsequent humiliation. His suffering people had to endure such poverty and privations as never can be the lot of an active and industrious nation, but through misgovernment and false ambition.

There can be little doubt that at this time, when Louis was carrying on the solemn farce of negotiating a second treaty with William for securing the peace of Europe, he was organizing that system of intrigue in Spain which had for its object to make himself the virtual head of two great monarchies, and as such the powerful enemy of that Protestantism which it had been the chief object of his recent years to subject to the most atrocious persecution in his own realms. He had passed from a life of profligacy to a life of the most ostentatious piety. When, as Saint Simon records, the officers of Compiègne looked on with wonder as he walked with the most profound reverence at the side of the sedan-chair of Madame de Maintenon, he was testifying his homage to the devout widow of Scarron, who had become the keeper of his conscience. He had no qualms when he committed the atrocity of the revocation of the Edict of Nantes; for his ambition was to destroy heresy, and compel all his subjects to return to the bosom of the Church. The massacres, the imprisonments, the banishments, that attended this frightful persecution, touched not his heart, for he was manifesting his devotion to the great cause of Catholicism. He contemplated with no nice sense of honor the probable issue of intrigues which would lead him to break his faith to England and Holland; for were they not Protestant countries, and was not the head of them a heretic, who kept out the rightful Catholic king? It was the great monarch who set the fashion in all things—in religion as in dress. He fancied that it was for him to make the court and the nation devout; and the mask was put on for a time by the court and nation. Addison writes to Halifax from Paris, in October, 1699, "As for the present state of learning, there is nothing published here which has not in it an air of devotion. Dacier has been forced to prove his Plato a very good Christian before he ventures to translate him, and has so far complied with the taste of the age that his whole book is overrun with texts of Scripture, and the notion of pre-existence supposed to be stolen from two verses out of the prophets. Nay, the humor is grown so universal that 'tis got among the poets, who are every day publishing legends and lives of saints in rhyme."* After this sacred literature came Voltaire; after this courtly holiness came the regency.

CHAPTER CXXXIII.

A Tory administration—Death of the Duke of Gloucester—The Electress Sophia, of Hanover—Death of the King of Spain—Will of Charles, which Louis accepts—The new parliament—The king asks assistance for the states—The act of settlement—Impeachment of Somers and other Whigs—The Kentish petition—The legion memorial—The great alliance formed by William—Death of King James—Louis declares the son of James King of England—William opens his last parliament—His accident—His message on the union—Death of William the Third—Note: The Act of Settlement.

After the prorogation of parliament in April, the king, contrary to his usual custom, passed three months in England. He had gone through what he described as "the most dismal session I ever had;" and he had no resource but to aim at the neutralization of the violence of the Tory party by opening to them most of the chief employments of the state. But it is evident that there was a great unwillingness in the minds of reflecting men to deem such arrangements likely to be permanent. No lawyer of eminence would accept the great seal; and after a month's delay it was given to Sergeant Wright, as lord keeper. Secretary Vernon wrote to the Duke of Shrewsbury that "when the sergeant took the seals, he did it with a foresight that he should not hold them long, and therefore intended to move his majesty that his compliance might not turn to his prejudice by any change."† Sunderland was laboring—whether honestly or in his old intriguing spirit it would be difficult to say—to effect the return of Somers to the high office which he had so ably filled. Montague wrote to Somers that, according to the report of Vernon, "Lord Sunderland has found out a method whereby the seal may again be put in your hands." But he adds, "this seems only like a shift of Lord Sunderland to lessen the odium"—that is, the odium excited by the dismissal of Somers.‡ The violent hatreds of the rival factions rendered it very difficult for the king to conduct the government upon any settled principles. William quaintly observes in one of his letters, "We must always say here, like the newspapers, 'time will show.'" But these rivalries also made the most able and honest of the king's advisers shrink from the responsibility of office. Shrewsbury, during the next parliament, when the violence of party had reached its climax, wrote to Somers, "I wonder that a man can be found in England, who has bread, that will be concerned in public business. Had I a son, I would sooner breed him a cobbler than a courtier, and a hangman than a statesman."§

The summer and autumn of 1700 were productive of events of the greatest importance to the future of England. On the 30th of July the Duke of Gloucester, the only one remaining of the seventeen children of the Princess Anne, died at Windsor, after a short illness. He had just entered upon his twelfth year, his birthday having been celebrated six days previous to his decease. Burnet had been the preceptor of the young prince for two years. The king sent a message to the princess "that he put the whole management of her son's household into her hands, but that he owed the care of his education to himself and his people, and therefore would name the persons for that purpose."* When he named Burnet as preceptor to the prince, he also named Marlborough as his governor. Burnet has recorded the system of education which he pursued. He "read over the Psalms, Proverbs, and Gospels with him," and gave copious explanation; so that he "came to understand things relating to religion beyond imagination." To divinity the bishop added geography; forms of government in every country; the interests and trade of each nation; the history of "all the great revolutions that had been in the world;" and the explanation of "the Gothic constitution and the beneficiary and feudal laws." Burnet says the prince "had gone through much weakness, and some years of ill health." This loading of the mind of a weakly boy with so much of that knowledge which belongs to riper years, instead of giving him a more complete possession of the keys of knowledge, had probably reference to the fact that "the king ordered five of his chief ministers to come once a quarter and examine the progress he had made." Something more of spontaneous application would perhaps have been a wiser system. Lady Jane Grey enjoyed reading Plato; but we doubt if the poor Duke of Gloucester had much enjoyment, or much profit, in puzzling over "the Gothic constitution and the beneficiary and feudal laws." He was to display "his knowledge and the good understanding which appeared in him," at the quarterly examinations. Had he been construing Virgil, and playing in the fields of Eton, instead of hearing his worthy preceptor talk of these abtruse things "near three hours a day," as they moped about on Windsor Terrace, that event might not have occurred which made the Jacobites "grow insolent upon it, and say, now the chief difficulty was removed out of the way of the Prince of Wales' succession;" and which, on the other hand, "turned the eyes of all the Protestants in the nation toward the Electress of Brunswick."†

William had not left the country more than three weeks when this unforeseen calamity rendered it necessary to take serious thoughts of the English succession. Politicians in England were anxiously discussing this matter. "The house of Hanover is much spoken of. The objection is, 'What! must we have more foreigners?'"‡ The Electress Sophia of Hanover was the last surviving child of Elizabeth Stuart, the daughter of James I., and of Frederic, the Elector-Palatine, who accepted the crown of Bohemia. Sophia, or Sophie, their twelfth child and fifth daughter, was born in 1630, and thus was in her seventieth year when the question arose as to the Protestant succession of England. In 1658 she married Ernest Augustus, who became Duke of Hanover in 1679 and elector in 1692. Her eldest son, George Lewis, became Elector of Hanover in 1698, when in his 38th year. The Princess Sophia was a lady of unusual talent and knowledge, the friend of many learned men whom she collected around her in her court, but no female pedant, being distinguished as much for her good sense and refined manners as for her various acquirements.§ The electress had been visited by William in 1699, and now she came to Loo, to return the visit, at the time when the interests of her family were thus affected by the death of the Duke of Gloucester. The Princess Sophia, with her large experience and keen observation, saw not only the advantages but the difficulties that were opened by this prospect. There is a very curious letter from her, written in French, to George Stepney, who, by the grace of Doctor Johnson, is counted among the English poets, and by the friendship of Charles Montague was a busy diplomatist in the German courts. The electress says that if she were thirty years younger she has a sufficiently good opinion of her blood and her religion to believe that people might think of her in England. But as there is little likelihood that she should survive two persons, William and Anne, it is to be feared that her sons will be regarded as strangers. She hints that the son of James II., who would be glad to recover what his father had lost, might be made what was desirable—that is, might be led to change his religion. She does not look enthusiastically at the prospect before her own family; for, she wisely says, "it seems to me that in England there are so many factions that one can be secure in nothing." * The English Jacobites were acting upon the prospect of the succession of the Prince of Wales, and sent over a representative to St. Germains to propose that he should be educated in England—we presume after the death of William. Lord Manchester, the English ambassador, wrote to Vernon, "the changing his religion will never be suffered; and they have lately declared that they would rather see him dead." The house of Savoy would probably have had a better chance of succeeding to the English crown, had the duke not deserted the English alliance before the peace of Ryswick. When Victor Amadeus was the friend and ally of William, a negotiation had been entered into with him, to send his son into England, to be educated as a Protestant. This son, Charles Emmanuel, was the grandson of Henrietta Maria, the daughter of Charles I., who married the Duke of Orleans. Their daughter, Anne Marie, married the Duke of Savoy. The descendant of the daughter of Charles I. had a higher claim by the law of inheritance than the descendant of the sister of that king. There were many other claimants, who were equally disqualified with the house of Savoy, by being Roman Catholics.

More pressing considerations than belonged to the possibly distant event of the Protestant succession in England now demanded the utmost exercise of William's foresight and perseverance. In October the King of Spain was considered to be in the most imminent danger. The Treaty of Partition existed between France, England, and Holland; but the emperor had not yet signed it. He was holding off, expecting to obtain greater advantages than the treaty had given him. William wrote to Heinsius from Loo on the 11th of October, "You may assure the ambassadors of France from me that I shall rigidly observe the treaty, in the expectation that their master shall do the same." In another letter of the 15th he says, "I find much too great precipitation on the part of France, who wishes to take instant possession of everything." France had other views than the execution of the treaty in exhibiting this haste to carry out its conditions before the event which the treaty contemplated. The agents of Louis were about the death-bed of Charles of Spain, striving to influence the feeble prince to dispose of the succession by will in favor of the Bourbons. The agents of the emperor were also intriguing for the same object, in favor of the imperial family. Louis had contrived to persuade the King of Spain that England and Holland alone were to blame in the matter of the Partition Treaty. The knowledge of this treaty had provoked such wrath at Madrid that the Spanish ambassador at London published a declaration so insolent that William commanded him to leave—a measure which was retaliated by the dismissal from Spain of the English and Dutch ambassadors. The revelation of the secret of the treaty was attributed to Louis, as the readiest way to attain something better than those Italian possessions of Spain which the treaty gave him.† The dying king was tormented, on one side, by the importunities of his queen and her confessor, to favor the emperor; on the other side, the Cardinal Porto-Carrero subdued the mind, always feeble, but now prostrate in superstition, by arts which Rome counts among its most precious accomplishments. The wretched prince was first terrified into the belief that his health was affected by sorcery; and the cardinal then procured a Capuchin monk, "very intelligent and well practised in matters of enchantment and casting out devils," to perform the rite of exorcism. Charles was persuaded that his health would be restored if he descended into the vaults of the Escurial, and looked upon the mouldering remains of his ancestors. The coffins of his mother and of his first wife were opened; and when he saw the face of his loved queen, scarcely yet touched by corruption, he rushed away, exclaiming, "I shall soon be with her in heaven." Enfeebled in body and mind, the poor king still clung to the idea that he ought to preserve the inheritance of Spain to the Austrian family from which he had sprung. The authority of the pope was called in to determine for him what he ought to do. Innocent XII. decided that the whole Spanish monarchy belonged by right of inheritance to the dauphin; but to prevent the union of the crowns of Spain and France it was desirable to give the succession to the Duke of Anjou, the dauphin's second son. Thus fortified, Porto-Carrero, and Harcourt, the French ambassador, worked with unremitting energy. The wretched man grew worse and worse. Ecclesiastics surrounded his bed to urge, under the penalties of divine wrath, obedience to the councils of the Vatican. The famous Testament which plunged Europe into a war of ten years was signed. The king exclaimed, "Now I am as one of the dead." When the last breath had departed, after Charles had lingered four weeks, the Duke of Abrantes came forth from the council, of which Porto-Carrero had obtained from Charles the nomination as chief, and announced that Philip, Duke of Anjou, was the sole inheritor of the vast Spanish monarchy. Saint Simon relates an amusing incident which preceded the formal announcement. Blécourt, the ambassador of France, who was probably in the secret of the will, and Count d'Harrach, the ambassador of the emperor, who thought that his master would be the fortunate heir, were anxiously waiting in the crowd around the council door. Abrantes came out, looked a moment at Blécourt, then turned his eyes another way, and fixing them on D'Harrach, moved toward him, embraced him, and thus spoke: "Sir, it is with much pleasure"—bows and reciprocal embraces—"yes, sir, it is with extreme joy, that for the rest of my life"—more embraces—"and with the greatest contentment that I part from you, and take my leave of the august house of Austria."

On the 12th of November the Earl of Manchester, the English ambassador to France, wrote home, "I must now acquaint you that there is an end of our treaty." The King of France had decided to accept the will. One of his reasons was that the emperor had not yet acceded to the treaty. The emperor had in his possession a will of the King of Spain, made in the previous June, which gave the inheritance to the Archduke of Austria. He had to learn that Charles had cancelled that will when he signed the Testament of the 2d of October. The exultation of the court of France was scarcely attempted to be concealed. Louis affected to doubt what his decision should be, and he went through the mockery of consulting his council. He then came forth, and addressed the boy-king. "Sir, the King of Spain has named you his successor. The nobles demand, the nation desires you, and I give my consent. You will reign over the greatest monarchy in the world." The Spanish ambassador did homage to Philip V.; and when the youth parted from his affectionate grandfather, the superb monarch exclaimed, "The Pyrenees exist no longer." William knew what the pretended separation of the crowns of France and Spain really meant. He had arrived in London in November, where he received the news that Louis had broken his engagements. He immediately wrote to Heinsius: "I am perfectly persuaded, that if this will be executed, England and the republic are in the utmost danger of being totally lost or ruined." * In a letter, three days later, he says: "My chief anxiety is to prevent the Spanish Netherlands from falling into the hands of France. You will easily conceive how this business goes to my heart." † The most heroic period of the life of William was now to be entered upon—that period in which Burnet says, "there was a black appearance of a new and dismal scene;" but the period which called forth the most wonderful display of the energies of the king's character. William's conduct cannot be better described than in the magnificent words of Burke: "In all the tottering imbecility of a new government, and with parliament totally unmanageable, he persevered. He persevered to expel the fears of his people by his fortitude; to steady their fickleness by his constancy; to expand their narrow prudence by his enlarged wisdom; to sink their factious temper in his public spirit. In spite of his people he resolved to make them great and glorious; to make England, inclined to shrink into her narrow self, the arbitress of Europe, the tutelary angel of the human race. In spite of the ministers, who staggered under the weight that his mind imposed upon theirs, unsupported as they felt themselves by the popular spirit, he infused into them his own soul; he renewed in them their ancient heart, he rallied them in the same cause. It acquired some time to accomplish this work. The people were first gained, and through them their distracted representatives." ‡

The parliament which had been prorogued in April was dissolved in December, 1700. The Tory party were now in the ascendant, and they had all the advantages of government influence in the elections. The king, if we may judge from the first aspect of proceedings in the House of Commons, was the person in this kingdom who had the least control upon the temper of the people's representatives. Ralph, the laborious party-historian of these times, relieves his usual dreariness by the following anecdote: "His majesty, in dismissing the Whigs, because they could no longer do his business in parliament, had done enough to disoblige them, but not enough to gain the Tories: and so met with such treatment from both as once gave him occasion to say, in a pet, to Lord Halifax, 'that all the difference he knew between the two parties was, that the Tories would cut his throat in the morning and the Whigs in the afternoon.'"* The houses met on the 6th of February. Godolphin was now at the head of the treasury; Rochester was Lord Lieutenant of Ireland. Under the ministerial influence Harley was chosen speaker by the new parliament, by a majority double that of the Whig nominee. The speech of the king touched upon the two great events of the past year—the death of the Duke of Gloucester, and the death of the King of Spain. The loss of the Duke of Gloucester "made it absolutely necessary that there should be a further provision for the succession of the crown in the Protestant line." The death of the late King of Spain "has made so great an alteration of affairs abroad that I must desire you very maturely to consider their present state." The house divided upon a motion arising out of the king's speech, carrying this resolution only by a majority of twenty-one, 'That they would stand by and support his majesty and his government, and take such effectual measures as may best conduce to the interest and safety of England, the preservation of the Protestant religion, and the peace of Europe." Burnet says that a design was laid, to open the session with a vote that the king be requested to own the King of Spain; but the opponents of William's policy thought better of the scheme when a member, Mr. Moncton, who was present at the discussion, said that if the vote were carried, he should expect the next vote would be for owning the pretended Prince of Wales.† The king was, however, moving steadily forward to the completion of the great object of his policy. When he received the address of the Commons in reply to his speech, he laid before them a memorial from the envoy extraordinary of the States-General. It set forth that they had acknowledged the new King of Spain, under the condition that a negotiation should be entered into, in concert with their allies, to secure the peace of Europe. They prayed the King of England to send the necessary instructions to his minister at the Hague to act conjointly with them. But they added that, as French troops were moving toward their frontier, they requested the succor agreed to be provided for their defence, under a treaty made by England with the States in 1677. The Commons asked that the treaty of 1677 should be laid before them. They then unanimously resolved to request the king to enter into such negotiations with the States-General, and with other powers, as might conduce to the mutual safety of these kingdoms and the United Provinces, and promising their support in performance of the treaty. William was unexpectedly gratified by this decision. "Nothing," he said to the houses, "can more effectually conduce to our security than the unanimity and vigor you have shown on this occasion." From that hour the king calmly and resolutely looked upon the future. There was a slight change in the temper of the Commons, which he probably could trace to a higher cause than the change which he had made of his ministers. Public opinion was slowly but surely coming into operation. There were few organs of opinion besides party pamphlets; but the people had some knowledge of political events, even from their meagre newspapers. They thought for themselves, and they expressed their thoughts freely among themselves. In the heat of the contest between William and the House of Commons about disbanding the army, we are assured that the king "was in truth more really beloved by the body of the people than he thought himself to be, or than his enemies seemed to believe he was."‡ Swift, who, in 1701, looked upon politics from a higher elevation than the molehill of party, says that one cause of the popular aversion to some of the proceedings of the Commons was, "a great love and sense of gratitude in the people toward their present king, grounded upon a long opinion of his merit, as well as concessions to all their reasonable desires, so that it is for some time they have begun to say, and to fetch instances, where he has in many things been hardly used."* We shall soon see this temper of the people coming into direct collision with their representatives.

It was on the 3d of March that the portion of the king's speech which relates to the Protestant succession was brought forward in the Commons. Burnet says: "The manner in which this motion of the succession was managed did not carry in it great marks of sincerity. It was often put off from one day to another, and it gave place to the most trifling matters." During the whole of March and April the two great parties were engaged in the most furious broils. It was perhaps fortunate that their attention was diverted from high matters that concerned the future, to temporary ebullitions of party rage. The nomination of the Princess Sophia and her descendants might otherwise have been resisted by the furious Jacobites; and the clauses of the Act of Settlement which gave guarantees for constitutional freedom, in addition to the Bill of Rights, might have been opposed by the advocates of absolute government. There was comparatively little discussion about these conditions "for better securing the rights and liberties of the subject." They were proposed by Harley, supported by the Tories, and not resisted by the Whigs—although the clauses against the sovereign going out of his dominions without the consent of parliament, and for preventing any foreigner holding office, had the appearance of a personal reflection upon the government of King William. The clause which disqualifies all holders of office, and all receivers of pensions, from sitting in the House of Commons, was repealed early in the reign of Anne. Burnet says, "those who wished well to the act were glad to have it passed any way, and so would not examine the limitations that were in it." He reckoned it "a great point carried that we had now a law on our side for a Protestant successor; for we plainly saw a great party formed against it, in favor of the pretended Prince of Wales." It was indeed a great point gained for the welfare of these realms, that an act was passed by which the House of Brunswick has possessed the crown for a century and a half, under whose rule there has been a constant progress toward the solution of the difficult problem of representative government—the union of the largest amount of individual liberty with the most perfect security for social order.†

Negotiations were proceeding at the Hague between England, Holland, and France, for the removal of French troops from the Spanish Netherlands, and for other objects of prevention against the preponderance of France. Burnet affirms that "the French, seeing these demands run so high, and being resolved to offer no other security for the peace of Europe but the renewing the Treaty of Ryswick, set all their engines at work in England to involve us in such contentions at home as should both disable us from taking any care of foreign affairs, and make the rest of Europe conclude that nothing considerable was to be expected from England." It was scarcely necessary that party rage should be stimulated either by the intrigues or the gold of France. The Tories applied themselves to the task, most unpatriotic at such a moment, of assailing the partition treaties with unmeasured invectives, and of pursuing the chiefs of the late Whig ministry with a rancor very little proportioned to any offences which could be alleged against them. The Commons resolved to impeach Portland, Orford, Somers, and Halifax, for their concern in the treaties by which the king had endeavored to save Europe from the war which was now impending, and for other alleged offences. It is scarcely necessary, in a narrative which attempts chiefly to regard those historical events which have a permanent interest, to enter into a minute relation of these violent party conflicts. These party dissensions called up a third party, that had hitherto manifested very little participation in the contests of the two great factions. Swift, with the strongest good sense, temperately pointed out to the members of parliament, during the recess—which he calls "a lucid interval"—the consequence of their bitter animosities: "It would be wise in them, as individual and private mortals, to look back a little upon the storms they have raised as well as those they have escaped; to reflect that they have been authors of a new and wonderful thing in England, which is for a House of Commons to lose the universal favor of the numbers they represent."* The Commons having decided upon impeachment, asked the king to condemn the four peers without trial, by removing them from his councils and presence forever. The Lords begged his majesty to pass no sentence of discredit upon his late servants, till their alleged high crimes and misdemeanors should be inquired into. The king gave a very general answer to the Commons that he should employ none but those he thought deserving of trust. To the Lords he said nothing. He evidently had made up his mind to let the factions fight out their battle without his intervention. Conferences were held between the two houses, which became unseemly squabbles. The days were fixed for the trials of Somers and Orford. The Commons said they should not have justice, and refused to attend. The impeachments fell to the ground.

That "new and wonderful thing" of 1701—a House of Commons displeasing to the people—a popular party speaking by other voices than that of its legally-constituted organs—became too familiar to the nation, in times much nearer to our own than the opening of the eighteenth century.† In 1701 the popular feeling began to take the form which has subsequently shaken many a faction, and disturbed many a scheme of blind and selfish policy. On the 15th of May Secretary Vernon wrote to the Duke of Shrewsbury, "There grows a great ferment out of the house, which begins to make our topping men uneasy. They are endeavoring to suppress petitions; and perhaps the means they make use for it may blow them up higher."‡ At the quarter sessions for the county of Kent, held at Maidstone on the 29th of April, the grand jury drew up a petition to the House of Commons, which was unanimously signed by them, and also by the chairman of the sessions, and twenty-one of the justices. It was also signed by a large body of freeholders. Mr. Colepeper, the chairman, with four other gentlemen, proceeded to London with the petition, which was at last presented to the house by Mr. Meredith, one of the members for Kent, on the 8th of May. It is a plain-spoken document, but one which we should now call temperate and respectful: "We, the gentlemen, justices of the peace, grand jury, and other freeholders, at the general quarter sessions at Maidstone, in Kent, deeply concerned at the dangerous estate of this kingdom, and of all Europe; and considering that the fate of us and our prosperity depends upon the wisdom of our representatives in parliament, think ourselves bound in duty, humbly to lay before this honorable house the consequence, in this conjuncture, of your speedy resolution, and most sincere endeavor, to answer the great trust reposed in you by your country. And in regard, that from the experience of all ages it is manifest, no nation can be great or happy without union, we hope that no pretence whatever shall be able to create a misunderstanding among ourselves, or the least distrust of his most sacred majesty; whose great actions for this nation are writ in the hearts of his subjects, and can never, without the blackest ingratitude, be forgot. We most humbly implore this honorable house to have regard to the voice of the people, that our religion and safety may be effectually provided for, that your loyal addresses may be turned into bills of supply, and that his most sacred majesty (whose propitious and unblemished reign over us we pray God long to continue) may be enabled powerfully to assist his allies before it is too late." Upon hearing this read the house resolved, "That the said petition was scandalous, insolent, and seditious, tending to destroy the constitution of parliaments, and to subvert the established government of these realms." They then ordered that those gentlemen who had brought the petition should be taken into custody, as guilty of promoting it. They were committed to the gate-house. The "great ferment out of the house," which Vernon describes, then ran through the country. "This disposition to blame the slowness in which the House of Commons proceeded with relation to foreign affairs, and the heat with which private quarrels were pursued, began to spread itself through the whole nation."§ The imprisonment of the Kentish men led to many discussions of the right of the Commons to imprison any persons but their own members, or such as had violated the privileges of the house.* On the 14th of May, the day after Mr. Colepeper and his friends were committed, a paper, signed "Legion," was conveyed to Harley, the speaker; some accounts say, was presented to him as he entered the house. It purported to be a memorial, in which the grievances of the nation were set forth, and the rights of the people asserted, in the boldest terms. The concluding paragraph may be taken as a sample of its general spirit: "Thus, gentlemen, you have your duty laid before you, which 'tis hoped you will think of: but if you continue to neglect it, you may expect to be treated according to the resentment of an injured nation; for Englishmen are no more to be slaves to parliaments than to kings." In that "History of England from the Revolution," which still holds its place in companionship with that of Hume, it is written, "The Commons were equally provoked and intimidated by this libel, which was the production of one Daniel Defoe, a scurrilous party-writer, in very little estimation."† The author of "Humphrey Clinker" might have been expected to speak somewhat more respectfully of the author of "Robinson Crusoe." There is little doubt that Defoe did write the Legion Memorial. When the Kentish gentlemen were released at the end of the session of parliament, a public dinner was given to them at Mercers' Hall by the chief citizens of London; where, says a Tory writer, "Nothing was wanting to show their respect to them, and the cause of sedition they had been carrying on—no, not so much as some of the nobility themselves, to give a stamp of authority to what had been done, contrary to all law, good manners, or prudence."‡ Another Tory pamphleteer says, speaking of this dinner, "Next the Worthies [the Kentish men] was placed their secretary of state, the author of the Legion letter, and one might have read the downfall of parliaments in his very countenance."§ The bitterness of Defoe was no doubt excited by his devotion to the king. William probably found in this most sturdy and sagacious representative of the great middle class an enlarged patriotism, and a sympathy with his own high views which he had almost ceased to look for among those who were "swaddled, and rocked, and dandled" into statesmen. William respected the man who had the courage to attack that vulgar prejudice which, regarding every foreigner as an enemy to England, compelled him to dismiss the Dutch guards and the French refugees, who had served him so long and so faithfully. "The true born Englishman" of Defoe, made this prejudice contemptible. The Kentish Petition and the Legion Memorial struck at the power which had set the representatives of the people above public opinion—the power of commanding a majority of the House of Commons by frothy declamation and passionate invective. The Tories possessed the superiority in this power, and they abused it, in this season of real national peril, to an extent which has sometimes been equalled by both of the great parties in parliament, but never excelled. The impeachment of William's Whig ministers had "dragged its slow length along," for weeks, amid conflicts between Lords and Commons. The terms of the partition treaties were again and again debated, the Commons thus subjecting themselves to the just reproof of "Legion," "Voting the Treaty of Partition fatal to Europe, because it gave so much of the Spanish dominions to the French, and not concerning yourselves to prevent their taking possession of it all." The States-General had made the most urgent appeal for the assistance of England. They were preparing for the same sort of resistance to France which had signalized them under the guidance of the young Prince of Orange. The heart of the prematurely-aged king of England must have leaped in his bosom when his countrymen sent to him to say, "We have been obliged to put ourselves in a state of defence, more than if we were actually attacked, by overflowing our country, and even cutting our dykes, to secure our frontiers." Though the Commons had passed two formal votes of support to the king in carrying out the old treaty with the Republic, they were too much occupied with their party-quarrels to look steadily at the great question upon which William had asked their advice and assistance. They were told by Legion "that they were deserting the Dutch when the French are at their doors, till it be almost too late to help them." Gradually the House of Commons came more clearly to understand the public feeling. The people wanted more deeds and less talk. They turned "from petty tyrants to the throne." The House of Lords had a quicker comprehension of the national temper than the Commons had. They addressed the king in terms which encouraged him in the work to which the remainder of his life was devoted: "We humbly desire your majesty will be pleased, not only to make good all the articles of any former treaties to the States-General, but that you will enter into a strict league, offensive and defensive, with them, for their common preservation; and that you will invite unto it all princes and states who are concerned in the present visible danger, arising from the union of France and Spain." The Commons stopped short of directly sanctioning the extensive alliance which William desired, and which the Lords contemplated—an alliance which could have no other end than war. But they voted sufficient supplies to enable the king to send assistance to the States—telling him, however, "they are more than ever were given in a time of peace." On the 24th of June the parliament was prorogued. On the 1st of July the king embarked for Holland.

Burke has vividly described the great crisis of the summer of 1701. The House of Commons had been more reserved than the Lords. "But now they were fairly embarked, they were obliged to go with the course of the vessel; and the whole nation, split before into an hundred adverse factions, with a king at its head evidently declining to his tomb, the whole nation, Lords, Commons, and people, proceeded as one body informed by one soul." There probably is no higher example of decision of character than the energy of William in the last six months of his life. If we imagine that he had only to lay before "princes and states" his notions of their common danger, and then to secure their cordial co-operation in its resistance, we should take a very imperfect view of the policies of the various European governments. The emperor, no doubt, could be easily induced to take part in a great confederacy to secure for his family their coveted share in the Spanish dominions. But the smaller German states were moved by various conflicting influences—of ambition, of jealousy, of fear. The notion of some was to combine in a neutrality, in which they might gain something and risk little. Several of the German electors had as much dread of Austria as of France, and probably more hatred of the power with which they were more immediately in contact. The northern maritime states, though quarrelling with each other, had no affection for the Dutch, who interfered with their commerce. William, during his sojourn in Holland, concluded treaties with the States-General, with the King of Sweden, with the King of Denmark, with the emperor. He laid the foundation of future alliances with the King of Portugal, with the King of Prussia, with the Duke of Savoy. He had an able assistant in Marlborough, whose treachery he had long ceased to fear, and in whose great ability he had a just confidence. But the experience of William in all the complications of European politics; the confidence which those with whom he had to deal had in his judgment and honesty; and, more than all, his own undoubted reliance upon the conviction of his earliest and of his latest years, that the power of France must be limited if England and Holland were to be secure and free—these were the means by which that league which history now calls the grand alliance was formed. One of the most remarkable features of this alliance in its earlier stages of the union of England, the States, and the emperor, was its extreme prudence. It made no declaration as to the inheritance of the crown of Spain. It only stipulated that the contracting powers should be united to prevent the union of the crowns of France and Spain; that France should be compelled to evacuate the Netherlands; and that she should not acquire any of the Spanish colonies in the West Indies. England was not committed by William to a war.

The treaty of alliance between England, the States-General, and the emperor, with powers for all kings and states to join the league, was signed at the Hague on the 7th of September. In Italy war had previously begun on the part of the emperor. Prince Eugene commanded the imperial army, and drove the joint forces of the French king and the Duke of Savoy from their position along the Adige. Marshal Villeroy subsequently attacked Prince Eugene, but was repulsed. The warlike events of the year had no decisive results. But one event now took place which involved England in a war against France, upon far more popular grounds than the question of the succession in Spain. On the 16th of September King James II. expired at St. Germains, in the sixty-seventh year of his age. The biographer of the exiled sovereign describes the visit of the King of France to the death-bed, when Louis, having desired that nobody should withdraw, said, "I am come, sir, to acquaint you, that whenever it shall please God to call your majesty out of this world, I will take your family under my protection, and will treat your son, the Prince of Wales, in the same manner I have treated you, and acknowledge him, as he then will be, King of England."* The biographer describes how the French and English courtiers threw themselves at his Most Christian Majesty's feet, weeping and lauding so generous an action. In the court, says Saint Simon, "nothing was heard but applause and praise." Yet reflection came to some. It was seen that to recognize the Prince of Wales was in direct opposition to the recognition, as King of England, of the Prince of Orange at the peace of Ryswick; and thus to wound that prince in the tenderest point, and to invite England and Holland to become allies of the emperor against France. Saint Simon, who takes this common-sense view, holds that the resolve of Louis XIV. was "more worthy of Louis XII., or of Francis I., than of his own wisdom." The recognition of the son of James II. as King of England was no private act of Louis. Lord Manchester, the English ambassador, wrote home: "The Prince of Wales was immediately proclaimed King of England by the title of James III. I do not hear there was any other ceremony than that, after he had taken the title of king, those of St. Germains kissed his hand and treated him with 'majesty.'" William desired that his ambassador should immediately quit the French court. It was alleged by France that the bare owning of the prince's title was not a breach of the Treaty of Ryswick, as they gave him nor assistance to make good his claim. Neither the King of England nor his people were deceived by this sophistry. William saw that the greatest opportunity of his life had now arrived; that the factions which had so long harassed him would shrink away before the might of public opinion; that he could now—when France believed he was broken down, worn out, dying—lead a great people to go with him, heart and hand, in the work of their own national salvation, as he had led his own countrymen in the full vigor of his early manhood. Before the news arrived from St. Germains he had been in communication with Sunderland on the state of affairs in England. In the remarkable correspondence, carried on in the third person, between the king and this Ulysses of the distracted camps of the two factions, William expresses his doubts of calling a new parliament, "the Tories giving him great hopes, and making him great promises." Sunderland replies with a freedom which sounds like the greatest integrity. "It is a melancholy thing, that the king, who has more understanding than anybody who comes near him, is imposed on by mountebanks, or by such as, he himself knows, hate both his person and his government."† William, on the 10th of October, sent Mr. Galway to Somers, to confer with him confidentially on the state of English politics. Somers drew up a body of arguments to induce the king to call a new parliament, of which the first argument was, "the present ferment and disposition of the nation;" and he says, with a politician's confidence in the principle of expediency, "the art of governing in England is watching and using such opportunities." The king came from Holland on the 4th of November. On the 11th he dissolved the parliament.

On the 30th of December the two houses met, and Harley was chosen speaker of the Commons, by a majority of fourteen over Littleton, the Whig speaker of a former parliament. On the last day of the year 1701 King William delivered his last parliamentary speech—"the best speech," says Burnet, "that he or any other prince ever made to his people." He alluded to the loyal and seasonable addresses which he had received, in resentment of the late proceedings of the King of France. He described the setting up of the pretended Prince of Wales as King of England as the highest indignity that could be offered to himself and to the nation. It so nearly concerned every man who had a regard for the Protestant religion, or the present and future quiet and happiness of his country, that he earnestly exhorted them to lay it seriously to heart. He then proceeded to take a general view of the position of England with reference to the Spanish succession :

"By the French king's placing his grandson on the throne of Spain, he is in a condition to oppress the rest of Europe, unless speedy and effectual measures be taken. Under this pretence he is become the real master of the whole Spanish monarchy ; he has made it to be entirely depending on France, and disposes of it as of his own dominions, and by that means he has surrounded his neighbors in such a manner, that, though the name of peace may be said to continue, yet they are put to the expense and inconvenience of war. This must affect England in the nearest and most sensible manner, in respect to our trade, which will soon become precarious in all the variable branches of it ; in respect to our peace and safety at home, which we cannot hope should long continue ; and in respect to that part which England ought to take in the preservation of the liberty of Europe." The king then announced that he had concluded several alliances, in order to avert the general calamity with which the rest of Christendom is threatened by the exorbitant power of France. "It is fit I should tell you the eyes of all Europe are upon this parliament ; all matters are at a stand till your resolutions are known ; and therefore no time ought to be lost. You have yet an opportunity, by God's blessing, to secure to you and your posterity the quiet enjoyment of your religion and liberties, if you are not wanting to yourselves, but will exert the ancient vigor of the English nation ; but I tell you plainly, my opinion is, if you do not lay hold on this occasion, you have no reason to hope for another." He called upon them to provide a great strength at sea, and a land force that should be proportionate to the forces of the allies. He exhorted them to take care of the public credit, "which cannot be preserved but by keeping sacred that maxim, that they shall never be losers who trust to a parliamentary security." The king concluded with this bold and stirring exhortation :

"My lords and gentlemen : I hope you are come together determined to avoid all manner of disputes and differences ; and resolved to act with a general and hearty concurrence for promoting the common cause, which alone can make this a happy session. I should think it as great a blessing as could befall England, if I could observe you as much inclined to lay aside those unhappy fatal animosities which divide and weaken you, as I am disposed to make all my subjects safe and easy as to any, even the highest offences, committed against me. Let me conjure you to disappoint the only hope of our enemies by your unanimity. I have shown, and will always show, how desirous I am to be the common father of all my people. Do you, in like manner, lay aside parties and divisions. Let there be no other distinction heard of among us for the future, but of those, who are for the Protestant religion, and the present establishment, and of those who mean a popish prince, and a French government. I will only add this : if you do in good earnest desire to see England hold the balance of Europe, and to be indeed at the head of the Protestant interest, it will appear by your right improving the present opportunity."

This speech, so earnest, so manly, so thoroughly addressed to the great English heart, could be met with no factious strife or sullen coldness. William had the nation at his back. The Commons very speedily voted a supply of six hundred thousand pounds. They resolved than an address be presented to the king, requesting that it be an article in the several treaties of alliance, "That no peace shall be made with France until his majesty and the nation have reparation for the great indignity offered by the French king, in owning and declaring the pretended Prince of Wales King of England, Scotland, and Ireland." They voted forty thousand men for the land forces, and forty thousand for sea service. The only want of unanimity was in the resistance to a bill "for abjuring the pretended Prince of Wales," but this was finally passed on the 24th of February.

When William went to Holland in the summer of 1701 he appeared in the last stage of bodily feebleness. His spirit had been deeply mortified by the parliamentary conflicts which promised little of future tranquillity. But in the labors of that autumn his health appeared to grow better. It has been admirably said : "Let those who doubt the dominion of the soul over the bodily powers ; who deny that a strong mind can sway, and strengthen, and force onward a feeble and suffering frame ; let such observe, whether, in the last labors of William to form the alliance, or in the alliance itself when formed, they can discover any trace of sickness—one single mark of languor or decline." * The altered spirit of the English parliament seemed to infuse a new life into the king. He took delight in his additions to Hampton Court. He went there once a week to hunt, although so weak as to be obliged to be lifted on his horse. It was there that, on Saturday, the 21st of February, "he fell from his horse that stumbled at a mole hill." † He fractured his collar-bone ; but the injury was not considered serious. He was conveyed to Kensington. On the 23d he sent a message to the Commons, in which he said that, being confined by an unhappy accident from coming in person, he thus signified what he designed to have spoken from the throne. He referred to the appointment of commissioners in the first year of his reign for treating of a union between England and Scotland. He was convinced that nothing would more contribute to the present and future happiness and security of the two kingdoms than a firm and entire union between them. "His majesty would esteem it a peculiar felicity if, during his reign, some happy expedient for making both kingdoms one might take place ; and is therefore extremely desirous that a treaty for that purpose might be set on foot ; and does, in the most earnest manner, recommend this affair to the consideration of the house." It was a solemn appeal, which was made doubly solemn by the event which was impending. On the 3d of March Vernon wrote that the king "is very near well of his hurt." Three days later he was in extreme danger. Albemarle had been sent to Holland, to arrange for an early campaign. "He came back on the 7th of March in the morning, with so good an account of everything that, if matters of that kind could have wrought on the king, it must have revived him : but the coldness with which he received it showed how little hopes were left. Soon after he said, 'Je tire vers ma fin'—I draw toward my end." ‡ He signed a commission for passing the Bill of Abjuration and the Money Bill. The next day, the 8th of March, he was evidently dying. He received the sacrament. "He was often looking up to Heaven in many short ejaculations." He took Portland by the hand, "and carried it to his heart with much tenderness," but his voice was gone. "His reason and all his senses were entire to the last minute. . . . He died with a clear and full presence of mind, and with a wonderful tranquillity." § The enemies of William could not respect this tranquillity, and wanted some better evidence of his piety than the circumstance that "when he was so weak that he could scarce speak, he gave the Archbishop of Canterbury his hand, as a sign that he firmly believed the truth of the Christian religion." ‖ The contemporary and the historical revilers of William III. have passed away, as those worshippers of absolute power have passed away who toasted "William's horse ;" and drank "a health to the little gentleman dressed in velvet." ¶ He died before any new caprice of fortune, any fickleness of public opinion, came to cloud the bright prospect which was opening before him, of the destinies of the country which he had served so well, and which had so ill rewarded him, and of his own land, which never failed to recognize his admirable qualities. "The Earl of Portland told me," says Burnet, "that when he was once encouraging him, from the good state his affairs were in, both at home and abroad, to take more heart, the king answered him, that he knew death was that which he had looked at on all occasions without terror ; sometimes he would have been glad to have been delivered out of all his troubles ; but he confessed now he saw another scene, and could wish to live a little longer." The wish was not granted by the Supreme Disposer of the affairs of nations. But the chief object of William's life was in great part accomplished. The union of Europe was consolidated. "Just as the last hand was given to this immense and complicated machine, the master workman died : but the work was formed on true mechanical principles, and it was as truly wrought. It went by the impulse it had received from the first mover. The man was dead : but the grand alliance survived in which King William lived and reigned." **

NOTE.—AN ACT FOR THE FURTHER LIMITATION OF THE CROWN AND BETTER SECURING THE RIGHTS AND LIBERTIES OF THE SUBJECT.

THE preamble to this act recites the tenor of the statute of the 1st of William and Mary; and sets forth that the late queen and the Duke of Gloucester being dead, the king had recommended a further provision for the succession of the crown:

"Therefore for a further provision of the succession of the crown in the Protestant line, we, your majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Lords spiritual and temporal and Commons in this present parliament assembled, do beseech your majesty that it may be enacted and declared, and be it enacted and declared, by the king's most excellent majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords spiritual and temporal and Commons in this present parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, that the most excellent Princess Sophia, Electress and Duchess Dowager of Hanover, daughter of the most excellent Princess Elizabeth, late Queen of Bohemia, daughter of our late sovereign lord King James the First, of happy memory, be and is hereby declared to be the next in succession in the Protestant line to the imperial crown and dignity of the said realms of England, France, and Ireland, with the dominions and territories thereunto belonging, after his majesty and the Princess Ann of Denmark, and in default of issue of the said Princess Ann and of his majesty respectively; and that from and after the decease of his said majesty, our now sovereign lord, and of her royal highness the Princess Ann of Denmark, and for default of issue of the said Princess Ann and of his majesty respectively, the crown and royal government of the said kingdoms of England, France, and Ireland, and of the dominions thereunto belonging, with the royal state and dignity of the said realms, and all honors, styles, titles, regalities, prerogatives, powers, jurisdictions, and authorities to the same belonging and appertaining, shall be, remain, and continue to the said most excellent Princess Sophia, and the heirs of her body, being Protestants. And thereunto the said Lords spiritual and temporal, and Commons, shall and will, in the name of all the people of this realm, most humbly and faithfully submit themselves, their heirs and posterities, and do faithfully promise, after the deceases of his majesty and her royal highness, and the failure of the heirs of their respective bodies, to stand to, maintain and defend the said Princess Sophia, and the heirs of her body, being Protestants, according to the limitation and succession of the crown in this act specified and contained, to the utmost of their powers, with their lives and estates, against all persons whatsoever that shall attempt anything to the contrary.

"Provided always, and it is hereby enacted, that all and every person and persons who shall or may take or inherit the said crown by virtue of the limitation of this present act, and is, are, or shall be reconciled to, or shall hold communion with the See or Church of Rome, or shall profess the Popish religion, or shall marry a Papist, shall be subject to such incapacities as in such case or cases are by the said recited act (1st Gul. & Mar.) provided, enacted, and established. And that every king and queen of this realm who shall come to and succeed in the imperial crown of this kingdom, by virtue of this act, shall have the coronation oath administered to him, her, or them, at their respective coronations, according to the act of parliament made in the first year of the reign of his majesty and the said late Queen Mary, entitled 'an act for establishing the coronation oath,' and shall make, subscribe, and repeat the declaration in the act first above recited, mentioned, or referred to, in the manner and form thereby prescribed.

"And whereas it is requisite and necessary that some further provision be made for securing our religion, laws, and liberties, from and after the death of his majesty and the Princess Ann of Denmark; and in default of issue of the body of the said princess and of his majesty respectively, be it enacted by the king's most excellent majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords spiritual and temporal, and Commons, in parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same,

"That whosoever shall hereafter come to the possession of this crown shall join in communion with the Church of England as by law established.

"That in case the crown and imperial dignity of this realm shall hereafter come to any person, not being a native of this kingdom of England, this nation be not obliged to engage in any war for the defence of any dominions or territories which do not belong to the crown of England, without the consent of parliament.

"That no person who shall hereafter come to the possession of this crown shall go out of the dominions of England, Scotland, or Ireland, without consent of parliament.

"That from and after the time that the further limitation by this act shall take effect, all matters and things relating to the well-governing of this kingdom, which are properly cognizable in the privy council by the laws and customs of this realm shall be transacted there, and all resolutions taken thereupon shall be signed by such of the privy council as shall advise and consent to the same.

"That after the said limitation shall take effect as aforesaid, no person born out of the kingdoms of England, Scotland, or Ireland, or the dominions thereunto belonging (although he be naturalized or made a denizen, except such as are born of English parents), shall be capable to be of the privy council, or a member of either house of parliament, or to enjoy any office or place of trust, either civil or military, or to have any grant of lands, tenements, or hereditaments from the crown to himself, or to any other or others in trust for him.

"That no person who has an office or place of profit under the king, or receives a pension from the crown, shall be capable of serving as a member of the House of Commons.

"That after the said limitation shall take effect as aforesaid, judges' commissions be made quam diu se bene gesserint, and their salaries ascertained and established; but upon the address of both houses of parliament it may be lawful to remove them.

"That no pardon under the great seal of England be pleadable to an impeachment by the Commons in parliament.

"And whereas the laws of England are the birthright of the people thereof, and all the kings and queens who shall ascend the throne of this realm ought to administer the government of the same according to the said laws, and all their officers and ministers ought to serve them respectively according to the same, the said Lords spiritual and temporal and Commons do therefore humbly pray, that all the laws and statutes of this realm for securing the established religion, and the rights and liberties of the people thereof, and all others laws and statutes of the same now in force, may be ratified and confirmed. And the same are, by his majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the said Lords spiritual and temporal, and Commons, and by authority of the same, ratified and confirmed accordingly."

"WHEN the king came to die," says the Duchess of Marlborough, "I felt nothing of that satisfaction which I once thought I should have had upon this occasion; and my Lord and Lady Jersey's writing and sending perpetually to give an account as his breath grew shorter and shorter filled me with horror." It is the common story of royal death-beds. "As soon as the breath was out of King William," as Lord Dartmouth affirms, "by which all expectations from him were at an end, the Bishop of Salisbury drove hard to bring the first tidings to St. James's; where he prostrated himself at the new queen's feet, full of joy and duty."* From Edward III. to William III., from William III. to George IV., it was ever the same:

"Gone to salute the rising morn."

That Anne should have dropped a tear for her brother-in-law was scarcely to be expected. Friends they had never been. Since the death of Mary they had avoided all unseemly differences. Anne, subjected to the will of a domineering favorite, who hated William upon the well-known principle that we hate those whom we have injured, could form no independent opinion of his merits as a king. She regarded him as a disagreeable man, generally sullen, and rarely civil. His appointment of Marlborough in the summer of 1700 to an employment of high trust had probably disposed the new queen to make no hesitation in accepting the great principles of foreign policy which William had rendered triumphant by his unshrinking constancy. It has been attributed to the foresight of the "master workman" in the Grand Alliance, that he appointed Marlborough to the command of the troops sent to the assistance of the States-General, because he knew that in the event of his own demise the favorite of his successor would be the chief moving power in English affairs. "The king proposed, by this early step, to engage the earl so much in the war as to make it his particular interest to pursue it with vigor in the succeeding reign."† There was not an hour lost in declaring the policy that the new sovereign was counselled to pursue. On the evening of King William's death, Queen Anne, when the privy council were assembled, as is usual on the demise of the crown, thus spoke upon the vital question which was the foremost in the public thought: "I think it proper, upon this occasion of my first speaking to you, to declare my own opinion of the importance of carrying on all the preparations we are making to oppose the great power of France; and I shall lose no time in giving our allies all assurances that nothing shall be wanting on my part to pursue the true interest of England, together with theirs, for the support of the common cause." *

By a statute of 1696, which had regard to the dangers of invasion or conspiracy, it was provided that parliament should not be dissolved by the demise of the crown, but might sit for six months after, unless prorogued or dissolved. † The queen went to the House of Lords on the 11th of March. She spoke of the late king, as having been "the great support, not only of these kingdoms, but of all Europe." She said of herself, "I know my own heart to be entirely English." Words were thus put into Anne's mouth which gave that praise to William which could not be withheld, and stirred up prejudices against his memory which her Tory advisers were ready to keep alive. With regard to foreign affairs she repeated the sentiments she had addressed to the privy council. Within five days the Earl of Marlborough received the Order of the Garter, and was made captain-general of the forces. He probably would not have received such immediate and signal honor and preferment if he had not, with his consummate adroitness, made the queen consider that he belonged to the party for which she intended her chief rewards. "As soon as she was seated on the throne," says the wife of Marlborough, "the Tories, whom she usually called by the agreeable name of the Church party, became the distinguished objects of the royal favor." "I am firmly persuaded that, notwithstanding her extraordinary affection for me," adds the all-powerful Mrs. Morley, who professed Whig principles, "and the entire devotion which my Lord Marlborough and my Lord Godolphin had for many years shown to her service, they would not have had so great a share of her favor and confidence, if they had not been reckoned in the number of the Tories." There could be no mistake about Anne's general preferences. Somers, Halifax, and Orford were struck out of the lists of the privy council. Nottingham was appointed secretary of state, and Seymour comptroller, Rochester was continued as lord-lieutenant of Ireland; Normanby, another violent partisan, had the privy seal. Gradually Godolphin and Marlborough obtained such an ascendency as drove their less moderate colleagues from office. The Whigs supported their war-policy. The favorite says, "I resolved from the very beginning of the queen's reign to try whether I could not by degrees make impressions on her mind more favorable to the Whigs." Anne could not help "being extremely concerned that her dear Mrs. Freeman was so partial to the Whigs," as she writes about half a year after her accession. "I would not have you and your faithful Morley differ in the least thing." Something stronger than Mrs. Freeman's arts drove the violent Tories from office. Something which the faithful Morley could not resist gave the Whigs the preponderance. The war was a magnificent success; and public opinion, whatever was the cost of the war, placed the party in power that had given Marlborough the support which enabled him to win Blenheim and Ramilies. Godolphin and the duke became united with the Whigs. The Tories had their business to perform of stirring up new contests at home for what were called "high-flying" principles; and the Jacobites were not yet weary of looking forward to the time when the son of James II. should again have a clear stage to vindicate the great theory of the divine right of kings, and to overturn the notions of constitutional liberty and religious toleration that had taken root under what they deemed the usurpation of 1689.

Before the end of March Marlborough had been sent as an envoy extraordinary to the States-General. On the 31st of March he delivered a speech to their "high and mighty lordships," in which he declared the resolution of his queen to maintain the alliances which "King William of glorious memory" had formed, and to enter into such other alliances as might most conduce to the interests of both nations, and the preservation of the liberty of Europe. Marlborough did not stay more than a week in Holland; but he arranged for a joint declaration of war against France by England, the States, and the emperor, on the same day, May 4th; * and he concerted the plan of the first warlike operations. The skilful negotiator left the Hague on the 3d of April. On the 4th of May war was proclaimed with the usual solemnities in Westminster and the city of London. The parliament was prorogued on the 25th of May. It was dissolved on the 2d of July. The civil list that had been granted to King William was continued to Queen Anne. Her majesty was empowered to appoint commissioners to treat for union between England and Scotland, not without some insolent reflections from Sir Edward Seymour and others, in the same coarse and haughty spirit which had greatly irritated the Scotch in 1700. The queen's speech at the close of the session was somewhat ambiguous on one point: "I shall be very careful to preserve and maintain the Act of Toleration, and to set the minds of all my people at quiet: my own principles must always keep me entirely firm to the interests of the Church of England, and will incline me to countenance those who have the sincerest zeal to support it."

When we open the valuable collection of Marlborough's letters and dispatches,† we at once perceive the high position in which he is recognized by the princes and states of the alliance. Immediately on his return from Holland we find him writing from St. James's to the King of Prussia and Elector of Hanover, as one speaking with authority about "the common cause." Marlborough left London on the 18th of May; was detained at Margate by contrary winds; but soon after his arrival at the Hague was appointed by the States as generalissimo of all their forces. He appears to have succeeded, as if by common consent, to the power which was wielded by King William—he, a man who had fought his way up to promotion by no very honorable means; who had alienated two kings by his treachery; who was known to have the most especial eye to his own interests; who had not acquired any high reputation as a general, though no doubt from want of opportunity; but who was now considered to have the entire favor of the new sovereign of England, and, what was of no small importance, had been trusted by William in the latter part of his life, and had justified the trust by his consummate ability. Marlborough went vigorously to the work before him. He drew the allied forces together, so as to be at the head of a powerful army. He carried Venloo by storm on the 18th of September, when, as he writes to Nottingham, the secretary of state, "the English grenadiers had the honor of being the first that entered the fort." He besieged and took Ruremonde and Stevenswart. He captured Liège by storm on the 23d of October, the English being the first that got upon the breach; and in a few days afterward the castle of the Chartreuse was surrendered to him. In these operations he had the same aid that was so valuable to William—the scientific knowledge of Coehorn, the great rival of Vauban. Marlborough, at the close of the campaign, had an adventure, in which he was compared to Cæsar among the pirates. He was seized in a boat, as he was going down the Maese, by a body of French partisans, and after some detention escaped, after being plundered by those who did not know the value of the man they had intercepted. For a short time the allies were in consternation. But Marlborough safely returned to London, to receive high honors and rewards. While he was fighting at Liège, and only a few hours before the surrender of the place, he wrote a letter to Nottingham which shows how thoroughly he had his eye upon all the distant arrangements for carrying on a vigorous war: "I had written a very long letter in answer to two of your lordship's; but yours of the 6th of October, which I received this morning, that brings the ill news of Cadiz, has made me burn my letter, most of it being my thoughts of what I wished might be done if we had been successful. I am sorry from my heart if it proves otherwise." He was not one to be daunted by misfortune. He might have learned the value of perseverance from the great example of the man who took Namur after he had been defeated at Landen. "I hope ill success will not hinder you from advancing with sea and land officers, if this matter be capable of being retrieved." *

* Burnet takes occasion to mention that "she pronounced this as she did all her other speeches, with great weight and authority, and with a softness of voice and sweetness in the pronunciation that added much life to all she spoke." Dartmouth says that Anne was taught to speak by Mrs. Barry. Onslow relates that he heard her speak from the throne, and that "it was a sort of charm." The rare faculty, it might seem, has descended as a royal inheritance to the next queen-regnant.

The ill success at Cadiz was the failure of an expedition which had been planned by King William. It was carried out with the usual results of divided counsels and separate commands. A large combined fleet of Dutch and English ships, with fourteen thousand troops of both nations on board, after many delays had reached the Bay of Cadiz on the 18th of August. There was a commander of the fleet, Sir George Rooke; and there was a superior commander of the land and sea forces, the Duke of Ormond. There was an English general and a Dutch general at the head of their respective contingents. Three days were spent in debate upon the plans to be pursued. The leaders were "not only divided, sea against land, but land against land, and sea against sea." † They knew nothing of the localities where they proposed to disembark, and nothing of the force that might be brought against them. The Marquis of Villadaria, the captain-general of Andalusia, was a man of energy and military skill. He had roused the population; and when some troops had landed and marched to Port St. Mary's, an unwalled place — which safe course had been preferred to a descent upon the Isle of Leon, and a vigorous attack upon Cadiz — they found the old town deserted. There was, however, abundance of specie and other valuables there, to satisfy a rapacious soldiery, under very imperfect discipline. The Prince of Darmstadt had joined the expedition, in the hope that the Andalusians would declare for the cause of the Austrian Archduke, who claimed the title of King of Spain. The Spaniards were disgusted by the outrages of those who held out the hand of friendship to the people, but acted as brutal enemies. No serious attempt was made to accomplish some object worthy of such an armament. If the army remained longer on shore the probability was that they would have become wholly undisciplined, and have fallen sacrifices to the just revenge of the indignant population. The troops re-embarked in the middle of September. But there was a prize yet to be reached. The Spanish fleet, which yearly arrived from the Indies, laden with bullion and rich merchandise, finding Cadiz blockaded, had run into Vigo. It was against the monopoly of the Cadiz merchants that any other port should receive these annual treasures. The galleons could not land their cargoes until the tardy officials at Madrid had given permission. Ormond and Rooke had obtained information that there were richer trophies to be won that the honor of fighting for the stronghold of Cadiz. They made for Vigo, which, during their useless sojourn at Port St. Mary's, had been strengthened, and a boom thrown across the harbor. Two thousand men were landed. The galleons fled down the bay and attempted to put some of their valuable cargo on shore. The English squadron pursued them; and then the Spaniards threw their wealth into the sea, and fired their ships. Six galleons were seized by the English, and seven French ships of-war. The loss of life on the side of the Spaniards and French was terrific. The destruction of property was immense, exceeding eight million dollars. Much of the treasure taken was embezzled. "The public was not much enriched by this extraordinary capture, yet the loss our enemies made by it was a vast one." ‡

The first parliament of Queen Anne met on the 20th of October. Harley was chosen speaker. The royal speech contained no decided expression which could indicate what temper of the houses would be most agreeable to the court. It was well known that there would be a large Tory majority. It was now thought desirable by this majority to compliment the queen upon the progress of the war under the command of Marlborough, and to insult the memory of him whose firmness and perseverance had alone enabled England and Holland to hold in check the power of France. It was carried in the Commons by a majority of 180 against 80, that these words should be used in their address to the queen: "The wonderful progress of your majesty's arms, under the conduct of the Earl of Marlborough, have signally retrieved the ancient honor and glory of the English nation." Those who proposed to substitute the word "maintained," had to learn that the grave is no shelter from the violence of party spirit. This was harmless malice. But there was something more than the gratification of the old hatred of a constitutional king, when the queen was told, in the same address, that as she had always been an illustrious ornament to the Church, "we promise ourselves that, in your reign, we shall see it perfectly restored to its due rights and privileges."

Under the Toleration Act of 1689 the Protestant dissenters, a numerous and wealthy body, had been relieved "from the penalties of certain laws," as the title of that act expressed. Dissenting ministers might teach and preach, having subscribed some of the articles of the Church of England; and their followers were free to frequent conventicles, having subscribed the Declaration against Popery, prescribed by the statute of Charles II. Complying with these requisitions, the offices of coporations were open to the very influential class that differed in some points from the Established Church under various denominations. In 1697 a violent excitement was produced in the city of London by the lord mayor, Sir Humphrey Edwin, attending a meeting-house, with the trappings of his office—a circumstance which Swift had in mind when he told "how Jack's tatters came into fashion in court and city; how he got upon a great horse, and ate custard." * During the reign of William the feud between the Church and Dissent was confined to the preachers and the pamphleteers. The state looked on without taking any part in the quarrel about occasional conformity, by which the dissenters kept their share of civil power, without compromising, as most of them believed, their rights of conscience. But when Anne came to the throne, the High Church party were for extreme measures against the separatists; and one of the first proceedings of the Tory ministry in the new parliament was to bring in a bill to prevent occasional conformity. The spirit of the time of Charles II. was roused from its long sleep. Not only were holders of office to be subject to the Test Act, but also all electors for boroughs. To enter a dissenting place of worship after having once taken the sacrament according to the rites of the Church, was to be punished with heavy fines, and with transportation upon a repetition of the offence. The bill was quickly passed by large majorities of the Commons. In the House of Lords, where the majority of spiritual peers were distinguished for their moderation—where the learning of Somers and the eloquence of Halifax had their due weight—the factions of the lower house were met with a firm and temperate resistance, although the Whigs were not strong enough to throw out the bill. Amendments were introduced by the Peers, which the Commons indignantly rejected. Conferences then took place between the two houses, in which the question was debated with great pertinacity on both sides; but in which the Lords manifested a regard for civil rights, a hatred of extreme penalties, and a respect for religious liberty, which ought to be borne in mind by those who are inclined to believe that the power in the state which does not directly represent the popular interest is necessarily indifferent to the welfare of the people. We may judge of the masterly reasoning upon which the Peers defended their amendments by the following passage: "The Lords think an Englishman cannot be reduced to a more unhappy condition than to be put by law under an incapacity to serve his prince and country; and therefore nothing but a crime of the most detestable nature ought to put him under such a disability: they who think the being present at a meeting to be so high a crime can hardly think that a toleration of such meetings ought to continue long; and yet the bill says, 'The Act of Toleration ought to be kept inviolate.'" †

The chief business of the session was this great battle of principle. The Lords insisted on adhering to their amendments. The Commons persisted in rejecting them. The court made every effort to get the bill passed in the Lords—the Prince of Denmark, though not of the Church of England, and being an occasional conformist himself, having voted for it as a peer of parliament. But the vote of adhering was carried in the Lords by a majority of one. The battle of the press was as violent as that of the parliament. The most remarkable production of the time was Defoe's "The Shortest Way with the Dissenters." It is seldom that irony can be sustained through many pages; but the power which this great writer possessed in his fictitious narratives, of giving a reality to imaginary events and persons, enabled him to adopt the tone of a violent high churchman, and carry forward the declamation of the party into an extravagance which made the general argument odious and ridiculous. It was the most successful literary hoax ever perpetrated. Furious churchmen applauded the pamphlet. Sensitive dissenters were indignant at the terms in which they were denounced. Dull moderate men stood aghast at the monstrous cruelty and wickedness of these "Proposals for the establishment of the Church," which thus argued: "If the gallows instead of the compter, and the gallies instead of the fines, were the reward of going to a conventicle to preach or hear, there would not be so many sufferers; the spirit of martyrdom is over; they that go to church to be chosen sheriffs and mayors would go to forty churches rather than be hanged." When the hoax was discovered, the rage of the followers of Sacheverell and other haters of toleration was unbounded. A reward of fifty pounds was offered by proclamation for the apprehension of Daniel Defoe, "charged with writing a scandalous and seditious pamphlet entitled 'The Shortest Way with the Dissenters':—"a middle-aged spare man, about forty years old." The House of Commons voted the little book to be burned by the hangman. Defoe was indicted at the Old Bailey Sessions in February, 1703, and was brought to trial in July. He acknowledged himself to have written this piece of exquisite banter. To us who live in better times, which we owe as much to the press as to the parliament, it is inconceivable that all parties did not laugh at Defoe's wit. He was found guilty, and was sentenced to a fine, to stand three times in the pillory, and to be imprisoned during the queen's pleasure. Defoe was pilloried, on three successive days, at the Royal Exchange, at the Conduit at Cheapside, and at Temple Bar. On the first day of this exhibition he published his "Hymn to the Pillory." His was the spirit that, in every age in England, has made oppression recoil upon the oppressor. The hymn was read as its author stood before the crowd not ignominiously:

"Earless on high stood unabashed Defoe."

Pope meant this for contempt. The more equal judgment of another age receives it as praise, and reads "fearless," not "earless"—"unabashed by, and unabated in his contempt for, tyranny and dulness." *

"The Earl of Marlborough is grand vizier, as you may imagine," writes a political observer at the time of the accession of Anne. † The successes of his first campaign encouraged the queen to shower honors upon her favorite's husband, which left nothing higher in her gift for the triumphs of his subsequent career. On the 10th of December, 1702, her majesty announced to the Commons that for the eminent services of the Earl of Marlborough she had thought fit to grant him the title of duke. But the queen went farther. She said she had granted the duke five thousand a year from the revenues of the post-office. The Commons demurred to this grant, and Marlborough received the first check to that avidity for money which was one of the conspicuous faults of his character. The cold support he obtained from his Tory friends was not to be readily forgiven. His views, moreover, as to the conduct of the war, were far more comprehensive than the views of the administration. Louis XIV. had renewed the horrible persecutions of the French Protestants in Languedoc. In his anxiety to conclude the peace of Ryswick, William III. had made no stipulations for the free exercise of the reformed faith in the provinces of France. His attention was called to this omission by Heinsius, as the States were on the point of signing the treaty. But the communication to William was too late: "God grant," he replies, "that some expedient may have been found before you can receive this letter, for it will probably not reach you till after midnight, and consequently not till after the expiration of the term fixed for the signature of the treaty. ‡ In 1702 a serious revolt of the persecuted Protestants broke out in the Cévennes, a mountainous district of Languedoc. The poor mountaineers, who held their religious meetings in solitary places, were again to be converted by the "booted missionaries" of the Roman Catholic Church. Their dangers called forth a spirit of fanaticism, such as had characterized the Cameronians of Scotland. They had prophets among them. They looked for miracles to be wrought in their favor. There was a ruthless bigot in the Cévennes, the arch-priest Du Chaila, who had been the persecutor of the Protestants there from the time of the revocation of the Edict of Nantes. In 1702 this detestable fanatic was endeavoring to tread out the fanaticism of his victims by unheard-of cruelties. He subjected his prisoners to frightful tortures. He flogged and mutilated young children, to obtain information of the concealment of preachers. His atrocities at length received their reward. He had imprisoned in his château—a strong place, capable of resisting any ordinary attack—a number of Protestants, whom he intended to put to death, as he had put to death a young girl six months before. The peasantry surrounded the château, forced the gates with a rude battering-ram, set the building on fire, and murdered the arch-priest as he attempted to escape. The insurrection now became general. Leaders sprang up who organized the embittered mountaineers. The contest seriously distracted the attention of the French government, and was so far favorable to the allies. Marlborough desired to render assistance to the insurgents. Nottingham and the other Tory ministers would not sanction any rebellion against a legitimate king. The civil war in the Cévennes, when it first broke out, was looked upon as an effort of despair, which would quickly end in massacres and executions. It was at its height in 1703, when the Camisards, as the insurgents were denominated, were opposed, under the leadership of a young man named Cavalier, to a Marshal of France, with twelve thousand veteran troops under his command. Cavalier, who as a boy had tended sheep on his native hills, had fled from the persecution which threatened his home, and had apprenticed himself to a baker at Geneva. He was in his twentieth year when he suddenly appeared again in his birthplace and became the head of the most daring band of insurgents. There is no romance more interesting than the adventures of this baker's boy, who displayed a courage, a sagacity, and a military genius which compelled Marshal de Montrevel to give up in despair his system of terror and wholesale destruction by fire and sword. He was recalled, and Marshal Villars was substituted, who adopted milder measures. Cavalier concluded a negotiation with Villars in 1704. The allies could render him no assistance, such as he had expected. The revolt had, in some degree, worn itself out. Villars promised amnesty, with free egress to those who chose to emigrate, and a toleration of religion. The youth on whom the Marshal of France looked with wonder, that he should have succeeded so long in defying the armies of the great monarch, trusted to French diplomacy without receiving any guarantees for the performance of the conditions which he required. They were partially adhered to; but the promise to the Protestants of the free exercise of their religion was soon broken. Cavalier's own comrades were indignant with him for making terms at all. Another chief, Roland, continued the war. Roland was killed in 1704. The fire in the Cévennes "was covered up rather than extinguished," says Burnet. Cavalier afterward served in Spain, subsequently entered the English service, and died at a very advanced age as Governor of Jersey, with the rank of a major-general.*

The campaign of 1703 was as barren of any signal advantages to the arms of the allies as to the arms of France. The parliament had voted an augmentation of troops, and there was no want of decision on the part of Marlborough, to employ the forces of which he had the command in the manner most likely to be productive of a great result. "Our affairs go very ill in Germany," he wrote to Nottingham on the 26th of March. † The Elector of Bavaria had now proclaimed his adhesion to France, had surprised the strong fortress of Ulm, and by effecting a communication with the French on the Upper Rhine had opened a way for the armies of Louis to the centre of Germany. The French forces under Boufflers in the Netherlands threatened Holland; and Marlborough was desirous of attacking them, while the stronger French armies were otherwise engaged. The States-General pressed upon him the desirableness of securing Bonn, which capitulated after a short siege. Three months later Huy was surrendered to the allies. But these successes were of comparatively small import. Marlborough had been in anxious correspondence with Coehorn on a matter which he repeatedly terms "le grand dessein," and "la grande affaire." ‡ Marlborough and Coe-horn had matured a plan for attacking Antwerp, and carrying the war into Flanders. The failure is attributed by Marlborough to "M. de Coehorn's stubbornness, and the dissensions among the generals." He, therefore, had to return toward the Maese; and having taken Huy, to propose some other plan that would have terminated the year with an energetic operation that promised success. The duke proposed, in a council of war, on the 20th of August, to attack the French lines between Mehaigne and Leuwe. This plan was agreed to by the generals in command of the forces of Denmark, Luneburg, and Hesse, as well as by the English generals. The French carefully avoided a battle, and were safe beyond their lines, which Marlborough desired to force. The plan was submitted to the States-General, and was by them rejected. They wanted another fortress, Limbourg, to be taken, which Marlborough said could be accomplished by a detachment of the army. The great general was naturally irritated by this interference with his plans; but he submitted. Marlborough wrote to their high mightinesses that, from the undoubted information he had received of the situation of the enemy, the design was not only practicable, but almost sure of success. "The opportunity is lost, and I wish from my heart that there will be no cause for repentance when it is too late."* He attacked Limbourg, which surrendered after a short siege. In the next campaign Marlborough laid his plans with such secrecy, and carried them out with such promptitude, that the States-General had scarcely time to find fault with the independence of his movements before they heard of their complete success.

On the 9th of November the queen opened the second session of her first parliament. The foreign policy which she announced assumed larger proportions than the object which had been originally defined for the war. Its object was no longer simply "to resist the great power of France," but "for recovering the monarchy of Spain from the house of Bourbon, and restoring it to the house of Austria." The queen announced that she had made a treaty for this object with the King of Portugal, and that subsidies would be required for the Duke of Savoy, who had declared his intention to join the alliance. The principles of the agreement with Portugal were laid down in what is known as the Methuen treaty—called after the name of the ambassador who negotiated it—and that treaty, and its effect upon the commerce of England and the habits of her people, lasted, through five generations even to the present time. The wines of Portugal were to be admitted upon the payment of a duty 33⅓ per cent less than the duty paid upon French wines; and the woollen cloths of England, which had been prohibited in Portugal for twenty years, were to be admitted upon terms of proportionate advantage. Up to that time the claret of France had been the beverage of the wine-drinkers of England. From 1703 port established itself as what Defoe calls "our general draught." In all commercial negotiations with France the Methuen treaty stood in the way; for the preferential duty was continued till 1831. France invariably pursued a system of retaliation. It was a point of patriotism for the Englishman to hold firm to his port. The habit was established; and even now, when the vine-growers of France and the iron-masters of England are equally desirous that commercial restrictions should be removed, it is in vain to say, as Hume said more than a century ago, "We lost the French markets for our woollen manufactures, and transferred the commerce of wine to Spain and Portugal, where we buy worse liquor at a higher price."†

The Archduke Charles of Austria was now hailed as King Charles of Spain. He came to England on the 26th of December. On the 29th he was entertained for two days by the queen at Windsor. Her majesty, according to the official account in the London Gazette, received at their first meeting the compliment of the King of Spain, "acknowledging his great obligations to her for her generous protection and assistance." He was all courtesy and humility. He would scarcely take the right hand of the queen at table; and "after supper he would not be satisfied till after great compliments he had prevailed with the Duchess of Marlborough to give him the napkin which he held to her majesty when she washed." Had the new king, without a kingdom, stayed long enough in England to observe the temper of the parliament and the people, he might have felt that her majesty's "generous protection and assistance" was not the only thing to be considered in our insular politics. At this time the famous Leibnitz, whose acquirements as a philosopher did not interfere with his keen calculations upon political affairs, wrote from Berlin, "The great animosity that prevails between the Whigs and the Tories gives many people a bad opinion of the affairs of England."* How could the people of the continent understand these affairs? Here was England engaged in the greatest war, and committed to the most complicated alliances, of any period of her history, and her government was making the most strenuous efforts to disturb the internal tranquillity which had long subsisted under a system of toleration, and revive the bitter hatreds in matters of religion which appeared to have died out, except among the extreme bigots of either party. A fortnight had scarcely elapsed since the opening of the session, when a new bill against occasional conformity was brought in, and the Commons renewed the work of the previous session with redoubled fury. They passed the bill very quickly by a majority of two hundred and twenty-three to a hundred and forty. The Lords rejected it by a majority of twelve. To analyze the dreary debates would have little interest now. The excitement out of doors has been described by one of the greatest of humorists: "I wish you had been here for ten days, during the highest and warmest reign of party and faction that I ever knew or read of, upon the bill against occasional conformity, which two days ago was, upon the first reading, rejected by the Lords. It was so universal that I observed the dogs in the streets much more contumelious and quarrelsome than usual; and the very night before the bill went up, a committee of Whig and Tory cats had a very warm and loud debate upon the roof of our house. But why should we wonder at that, when the very ladies are split asunder into high church and low, and, out of zeal for religion, have hardly time to say their prayers."† Marlborough, perhaps very little to his taste, was dragged in by the Tories, to whom he yet pretended allegiance, to vote for the bill. He wrote, during the heat of the discussions, to Count Wratislaw, to show how this controversy interfered with the real business of parliament. "If it had not been for the bill against occasional conformity we had reason to flatter ourselves that the session would have terminated with more of unanimity, and that a greater dispatch would have been given to public affairs than we had seen for many years."‡

There were other parliamentary turmoils in this session which involved the most serious disputes between the Lords and Commons. One of these was the controversy about privilege in the matter known as the Scottish plot, which we shall refer to a chapter on Scotland. The other was the constitutional question connected with the famous case of an Aylesbury election. Ashby, a burgess of Aylesbury, sued the returning officer for maliciously refusing his vote. Three judges of the King's Bench decided, against the opinion of Chief Justice Holt, that the verdict which a jury had given in favor of Ashby must be set aside, as the action was not maintainable. The plaintiff went to the House of Lords upon a writ of error, and there the judgment was reversed by a large majority of peers. The lower house maintained that "the qualification of an elector is not cognizable elsewhere than before the Commons of England;" that Ashby was guilty of a breach of privilege; and that all persons who should in future commence such an action, and all attorneys and counsel conducting the same, are also guilty of a high breach of privilege. The Lords, led by Somers, then came to counter-resolutions, of which the most important is, "that the assertion that a person wrongfully hindered from giving his vote for the election of members of parliament, by the officer who ought to take it, is without remedy by the ordinary source of the law, is destructive of the property of the subject, is against the freedom of elections, and manifestly tends to encourage corruption and partiality." The prorogation of parliament put an end to the quarrel in that session; but in the next it was renewed with increased violence. The judgment against the returning officer was followed up by Ashby levying his damages. Other Aylesbury men brought new actions. The Commons imprisoned the Aylesbury electors. The Lords took strong measures that affected, or appeared to affect, the privileges of the Commons. The queen finally stopped the contest by a prorogation, and the quarrel expired when the parliament expired under the Triennial Act. Lord Somers "established the doctrine which has been acted on ever since, that an action lies against a returning officer for maliciously refusing the vote of an elector." *

About the time when these violent political tempests commenced, the nation was terrified by that wonderful war of the elements known as the great storm of 1703. On the night of the 27th of November a mighty wind arose in the western and southern districts of England, and in part of the eastern, which toppled down steeples, unroofed houses, drove great ships from their anchorage, and swept away the watch-towers of the coasts. The shores of the Channel were strewn with wrecks. The Thames and the Severn were crowded with dismasted merchantmen, and hulls whose crews had been swept into the raging sea. Fourteen or fifteen men-of-war were cast away, and fifteen hundred seamen perished with them. The parliament went up with an address to the queen, beseeching her to build new ships, which cost they would effectually defray. Marlborough, in his communications with foreign courts, spoke of the storm as a grievous national calamity, but one which he hoped would not interfere with the dispatch of troops for his Catholic majesty.† A general fast on the 19th of January was observed with unusual devotion, "the terror which the tempest had left on the people's minds," says an historian of the time, "contributing much to their affectionate discharge of that religious duty." Sermons of exhortation to hearken to God's judgments—one of which was called "A warning from the winds"—were preached throughout the land. Defoe wrote a circumstantial account of the unprecedented calamity. But this visitation was soon forgotten in the excitement of war. Marlborough's wonderful campaign of 1704 caused the passing terror of 1703 to be soon forgotten. Addison—it may be somewhat profanely—compared Marlborough in the storm of battle to the angel "who rides in the whirlwind,"

"Such as of late o'er pale Britannia past."

This famous simile of "The Campaign" was pronounced to be wonderfully fine and true. The moralist was soon neglected who said, "I cannot but have so much charity for the worst of my fellow-creatures, that I believe no man was so hardened against his Maker, but he felt some shocks to his wicked confidence from the convulsions of nature." ‡

The commotions of party, in the first and second years of the reign of Anne, were so extreme that men who had higher aims than the possession of power for its own sake looked on with dread and sorrow. Somers wrote to Shrewsbury, who was abroad, in 1704, "Never man was wearier of a place than I have been of this country for many years; nor any one reckoned you happier than I have, for being out of the reach and hearing of all the malice, and baseness, and violence, that men are practising upon one another." § And yet calm and earnest reformers of gross abuses did contrive to carry some measures that were untainted by the breath of faction, and whose benefits still remain to us. One measure of law reform was passed in 1702, in a clause of a statute entitled "An Act for punishing of Accessories to Felonies and Receivers of Stolen Goods, etc." We should scarcely expect to find, under this act for extending the range of the criminal law, a clause which, from that time, has afforded protection to a prisoner under trial, by placing the witnesses in his favor upon an equality with the witnesses for the crown. This clause is as follows: "And be it further enacted, by the authority aforesaid, that from and after the said twelfth day of February, one thousand seven hundred and two, all and every person and persons who shall be produced or appear as a witness or witnesses on the behalf of the prisoner upon any trial for treason or felony, before he or she be admitted to depose or give any manner of evidence, shall first take an oath to depose the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, in such manner as the witnesses for the queen are by law obliged to do, and if convicted of any wilful perjury in such evidence shall suffer all the punishments, penalties, forfeitures and disabilities, which by any of the laws and statutes of this realm are or may be inflicted upon persons convicted of wilful perjury." * Lord Lyndhurst, in 1836, when he so admirably urged the adoption of the bill for giving to all prisoners the right to "full counsel," which had been given, in 1695, in cases of high treason—pointed out that anomaly in the law which was corrected by this statute of Anne: "In cases of felony, no witnesses were examined on the part of the prisoner until Queen Mary sent down directions to the Chief Justice of the Court of Common Pleas to take evidence on the part of the accused, as well as against him. Still the law remained imperfect, because, though witnesses were examined, they were not examined upon oath. Lawyers are sometimes very astute at finding out reasons to support every existing institution, and they assigned a very singular reason for this practice. They said it originated in lenity toward the prisoner, because the witness, not being bound by an oath, would speak largely and beneficially for him. This was rather a singular doctrine, the object of a court of justice being to elicit the truth. But let your lordships mark its practical effect, as exhibited in numerous instances in the state trials—the witnesses against the prisoner being examined on oath, and those in his favor not being examined on oath. The moment the judge began to sum up the evidence to the jury, and contrast the evidence for the prosecution with that given on the part of the prisoner, he always took care to inform the jury that, in estimating the degree of weight which was to be attached to the testimony on each side, they must not lose sight of the important fact that the witnesses for the prosecution were examined on oath, while those for the defence were free from that obligation." †

Amid the violent disputes in parliament upon conformity, stimulated by the equally violent divisions in the convocation—which now claimed a right to sit during a session of parliament without being prorogued—there was one measure of real benefit to the clergy, which is popularly known as "Queen Anne's Bounty." The "first fruits and tenths" of all spiritual preferments had become part of the revenues of the crown, under the statute of Henry VIII., giving to the king, as head of the Church, what the clergy had been accustomed to assign to the pope, in spite of the efforts of parliament to prevent or restrain this practice. The "first fruits" were the whole profits of the preferment during the first year, and the "tenths, or decimæ," the tenth part of the annual profit of each living. When given to the Papal See, they were computed upon a valuation of the time of Edward I. When they became part of the royal revenue, they were computed upon that valuation in the time of Henry VIII. known as "The King's Books." But by the statute of the 26th of Henry VIII. the payments for the smaller rectories or vicarages were wholly or partially remitted; but the larger benefices were bound to contribute to the crown these portions of their nominal value. Queen Anne, by letters-patent of the 3d of November, 1703, "restored to the Church what had been thus indirectly taken from it." ‡ But the restoration was effected in the most judicious manner, not to relieve the larger benefices, but in some small degree to equalize the condition of incumbents, by vesting the first-fruits and tenths in trustees, to form a fund for the augmentation of the smaller livings. These letters-patent were confirmed by statute, of which the preamble is suggestive of what some consider the evils of what is known in our day as "the voluntary principle:" "Whereas a sufficient settled provision for the clergy in many parts of this realm has never yet been made, by reason whereof divers mean and stipendiary preachers are in many places entertained to serve the cures and officiate there, who, depending for necessary maintenance upon the good will and liking of their hearers, have been and are thereby under temptation of too much complying and suiting their doctrine and teaching to the humors rather than the good of their hearers; which hath been a great occasion of faction and schism, and contempt of the ministry." §

was set aside by the revolution and the Act of Settlement, it became the policy of the extreme Tories and High Churchmen to induce the people to look again with complacency upon some of the customs which, at the restoration, had marked the triumphs of divine right and the downfall of Puritanism. Queen Anne revived the ceremony of touching for the king's evil, by which all English monarchs, from the time of Edward the Confessor, whether saints or sinners, of the Roman Catholic or the Reformed Church, had asserted the miraculous power of the wearer of the "golden rigol." William III. was profane enough not to believe in this power. Whiston, who had himself a talent for humor not generally belonging to the vain and eager controversialist, tells a story that William was once prevailed upon to touch for the malady which kings could cure, and that he said to the patient that he prayed God to heal him, and grant him more wisdom at the same time. The discontinuance of the superstition by the king—who, although a truly pious man, made it "his rule all his life long, to hide the impressions that religion made upon him as much as possible"*—necessarily rendered Queen Anne desirous to manifest its efficacy to the world. Her majesty was not perfectly successful in all cases. Dr. Johnson's mother carried him from Lichfield to London, to be touched by the queen, and he used to relate how he had "a confused, but somehow a sort of solemn recollection of a lady in diamonds, and a long black hood." Boswell says, with much gravity, "This touch, however, was without any effect." It was more effectual in a case related by Daines Barrington, of an old man who was witness in a cause, describing how the good queen had touched him when he was a child: "I asked him whether he was really cured? upon which he answered, with a significant smile, that he believed himself never to have had a complaint that deserved to be considered as the evil, but that his parents were poor, and had no objection to the bit of gold"†—the angel of gold, with the impress of St. Michael, which was hung about the patient's neck.

The May-poles that had been set up at the restoration—when the Puritan justices and constables who had pulled them down were no longer in a condition to declare war against them—after the revolution had the fate always harder than persecution, that of neglect. They had ceased to be indicative of party feelings; and they gradually mouldered away upon the village green, and were displaced from the streets of cities in which commerce was more important than merriment. But when Anne came to the throne there was a revival. "I appeal to common knowledge," says Defoe, "if in the first half-year of her present majesty almost all the May-poles in England were not repaired, and re-edified, new painted, new hung with garlands, and beautified." Defoe associates this with the revival of "drunkenness and revelling." He was looking at the May-poles through the old Puritanical glasses, which saw in harmless sports nothing but popery and vice. But the setters-up of the May-poles probably loved as little the merriment of the people as the nonconformists did. "Up went the May-poles," writes Defoe, "that the Church's health might be drunk, till the people not only knew not what they did, but might be ready to do they knew not what, to the demolishing the Church's pretended enemies, the dissenters."‡ A Puritanical rhymester of 1660 makes "Sir May-pole" say,

"There's none as I so near the pope."

The satirist of the extreme opinions of this time is not grossly exaggerating when he says that Martin, in his "mad fit, looked so like Peter in his air and dress, and talked so like him, that many of the neighbors could not distinguish the one from the other, especially when Martin went up and down strutting in Peter's armor, which he had borrowed to fight Jack."§

CHAPTER CXXXV.

Difficulties of recruiting the English army—The campaign of 1704—Marlborough's secret plan of operations—His march along the Rhine—Arrives at the Danube—Battle of the Schellenberg—Devastation of Bavaria—Junction of the French and Bavarian armies—The battle of Blenheim—Results of the victory—Subsequent operations of the campaign—Marlborough returns to England—Honors and rewards—Party conflicts—Parliament dissolved.

THE extreme measures taken by the House of Commons in 1699, for reducing the army to a point almost incompatible with the desire of King William to preserve to England its weight and influence abroad, must have proved a serious embarrassment to the government of Queen Anne in the first two years of her reign. When, in the spring of 1704, Marlborough, taking no counsel of foreign princes or states, and imparting little of his plans to the civil directors of English affairs, was revolving in the most secret recesses of his own mind the plan of that daring campaign which was to exhibit war on its grandest scale, he must have sometimes contemplated with anxious doubt the insufficient means at his own command. We find him on the 29th of March writing from St. James's to M. Hop, the Dutch minister, that the public funds not being sufficient to carry on the war with vigor, the queen had provided additional means out of the privy purse; and he announces that the transports will speedily arrive in the Meuse, with nearly a thousand recruits for the infantry of the English army.* A thousand recruits only, to supply the waste of two campaigns! But if we have reference to the difficulty of recruiting, we shall not be surprised at the small force which Marlborough could contribute, to be drafted into the regiments which he was contemplating to lead upon the most distant march ever attempted in our continental wars. When preparing himself to embark at Harwich, on the 6th of April, he sends to Mr. Secretary Hedges, "the list of officers for the two new regiments of foot to be raised under the command of the Lord Paston and Colonel Heyman Rooke."† But how to be raised? An act of parliament passed on the 23d of March will inform us. When Farquhar was gathering that professional experience which he embodied in 1705 in his "Recruiting Officer," the Captain Plumes and Sergeant Kites, with their drums, and ribbons, and strong ale, were unable to fill the ranks of the army with the "youth of England, all on fire." A bill was brought into parliament in 1704 for a forced levy from each parish—a measure which was rejected as unconstitutional. A plan of general conscription being thus refused, an act was passed, which gave as happy an occasion for favoritism and corrupt influence as when "Master Corporate Bardolph" had "three pounds to free Mouldy and Bull-calf."‡ By the statute "for raising recruits for the land forces and marines," justices of the peace, and mayors or other head-officers of boroughs, were empowered "to raise and levy such able-bodied men as have not any lawful calling or employment, or visible means for their maintenance and livelihood, to serve as soldiers."§ The constables were to receive ten shillings per head for bringing the tattered prodigals before the justices, and the justices were to consign them to the queen's officer, who was to present each of these cankers of a calm world with twenty shillings, and then send them to the wars, to "fill a pit as well as better." This statute of 1704 was renewed in 1705; and the system was also tried in the latter end of the reign of George II. That it had a tendency to lower the military character can scarcely be doubted. But if such recruits were ready to plunder, they were also ready to fight; and for a century and a half England has been contented with such, and has not yet discovered the way to recruit an army by holding out the prospect of honorable distinction and just promotion to the deserving.

The campaign of 1704 was meant by Louis XIV. to decide the great question by which Europe was agitated. The war for two years had been a war of sieges, in which the advantages on the part of the allies had been more than balanced by advantages on the part of France and Bavaria. If Marlborough had gained some strong places in the Netherlands, the French had taken strong forts on the Upper Rhine and the Moselle, and the Bavarians and the French had defeated the imperial troops and were masters of Augsburg and Passau. By the alliance of France with Bavaria, and through the successes of their joint forces, the way to Vienna was open to a great army to be collected on the Danube. Large detachments from the French army of Flanders were to be led by Marshal Villeroy. Marshal Tallard was to leave the Rhine, and advance into Suabia through the Black Forest. The army of Italy was to march through the Tyrol into Austria. The Hungarians, then in a state of insurrection, were to be assisted by French troops. Another century was to pass away before Germany should be again threatened by such a formidable concentration of the military power of France. It required the most extraordinary combination in one man of daring and prudence to conceive the plan of a great war—to devise a vast series of operations upon a similar scale with those of Louis—but of operations to be conducted by the union of many discordant interests, and the subjection of many petty and adverse schemes to the policy of a master-mind. Marlborough had not only to mature his design with small counsel from those who were to join him in carrying it out, but absolutely to conceal it from those who were to render him the most efficient assistance. The difficulties of his course may be traced in his letters; but we also therein trace the indomitable will by which he is determined to surmount them. On the 29th of April he writes from the Hague to Mr. Secretary Hedges, "We are not yet come to any final resolutions here upon the operations of the siege."* On the 2d of May he again writes to the secretary, that in a conference with the deputies of the States, he had informed them of his resolution of going to the Moselle, "as what may most conduce to the public service."† On the 5th of May, the States having consented that Marlborough should lead the joint forces to the Moselle, the troops began to march out of their garrisons. On the 10th of May the great general has got to Ruremond. He now writes confidentially to Mr. Stepney, the English ambassador, that he would not conceal from him "my resolution of marching with the English, some of our auxiliaries, and what other troops can with safety be spared, up to the Danube; but as I have not yet made any declaration to the States of my design of going so far, and as it behoves us to have particular management for them, I must not only desire your secrecy, but pray you will intimate the same thing to his majesty the emperor."‡ He next takes an Englishman into his confidence—Mr. St. John. On Wednesday next, he writes on the 11th of May, the troops will pass the Meuse at Ruremond, on their way to the Moselle; "and I may venture to tell you, though I would not have it public as yet, I design to march a great deal higher into Germany."§ Heinsius, the friend of William III., knew the plans of Marlborough. So did Prince Eugene. But his impenetrable secrecy prevented the Dutch opposing his resolves upon the ground that it would leave their own frontier defenceless. "Under the blind," says Burnet, "of the project of carrying the war to the Moselle, everything was prepared that was necessary for executing the true design." The movements of Villeroy, who had passed the Meuse at Namur, alarmed the Dutch, and they sent a pressing message to Marlborough to halt. The movements of Tallard frightened the Margrave of Baden, and he implored Marlborough to come to his aid. He quieted their fears with smooth words, and went rapidly and steadily on his own march. The French themselves could not understand the movements of Marlborough. Villeroy had been ordered to observe him wheresoever he marched.‖ The French marshal suddenly lost sight of him altogether, and only learned where he really was when he received the news of his first victory over the Bavarians.¶ A contemporary writer accounts for this ignorance, which caused Villeroy to march and countermarch in the neighborhood of the Moselle, while Marlborough had pushed on to the Danube: "They make great use of spies; they also stop all passengers they meet, inquire their names, whence they come, what news they hear. They depend upon such rumors and reports, and take their measures accordingly, in matters of the last importance."

Marlborough is now moving among scenes as familiar to many English as the banks of their own rivers. From the heights of Ehrenbreitstein, then a strong fortress belonging to the Elector of Trèves, he saw his cavalry pass over the Rhine. His infantry soon followed. His artillery and stores were put on board transports at Coblentz, as well as his sick soldiers. Marlborough's attention to detail—which was also one of the distinguishing characteristics of the great commander who came a century after him, with the same mission of arresting the ambition of France—saved his soldiers from many a privation and many a defeat. The allied troops moved along the banks of the Rhine, in the gray dawn and the soft twilight of that early summer. During the noontide heat they rested under the shadow of slopes clothed with budding vines. "The Rhine was a great refreshment to the soldiers," says Cunningham. It was a striking change from the dull plains of Flanders, for the English to gaze upon a river far grander than their own Thames or Severn—to hear their "Grenadiers' March" echoed from ruined castles perched upon every rock beneath which they wound their way; to drink huge draughts of the sharp Rheinwein, in quaint villages where money secured a hearty welcome. On they went cheerily through these novel scenes. "When the confederates had drawn up their ships beyond Andernach, the Mouse Tower, Bingen, and Bacharach, there opened to them on the left hand a large plain, whereon the whole army was seen to march at once, making a glorious sight in their arms and new clothes."* The army halted a day at Cassel, near Mayence, where the elector reviewed the troops; and when he first looked upon the English officers in their scarlet and gold—"all plumed like estridges"—he exclaimed, "These gentlemen seem to be all dressed for the ball." Marlborough wrote to Godolphin that he should send to Frankfort to see if he could raise a month's pay for his English upon bills; "for, notwithstanding the continual marching, the men are extremely pleased with this expedition, so that I am sure you will take all the care possible that they may not want."†

While the army under the immediate command of Marlborough was thus moving toward the Danube, by the Rhine, it was no small part of his anxiety so to regulate the movements of the other confederates that a junction of the principal forces should be effected before they appeared in the presence of their powerful enemies. Up to this time some of the allies had been kept in ignorance of his ultimate plans; but he had so skilfully managed his communications with them that they, in drawing toward the Moselle, might be ready to march far beyond to effect a junction with his main army. Marlborough passed the Neckar, on the 3d, by a bridge of boats at Ladenburg. He here halted for two days. Troops were drawing near to join him as he advanced—Dutch, Luxemburg, Hesse, and Danish allies. He then expected to be on the Danube in ten days; but he found the roads excessively difficult, and had to make circuitous marches. He evidently had an imperfect knowledge of the country. At Mundelshiem, on the 10th, Marlborough and Prince Eugene met for the first time, and after three days they were joined by Prince Louis of Baden. Prince Eugene was in Marlborough's full confidence, and they hoped to act together for their common object. But for the present they were unable to arrange that united command which each desired in his reliance upon the other's judgment. Prince Louis of Baden asserted his claim of precedence to be with the main army as its commander. It was at last agreed that he and Marlborough should command on alternate days; and that Eugene should return to the Rhine to command a body of thirty thousand men—"the security of the lines and the passage of the Rhine being of the last importance to us."‡

Toward the end of June we find in the letters of Marlborough ample evidence of the deep anxiety with which he regards the great crisis which is approaching. Slight indications of doubt and impatience manifest themselves beneath the surface of his imperturbable temper. His friends in Holland, he understands, are alarmed, and he entreats that they may be quieted; for if, misled by appearances, they were to give orders for their troops to march back, all his projects would be entirely disconcerted.§ On the 29th he writes to Harley, that the army, in camp at Giengen, is within two leagues of the Elector of Bavaria; but the Danish horse are not come up; "though if the Duke of Würtemberg had hastened his march, according to the repeated orders I sent, he might have been here by this time."‖ But the English infantry and artillery have at length joined the cavalry with which Marlborough himself had pushed on; and he is now ready for serious work. Marshal Tallard and Marshal Villeroy, he learns, are at Strasburg, preparing to send the elector a great reinforcement through the Black Forest.* One blow may be struck at the elector before his friends come to his aid.

On the 1st of July Marlborough had received advice from a peasant living near Donawert, that thirteen thousand Bavarians and French were posted in an intrenched camp upon the Schellenberg. This eminence is described by Mr. Hare, the duke's chaplain, as about two English miles in circumference at the base, having a gradual ascent, and a large flat at the top, where the enemy was encamped in several lines. The Schellenberg joined the town of Donawert, from which an intrenchment was carried round the top of the hill, at whose base, on the south, flowed the Danube. The intrenchment was the strongest and the most regular on the north, where the hill is accessible from a spacious plain. Cunningham has given a somewhat picturesque description of the Schellenberg: "On the top of the hill stands a church, with a churchyard, which was encompassed by the camp, and surrounded with the intrenchment. Adjoining to the churchyard is a little hill, which extends itself westward to a plain, and toward the south is broken into several hillocks, the bottoms whereof are washed by the Danube. Toward the east there is a ridge of hills covered by thick woods, frequented by robbers, and dangerous to passengers; and at this time not less fit for an ambuscade than the purposes of rapine."† At three o'clock on the morning of the 2d of July Marlborough marched out of his camp with a detachment of six thousand foot, thirty squadrons of horse, and three regiments of imperial grenadiers. The roads were difficult, and it was noon before they reached the river Wernitz, a tributary of the Danube. They had marched twelve miles, and there were yet three miles of very rough ways to pass. The main body of the army was following the detachment. Fatigued as the men were, the duke resolved to storm the Schellenberg before the night closed. At six o'clock the attack began. The foot advanced in four lines up the rising ground; the horse in two lines. The cannon from the intrenchments of the hills, and from the works at Donawert, swept away officers and men with case-shot. The allied troops carried fascines to be thrown down into the intrenchments; but by a mistake they threw them down into the hollow way which ran before the works, and the enemy came out of their trenches to charge a confused host, whose commanding officers were for the most part killed or wounded. But the English guards stood their ground, presenting that solid front which has arrested many an onset; and the Gallo-Bavarians retired. The whole force of the Schellenberg was now concentrated upon the English and Danish assailants. The infantry shrunk before the incessant fire; but the horse closed up and rallied them, and again they attacked with redoubled vigor. Meanwhile, the enemy having withdrawn his men from the works on the right, nearest to Donawert, Prince Louis of Baden led the imperialists to the feebly defended intrenchments, and they, throwing their fascines into the ditch, passed over with slight loss. The contest on the left still raged. The intrenchments were obstinately disputed, but at the end of an hour and a half the lines were forced; the allies possessed the camp; the routed enemy fled toward Donawert, whither they were pursued with great slaughter; the Bavarian general, Count d'Arco, saved himself with difficulty; and as the flying crowds crossed the bridge of the Danube it broke down, and the waters swallowed those who had escaped the sword. Only three thousand of the men of the intrenched camp of the Schellenberg joined the Elector of Bavaria, out of the twelve or thirteen thousand that occupied that almost impregnable position. But the allies also sustained a loss of more than five thousand killed and wounded. The determination of Marlborough to storm the intrenched camp was daring—almost rash. Marshal Conway, in 1774, viewed the ground, and wrote: "The intrenchments on the heights of Schellenberg are, for the form, still entire, and appear, both for construction and position, very strong."‡ There were fourteen English infantry regiments in the action, and seven of cavalry. Twenty-nine of their officers were killed, and eighty-six wounded. Marlborough, in his dispatch to Harley, does not mention the aid he received from the Prince of Baden. This was not jealousy, but contempt. The partisans of the prince repaid this, by ascribing the victory to the imperial general.

It would be a satisfaction to the honest pride of an Englishman if he could ascribe to the commands of the Prince of Baden the disgraceful scenes of the next fortnight. Negotiations had been going on between the emperor and the Elector of Bavaria, to induce the elector to join the allies. Articles had been agreed upon; but when the elector was expected to sign, he sent his secretary to say that as Marshal Tallard was marching with an army of thirty thousand men to his relief, it was not in his power, nor consistent with his honor, to quit the French interest. Marlborough, who relates this to Mr. Secretary Hedges, coolly adds, "We are now going to burn and destroy the elector's country, to oblige him to hearken to terms."* To burn and destroy a country may be a glib phrase of war, to which some persons may attach no very definite meaning. It was here no idle threat to make the elector come to terms. The work was set about in a very business-like manner. On the 31st of July three thousand horse were sent out, "to begin in the neighborhood of Munich," under the command of the Comte d'Orst Frise. To him Marlborough writes the next day to say, that he has desired the Comte de la Tour to execute the same job in another quarter, during a couple of days, "brûlant en attendant tout ce qu'il pourra."† On the 3d of August he writes to Harley, that his titled agents have returned, "having burnt a great number of villages between this and Munich, so that the elector can expect nothing less than the ruin of Bavaria for his obstinacy and breach of promise."‡ The elector can expect nothing less! But the elector's people? The politic duke thoroughly knew what "the ruin of Bavaria" meant. He is quite sentimental when he writes to his duchess about these matters. To burn and destroy "is so contrary to my nature, that nothing but absolute necessity would have obliged me to consent to it, for these poor people suffer for their master's ambition. There having been no war in this country for above sixty years, these towns and villages are so clean, that you would be pleased with them." His nature suffers, he says, to see so many fine places burned. And then the sweet domestic affections break forth from his troubled heart: "I shall never be easy and happy till I am quiet with you."§ He had a wife and children for whom he yearns. He has given up thousands of hapless wives and children to the destroyer. The villages, "so clean," that gave them shelter; the food they have just begun to gather into their garners; the standing corn—all are burned; the wives and children, with the husbands and fathers, are perishing, because the Elector of Bavaria prefers the French interest to that of the emperor. An English historian writes, "Thus was avenged the barbarous desolation of the Palatinate thirty years before."‖ Surely this sort of vengeance has at length become so odious that Churchill the duke, and Morgan the buccaneer, might be placed in the same category as enemies of the human race, if the hero, in all ages, had not been held exempt from the ordinary code of morals. In Mr. Addison's day such deeds were not held to be crimes; "courage and compassion" were joined in the "good and great" Marlborough, when "he thinks it vain to spare his rising wrath:"

> "The listening soldier fix'd in sorrow stands,
> Loth to obey his leader's just commands;
> The leader grieves, by generous pity sway'd,
> To see his just commands so well obey'd."¶

Forty years ago Archdeacon Coxe thus caressingly writes of his hero: "Although Marlborough was thus compelled to fulfil the most unwelcome duty which can fall to a general, his private correspondence shows that he felt as a man." Perhaps the reverend biographer would have been less moved with the maudlin sentimentality of the letter to the duchess, which we have quoted, if he had known how one greater than Marlborough regarded such "duty." When Massena abandoned Portugal in March, 1811, burning and destroying every town and village as he retreated before the English army, Lord Wellington thus described the operations of the French general: "His retreat has been marked by a barbarity seldom equalled and never surpassed."†† Barbarity is the word—the act of a savage, as distinguished from the act of the civilized man. "The laws of war, rigorously interpreted, authorize such examples when the inhabitants take arms," writes Sir William Napier, the historian of the Peninsular campaigns. The quiet population upon whom Marlborough let loose all the terrors of fire and sword had not lifted a finger to oppose his progress. And yet Marlborough was not a cruel man. He always treated his prisoners with exemplary humanity. There may be situations in war when severity is truly mercy. Was this such a situation?

On the 3d of August Marlborough was encamped at Friedberg. He writes to Harley that the allies intend to march on the morrow, the artillery being ready at Nieuburg for the siege of Ingolstadt. Prince Louis, he says, "has made me the compliment either of commanding or covering the siege; I believe I shall choose the latter." He adds, "We have nothing new of M. Tallard, which makes us apprehensive that he may be halted at Ulm, in order to repass the Danube, by which he may be more uneasy to us than if he joined with the elector." Tallard, however, did join the elector, and their united forces were encamped at Biberach on the 8th of August. Marlborough had weakened his main army by dispatching Prince Louis to carry on the siege of Ingolstadt. Prince Eugene was encamped at Donawert. On the 9th Eugene hastily rode into Marlborough's camp, to announce that the united Gallo-Bavarian army had advanced from Biberach toward Lauingen, with the supposed intention of passing the Danube. It was agreed that the prince should be immediately reinforced, and that the whole army should advance nearer the Danube, in order to join him.* Tallard and the elector passed the Danube on the 10th, and encamped at Dillingen. On that day Marlborough was encamped at Schonefeldt. It was a crisis of extreme danger; for if Tallard had attacked either army before their junction, his superiority in numbers would have assured him a victory. Eugene commanded a force of twenty thousand men, composed of Prussians, Danes, Austrians, and troops of the empire. Marlborough commanded a force of thirty-six thousand men, composed of English, Dutch, Hessians, Hanoverians, and Danes. Tallard, and his fellow-general Marsin, commanded forty-eight thousand Frenchmen, and the Bavarians numbered twelve thousand. On the 11th Marlborough marched from Schonefeldt, and crossing the Lech at Rain, joined Eugene that night, having passed the Danube at Donawert. They intended to advance and encamp at Hochstet, "in order whereto," says Marlborough, "we went out on Tuesday [the 12th] early in the morning to view the ground, but found the enemy had already possessed themselves of it, whereupon we resolved to attack them."† It was no rash resolve, which dispensed with the necessary precautions to insure success. Marlborough and Eugene went up into the steeple of the church of Dapfheim; saw a camp being marked out upon a hill where the enemy's cavalry were stationed, and the infantry in full march toward it; carefully noted all the practicable ways from their own camp to that which they saw forming; and, to facilitate the movements of the next day, ordered a ravine to be levelled by their pioneers.‡ The allied army was encamped to the north-west of the river Kessel. The French and Bavarian army was encamped beyond the river Nebel, in the broadest part of the valley of the Danube, their right resting upon the great stream to which the Kessel, the Nebel, and two intervening rivulets are tributaries. The distance between the Kessel and the Nebel is four or five miles, with the wooded heights of the Schellenberg shutting in the valley, till it opens into the wide and fertile plain of Blenheim.

On the night of the 12th orders were given that the allied army should move before break of day. In the plain to the north-west of the Nebel there are three villages: Kremheim, close upon the Danube; Unterglaugh, in the centre of the valley; Berghausen, at its eastern extremity. At three o'clock in the morning of the 13th of August the army of Eugene, filing by the right, in four columns, and the army of Marlborough, also in four columns, were passing the Kessel, over bridges which had been constructed on the previous day. Two brigades, which had taken position in advance at Dapfheim the evening before, formed a ninth column. This column had a considerable accession of strength given to it, and, under the command of the gallant Lord Cutts, marched along the Danube, upon the extreme left, by Kremheim, with orders to attack the village of Blenheim. Marlborough and Eugene, with the advanced guard, were sufficiently near by seven o'clock to take a view of the positions of the Gallo-Bavarian army. Their right was at the village of Blenheim, where Marshal Tallard had his headquarters. Their left was at the village of Lutzingen, covered by a wood. The space occupied by their lines was in length about four miles, upon rising ground which commanded the whole plain to the Nebel, in front. The morning was hazy, and Tallard was somewhat unaccountably deceived as to the intentions of Marlborough and Eugene. In a postscript to a letter which he wrote at a very early hour, he says, "This thirteenth, the enemy beat 'la générale' at two o'clock, and at three 'l'assemblée.' . . . According to all appearance they will march to-day, and the report of the country is that they are going to Nordlingen." Tallard found his mistake when the sun cleared away the mist, and the columns of Eugene were seen coming out from the hill-side behind Berghausen. His first operation was to call in his foragers, and to set fire to the villages on that side of the Nebel on which the allies were advancing. At eight o'clock the French began to cannonade, and the batteries of Marlborough and Eugene soon replied. Eugene, however, had found considerable difficulty in taking up his ground. His march upon the edge of the wooded hills had been rough and circuitous. He had rivulets to cross running through swampy ground. His wing had been necessarily extended. It was past noon when he had placed his troops, upon the extreme right, in front of the Elector of Bavaria; and it had been agreed between the two commanders that the battle should not commence till both were ready. The announcement from Eugene was made; and then Marlborough mounted his horse, and gave the command that the lines should move forward to cross the Nebel, and that Cutts should commence the attack upon Blenheim.

The village of Plentheim, or Blenheim, had been converted by Tallard into a strong post. It appeared to him that the Nebel was impassable in the centre of the plain, and he therefore concentrated his chief strength on the right, leaving his left equally strong under the elector. The military critics of the time of Tallard severely blamed him for this disposition of his force. St. Simon says that, by a blindness without example, he had placed twenty-six battalions of infantry, six regiments of dragoons, and a brigade of cavalry—an entire army—merely for the purpose of holding a village, and supporting his right, which would have been better supported by the Danube. An English marshal, who viewed the ground seventy years afterward, writes, "As far as the disposition was concerned, the neglect of the centre, and the crowding so many battalions into Blenheim, while the flank of the village was not proportionally sustained, seem to me among the principal faults of M. Tallard."* The French marshal took extraordinary pains in the defence of Blenheim, by forming barricades between the village and the Danube, and by making every house and garden a little fortress. As far as regarded the attack upon this spot, the means of defence were wholly successful. At one o'clock the allied troops under Cutts descended to the Nebel, and crossed by two water-mills which had been set on fire. Brigadier-general Rowe led the English to the attack, supported by a brigade of Hessians. When they were within thirty yards of the palisades which surrounded the village, a heavy fire of grape swept away their ranks. Rowe led his men to the barriers, determined to enter sword in hand. He fell, mortally wounded, and the irresistible fire of the enemy compelled a speedy retreat. Squadron after squadron crossed the rivulet at other points, and advanced in front of the village. Three times were the assailants repulsed, but at last they held their ground, and were enabled to occupy the attention of the great body of troops within Blenheim, by keeping up a feigned attack, while the main body of Marlborough's army was crossing the Nebel. It was a difficult and dangerous operation, which occupied several hours. The stream in one part had two branches, with soft and marshy ground between each branch. "There was very great difficulty and danger," says the duke's chaplain, "in defiling over the rivulet in the face of an enemy already formed, and supported by several batteries of cannon; yet by the brave examples given and great diligence used by the commanding officers, and by the eagerness of the men, all passed over by degrees and kept their ground."* The reliance of Tallard upon the difficulty of passing the marshes would appear to have been the reason that he offered no opposition to the passage of the allied army, but that of a continual discharge of cannon. St. Simon severely blames him that he left a large space between his own troops and the brook, that his enemies might pass at their ease, "to be overthrown afterward, as was said." The English, according to the same authority, speaking the opinions of French officers, had plenty of ground at their disposal, while Tallard by a different arrangement might have been master of a vast plain. Nevertheless, as the columns of the allies passed the stream, volleys of musketry were poured upon them, and the charges of French cavalry were incessant. The conflict gradually extended from the left to the centre, as English, Dutch, Danes, and Hanoverians came into position. Marsin, who commanded the French at the west of the valley, near the village of Oberglaugh, repulsed the Danish and Hanoverian horse. The Prince of Holstein Beck then led eleven battalions from the heights on the opposite side of the Nebel, and began to cross. His columns were immediately charged by nine battalions, including the Irish brigade in the French service, and the foremost battalions of Holstein Beck were cut to pieces. Marlborough then led a body of cavalry and infantry to the rescue, and compelled the enemy to retire. During the passage of the left wing of the allies, Prince Eugene had been fighting the elector on the right with indifferent success. Three times had he attacked, and three times he had been compelled to retire to the wood, and re-form his broken ranks. As the sun was westering the issue of the battle might appear doubtful. The French, on the extreme left of the line of the allies, held Blenheim securely. The French and Bavarians on the right had repulsed all the spirited attacks of Eugene, and the combatants faced each other, exhausted and irresolute. The main bodies under Tallard and Marlborough had not yet come to a general encounter. Marlborough has formed his cavalry in two lines in the centre of the plain, with his infantry in their rear toward the left. At five o'clock the trumpets sound a charge, and the horse and foot mount the acclivity. The French receive the charge firmly, and the allies fall back, but still keep the brow of the hill. Their cannon are brought up, and the fire on each side is close and incessant. It is the weak part of the French line, and they cannot stand against the storm of musketry. Another charge, and now the French horse are scattered. Nine battalions of French infantry that had been intermingled with their cavalry are cut to pieces. Marsin has fallen back to avoid a flank attack, and the centre of the French line is more and more in danger. Tallard dispatches orders to the little army shut up in Blenheim to come to his aid. It is too late. He sends for a reinforcement to the elector. Eugene has given the elector enough to do in his own position. A third charge of Marlborough's horse, and the battle is won. The centre of the French lines is broken by these terrible charges, and now Tallard's cavalry endeavor to rally behind the tents of their camp. The allies close upon them. The rout is now general. Some fly toward Hochstet, about two miles in the rear. Others crowd to the nearer village of Sonderheim, upon the bank of the Danube. General Hompesch pursues those who had gone in the direction of Hochstet. Marlborough himself, with his victorious cavalry, charges upon those who fled toward Sonderheim. Down the steep banks of the Danube rush the fugitives. Many attempt to swim the river, and are drowned. Others file toward Hochstet under the banks, and prepare to rally. The victorious squadrons appear, and again they flee. Marshal Tallard has reached Sonderheim, but he finds retreat impossible, and surrenders himself to an aide-de-camp of the Prince of Hesse. One extraordinary document still in existence exhibits the wonderful self-possession of the conqueror in this agony of his triumph. The great duke pauses a minute in his pursuit of the flying enemy to write this note, in pencil, to his duchess, upon a slip of paper, torn from a memorandum-book:

"August 13th, 1704.

"I have not time to say more, but to beg you will give my Duty to the Queen, and let her know her Army has had a Glorious Victory. Monsr. Tallard and two other Generals are in my Coach, and I am following the rest. the bearer my Aid de Camp Coll Parke will give Her and account of what has passed, I shal doe it in a day or two by another more at large "Marlborough"

* "Dispatches," vol. i. p. 403.

The fighting was over. And there was a large body of Bavarians and French at one end of the line, and there were twelve thousand French shut up in Blenheim at the other end. The troops of the elector and of Marsin seeing the rout of Tallard, and being closely pressed by Eugene, had set fire to their positions of Oberglaugh and Lutzingen, and were moving away in unbroken order. Night was coming on; the distance was indistinct from the clouds of smoke which hung over the battle-field; and Marlborough, mistaking the troops of Eugene for part of the army of the elector, "marching in good order, and in such a direction as might have enabled them advantageously to flank our squadrons, had they charged the other part of the elector's force"*—offered no interruption to their retreat. The scene at Blenheim was of a far more stirring character. During the day the French there had held out against every attack; but now, when the main body of Tallard's army was routed, the allies closed round the barricaded village. Horse and foot were ready to assail the isolated forces in every direction. Artillery was brought up, and batteries constructed. All the great English generals were assembled to unite in this final struggle. Cutts was there, and Orkney with his Scotch Royal; Churchill, and Lumley; Ross, and Ingoldsby; Webb, and Wood. The French finally surrendered as prisoners of war. St. Simon has told the story of this surrender, with a Frenchman's sense of national humiliation, but with a minuteness which leaves no doubt that he had his details from the first authority—that of the officer who signed the capitulation. This officer was Blansac, the camp-marshal, who had been left in command when his superior officer had abruptly withdrawn himself. Denonville, a young officer who had been taken prisoner, came toward the village, and waving a handkerchief, demanded a parley. He came to exhort Blansac and the troops to surrender. Blansac sharply dismissed him. Denonville returned again, with an English lord, who demanded a parley with the commandant. The Englishman told Blansac that the Duke of Marlborough had directed him to say that he was marching upon Blenheim with forty battalions and sixty pieces of cannon; that he was beginning to surround the village on all sides; that there was no force left to support the position; that Tallard was in flight; that the elector had retreated; that he had no succor to hope; and that he had better surrender himself and all his men as prisoners of war. Blansac was for sending the lord back with a hasty refusal. But the Englishman pressed him to step out of the village with him, only a couple of hundred paces, and behold the state of things with his own eyes. Blansac could no longer doubt. He returned, and submitted to his chief officers that, however frightful would be the impression upon the French nation that twenty-six battalions and twelve squadrons should have surrendered as prisoners of war, it was better to preserve so many brave men for the future service of their king. "This horrible capitulation," as St. Simon terms it, was forthwith signed. Marlborough was embarrassed by the number of his prisoners. In a few days he had more than twelve thousand on his hands; and he writes to Sir Charles Hedges, "they are not only very troublesome, but oblige us to continue here, while we should be pursuing our blow and following the enemy." †

The post road from Ulm to Ratisbon traverses a part of the field of Blenheim. It "rests partly on a foundation of bones of men and horses, part of which were disinterred in constructing it a few years back."‡ This is more wholesale evidence of the mighty battle than when little Peterkin found "something large and round" beside the rivulet, and old Kaspar shook his head with a natural sigh:

"'Tis some poor fellow's skull, said he,
Who fell in the great victory." §

It is computed that the two armies of Marlborough and Eugene had eleven thousand men killed and wounded; and the armies of France and the elector, fourteen thousand. It was supposed that the total loss of the French and Bavarians in the battle, and during their retreat amounted to forty thousand men, including prisoners and deserters.‖ The blow to the power of France was tremendous. All the prestige of her glories under Turenne and Luxemburg was gone. "There never," says Cunningham, "was a battle fought within the memory of man, wherein either the courage of the soldiers or the prudence of the generals were more conspicuous than on this day, which first ruined the French fortunes, and put a stop to their long course of victories." Louis received the fatal news on the 21st, but without any details. For six days he remained in uncertainty as to the real losses. "We were not used to misfortunes," says St. Simon. "The grief of the king at this disgrace and this loss, at the moment when he believed that the fate of Europe was in his hands, may be imagined. When he might have counted upon striking a decisive blow, he saw himself reduced to act simply upon the defensive."

The day after a great victory rarely leaves the conqueror at his ease. Marlborough had no dread of a desperate enemy returning to a new contest. The French were flying through the Black Forest, and did not hold themselves safe until they had crossed the Rhine by the bridge of Strasburg. On the night of the battle the victors found a hundred slaughtered oxen in the French camp, with other food. On the 15th of August Marlborough was imploring the Duke of Würtemberg to send him two hundred wagons to carry bread to the army, without which, he says, "we can neither stir nor remain where we are." The English soldiers, when the oxen were devoured, could not subsist upon the herbs and vegetables that they found in the French tents. In a previous letter Marlborough had said to Godolphin, "Our greatest difficulty is that of making our bread follow us; for the troops that I have the honor to command cannot subsist without it; and the Germans, that are used to starve, cannot advance without us." He had not only to feed his own camp, but had twelve thousand prisoners, who would be as clamorous under starvation as the English and Dutch. The 17th of August "was devoutly observed through the whole army, in returning thanks to Almighty God for his blessing upon the arms of the allies."* The difficulties were speedily surmounted, and on the 20th the army was before Ulm. "We must not leave this city behind us," writes the provident general. "When we are masters of it, I believe the French will hardly attempt coming again into this country."† On the 12th of September Marlborough received the news that the garrison had capitulated. The allies were then advancing to the siege of Landau, which the Prince of Baden was to conduct, and Marlborough was to cover with his army, for Villeroy was hovering around, but would not come to battle. The defence of this strongly fortified place was very obstinate. On the 8th of November Marlborough writes to Harley, "Our people are entire masters of the counterscarp, from whence we are now firing with near sixty pieces of cannon at the breach."‡ He was impatient to go to Berlin, to conclude an agreement with the King of Prussia for a large addition to the allied forces. Meanwhile he had concluded a treaty with the Electress of Bavaria, who was left regent, by which she agreed that all her troops should be disbanded. Honors were coming thick upon the conqueror. He was admitted a prince of the Roman Empire by the Emperor of Germany, and is addressed by him as "Most Illustrious Cousin and dear Prince." A principality was created for him. Leaving what he calls "this tedious siege" of Landau, he posts to Berlin, and concludes his treaty with the king. On the 3d of December he receives, at Hanover, the news of the capitulation of Landau. Trierbach, another strong place, also fell. On the 16th of December he is at the Hague, preparing to sail for England, with Marshal Tallard and others, his distinguished prisoners. On the 22d he embarked at Rotterdam; and on the 26th he dates from St James's.

The Duke of Marlborough took his seat on his arrival in the House of Peers. When he stood up to answer the congratulatory address of the lord keeper, who ascribed everything to the general and nothing to his troops, he wisely and modestly replied: "My lords, I am extremely sensible of the great honor your lordships are pleased to do me. I must beg, on this occasion, to do right to all the officers and soldiers I had the honor of having under my command. Next to the blessing of God, the good success of this campaign is owing to their extraordinary courage. I am sure it will be a great satisfaction, as well as an encouragement to the whole army, to find their services so favorably accepted." He replied in very similar terms to the complimentary address of the House of Commons. A reward more solid than congratulations was immediately bestowed upon him. Soon after the Commons had unanimously voted their address, the queen sent a message to the effect that her majesty having taken into her consideration their address, "relating to the great services performed by the Duke of Marlborough, does incline to grant the interest of the crown in the honor and manor of Woodstock, and hundred of Wootton, to him and his heirs"—desiring the assistance of the house to clear off the incumbrance of the property, the rents and profits having been granted for two lives. Upon this noble estate of Woodstock—the ancient palace of the Plantagenets—the favorite haunt of Chaucer—the retreat of Elizabeth in her early days of fear and sorrow—was built the palace of Blenheim.

While Marlborough had been conducting his wonderful campaign of 1704, it had been felt by the violent Tory party in England that he had ceased to belong to them. The triumphant resistance to the power of France was not in harmony with their ancient hopes, which led them to look to some day when the great Louis should give them back a king with a more legitimate title, in their eyes, than any title that could be conferred by an Act of Settlement. The wife of Burnet had written to the Duchess of Marlborough, after the news of the great day of Blenheim, that certain people said, "It was true a great many men were killed and taken, but that to the French king was no more than to take a bucket of water out of a river." The duchess transmitted this to her lord, and he replied, "If they will allow me to draw one or two such buckets more, I should think we might then let the river run quietly, and not much apprehend its overflowing and destroying its neighbors."* With this manifestation of contempt, we nevertheless find the equability of the duke disturbed by the acrimony of the party at home, who were still powerful in the House of Commons. He writes to the duchess, in October, "I will endeavor to leave a good name behind me in countries that have hardly any blessing but that of not knowing the detested names of Whig and Tory. . . . I shall certainly not care what any party thinks of me, being resolved to recommend myself to the people of England, by being, to the best of my understanding, in the true interest of my country."† When Marlborough came home he found the people of England ready enough to give him the heartiest welcome, without reference to the passionate quarrels of factions. The standards that had been taken in the campaign were carried in a grand military procession from the Tower to Westminster Hall, and there hung up, with the whole population of London shouting for Anne and Marlborough as a hundred and twenty pikemen each carried one of these tattered emblems of victory. When the hero was entertained by the city, the roofs and windows of the houses sent forth as hearty shouts of gratulation as when Raleigh and Drake went to St. Paul's to return thanks for the defeat of the Spanish Armada. The factions of the Commons cared nothing for a national triumph—they sought only the triumph of a party. They had for a third time brought forward the factious bill against occasional conformity, before Marlborough returned home; and they had made the most strenuous efforts to tack it to a money bill which was to enable the war to be continued. The scheme was defeated. The tackers, as they were called, became ridiculous to the nation. The Commons then passed the bill, without tacking it to a money bill. Marlborough arrived in time to vote against it in this amended form. It was thrown out by the Lords. On the 14th of March the queen, in proroguing the parliament, spoke of "unreasonable humor and animosity," and exhorted to prudence and moderation. "When this session," says Burnet, "and with it this parliament, came to an end, it was no small blessing to the queen and to the nation that they got well out of such hands. They had discovered, on many occasions, and very manifestly, what lay at bottom with most of them; but they had not skill enough to know how to manage their advantages, and to make use of their numbers. The constant successes with which God had blessed the queen's reign put it out of their power to compass that which was aimed at by them; the forcing a peace, and of consequence the delivering all up to France."‡ Marlborough, though he still affected to be of no faction, saw the time had passed by when he could have the support of the party which the queen had first marked by her favor. Those who had attempted to stop the supplies by tacking to their vote the Occasional Conformity Bill were the High Tories, with whom he long conspired to make the life of King William a burden to him, by disturbing all his designs for the independence of nations. Marlborough, after the session was ended, wrote to Godolphin, "As to what you say of the tackers I think the answer and method that should be taken is what is practised in all armies—that is, if the enemy give no quarter they should have none given to them." Godolphin's mode of giving no quarter was to deprive every man of public employment "who had given his vote for the tack." Whigs gradually were called by Godolphin into the public service, and political aspirants began to see that there was not only a virtue in moderation, but that it was a virtue which brought its own reward.

CHAPTER CXXXVI.

The war in Spain—Expedition to Catalonia—Gibraltar taken by Sir George Rooke and the Prince of Darmstadt—Sea-fight off Malaga—Siege of Gibraltar by the Spaniards—Expedition to Spain under Peterborough—Siege of Barcelona—Peterborough surprises Montjouich—Barcelona taken—Peterborough's rapid successes in Valencia—Philip V. besieges Barcelona—It is relieved—The allies enter Madrid—Supineness of the Austrian king—Disgust of Peterborough—He leaves Spain—Prince Eugene drives the French out of Italy.

While Marlborough was leading the army of the allies to the Rhine—an army upon whose success depended the great issue between the King of France and the Emperor of Germany—the Archduke Charles, who had assumed the title of King of Spain, had landed at Lisbon, and was prepared to head the troops on the western frontier of the kingdom to which he laid claim. But instead of carrying the war into Spain, the army of English, Dutch, and Portuguese were completely held in check by the Duke of Berwick; and the allies were unable to prevent several of the Portuguese towns being taken by the Spaniards. At the opposite extremity of the peninsula an attempt was made to rouse the Catalans to declare for King Charles. The Prince of Darmstadt was sanguine of success, and a little army of five or six thousand men was put under his command. They embarked at Lisbon in May, in a fleet of which Sir George Rooke was the admiral. The expedition landed at Barcelona; but receiving very little support from the people, it re-embarked, and Rooke sailed down the Mediterranean, and passed through the Straits, where he effected a junction with a fleet under Sir Cloudsley Shovel. It was not in the nature of English sailors willingly to return to port without effecting anything; and so the admirals planned an attack upon Gibraltar, in which the Prince of Darmstadt agreed to join. The famous rock on which the Saracens had built their castle in the eighth century, and which they held till the middle of the fifteenth century, was strongly fortified by the Spaniards; but its vast importance as the key of the Mediterranean was not estimated as in more recent times. In 1704 there were not more than a hundred men within the works; but they were commanded by a brave veteran who rejected with disdain the summons to surrender. Two thousand marines, under the command of the Prince of Darmstadt, landed on the isthmus, now known as the Neutral Ground, and the supplies from the mainland were thus cut off. On the 2d of August Rooke commenced a bombardment from his ships, which was continued on the next day. That day was a great festival, and a part of the garrison went to pray to their saint, instead of standing by their guns. The eastern part of the rock was thus imperfectly defended, and the English sailors scaled the precipice. At the same time the South Molehead was stormed, with a heavy loss to the assailants by the springing of a mine. But they gained the ramparts, and all resistance was at an end. The brave governor made honorable terms for himself and his garrison; and upon the rock which has defied every besieger through a century and a half, the English flag floated in an easy victory. Sir George Rooke took possession in the name of the Queen of England; although the Prince of Darmstadt would have hoisted the Spanish standard and proclaimed King Charles.*

* Mahon, "War of the Succession," p. 100.

The Prince of Darmstadt remained at Gibraltar with a force of two thousand men. The English fleet then went in search of a French fleet that had been equipped at Toulon, and was under the command of the high-admiral of France, the Count de Toulouse. Rooke had been joined by some Dutch vessels; the French admiral had also been joined by some Spanish vessels. These two armaments, formidable in the number of their ships, met off Malaga. They fought all day; but not a ship of the hundred vessels engaged was sunk, or burned, or taken, on either side. Nothing exhibits a more striking contrast to the naval engagements of the days of Nelson than this drawn battle. And yet we must not conceive that little damage was done, or that it was a bloodless action. Sir Cloudsley Shovel describes the fight as "very sharp." He says, "There is hardly a ship that must not shift one mast, and some must shift all."* The French fleet was even more disabled. The Count de Toulouse sailed away to Toulon, and Rooke made for Gibraltar. Te Deum was sung in Paris for a great victory, and thanksgivings were offered up at St. Paul's for the blessing upon her majesty's arms. Three thousand English and Dutch were killed and wounded, and the estimated loss of the French was four thousand—a terrible slaughter of brave men without any decisive results.

The capture of Gibraltar was considered a very serious blow by the court of Madrid, and before the autumn of 1704 was passed eight thousand men, under the Marquis of Villadaria, commenced a siege. The Earl of Galway, who in 1704 was appointed to the command of the troops in Portugal, sent four regiments to the aid of the garrison of Gibraltar, with supplies of ammunition and provisions.† The Prince of Darmstadt made a brave and judicious resistance. The Captain-General of Andalusia, whose energy had saved Cadiz in 1702, was unable to make any impression upon those who now held the rock with an adequate force. The English fleet constantly threw in fresh supplies to the besieged, which the French admiral, De Pontis, was powerless to prevent. The besiegers were ill supplied with necessaries. A French commander was sent to supersede Villadaria, but matters were not improved by the change. Sir John Leake, in March, attacked De Pontis, and swept away what remained of the French naval power. The siege was raised; and the Spaniards saw with dismay that a fortress which they had neglected properly to defend had been rendered impregnable. It was some time before the English government appreciated the true value of Gibraltar; but during the war of the succession it was always vigorously defended against many attempts to retake it, and in 1713 its possession was confirmed to England by the Peace of Utrecht.

In our brief relation of the great campaign of 1704 we have exhibited, however imperfectly, those wonderful qualities of Marlborough by which he appears, in all his movements, to have left nothing to accident. The most enduring patience; a temper never to be disturbed; a caution that allowed no surprise; a foresight that left no contingency unprovided for—these were qualities even more remarkable than his daring and courage when the hour arrived for their display. It has been said of Marlborough—by a writer who has succeeded in the very difficult task of presenting the broadest aspects of history with the clearness and precision that are rarely obtained without minute detail—"for the first time, in English history at least, a march was equivalent to a battle. A change of his camp, or even a temporary retreat, was as effectual as a victory; and it was seen by the clearer observers of his time, that a campaign was a game of skill, and not of the mere dash and intrepidity which appeal to the vulgar passions of our nature."‡ As if to exhibit, upon a different theatre of the same great warfare, the most remarkable contrast to the character and actions of Marlborough, Charles Mordaunt, Earl of Peterborough, took the command of an expedition to Spain. He has come upon the scene at times in various characters. He has accompanied William of Orange to England in 1689. He has lost his position as a statesman; has been sent to the Tower; has been deprived of his places and emoluments, in carrying on a system of intrigues in the proceedings against Fenwick in 1696. He attempted to save the life of the accused—endeavoring to implicate two of the leading

Whigs in the conspiracy, by inducements to Fenwick to accuse them; and then he turned round upon the unhappy man when the scheme broke down, and was strenuous for his attainder. Restless and changeable, vain and flighty, too adroit to be wise, all parties became afraid of him. But with all his eccentricities, his genius commands the admiration of the cleverest, and his profusion buys the flattery of the meanest. He adores the ladies with the homage of a knight-errant; and he rushes into war as if he were to be the first lance in a tournament. His craving for excitement kept him always in motion; and it was said that he had seen more kings and more postilions than any man in Europe. Pope declared of him, with sound judgment, "He has too much wit as well as courage to make a solid general." What he did in Spain is one of the marvels of history—a series of exploits beside which romance may "pale its uneffectual fire." When Peterborough sailed from Portsmouth, in June, 1705, having the command of five thousand men, and with general directions "to make a vigorous push in Spain," he had precisely that commission which suited his character. It was a service of hazard which was agreeable to his chivalric nature; for he scarcely did justice to his own courage when he said that it proceeded from his not knowing when he was in danger. He had very inadequate resources of men and money, and thus he had difficulties to overcome which pleasurably tasked all his mental energies. He was left unfettered by minute instructions, and had unlimited authority over the land forces and a divided command with Sir Cloudesley Shovel at sea—which circumstances gave him, as he imagined, free scope for the pursuit of his own road to fame, by the shortest and steepest path. Macaulay calls Peterborough "the most extraordinary character of that age, the King of Sweden himself not excepted. . . . a polite, learned, and amorous Charles the Twelfth."* Swift pointed to some such comparison in well-known lines on Peterborough:

> "Ne'er to be match'd in modern reading
> But by his namesake, Charles of Sweden."

The wit, the learning, the accomplished manners, the very faults of Peterborough made him a favorite with the most celebrated men of his time. "I love the hang-dog dearly," wrote Swift to Stella. Johnson, with the same feeling of respect for Peterborough's brilliant qualities, was curious in the later years of his life to learn more about him, saying, "He is a favorite of mine, and is not enough known."

It is remarkable that the most trustworthy as well as the most interesting account of Peterborough's actions in Spain was for some time thought to be a fictitious narrative. "The Military Memoirs of Captain George Carleton" have been unhesitatingly ascribed to Defoe—chiefly because "we are reminded of him by the plain matter-of-fact, and off-handed manner of telling a story"—and because the events, which are "matters of history, are related with all the minuteness and personality of an eye-witness, and an actor upon the spot."† The very existence of Captain George Carleton has been questioned. Lord Stanhope [Mahon] has settled this doubt;‡ and he believes, as Dr. Johnson believed, in the perfect authenticity of this, "the most valuable, perhaps, because the most undoubtedly faithful and impartial, of all our materials for this war."§ We may safely follow this guide, in tracing the actions of a man who, "by a course of conduct and fortune almost miraculous, had nearly put us into the possession of the kingdom of Spain; was left wholly unsupported; exposed to the envy of his rivals; disappointed by the caprices of a young inexperienced prince, under the guidance of a rapacious German ministry; and at last called home in discontent."‖

When Peterborough with his troops arrived at Lisbon he was reinforced by two regiments of dragoons—men without horses, which the earl, who never made difficulties, had to provide. He here took on board the Archduke Charles and a numerous suite. At Gibraltar he received two veteran battalions, in exchange for the same number of recruits which he had brought from England. The Prince of Darmstadt also here joined Peterborough. That prince had one dominant idea—a siege of Barcelona. Peterborough opposed the plan. The archduke upheld his countryman, in the scheme of attempting, with seven thousand men, the reduction of a place which was far better prepared for defence than when the expedition of the previous summer had resulted in a complete failure, and which required thirty thousand men for a regular siege. With the squadron under Sir Cloudesley Shovel, the fleet sailed from Gibraltar. Making Altea Bay, a landing was effected near Valencia; and here the people were found favorable to the cause of the Austrian prince, who was proclaimed, upon the surrender of the Castle of Denia, as Charles III., King of Spain and the Indies. Peterborough, encouraged by this reception, conceived an enterprise, "which would in all probability have brought that war to a much more speedy conclusion, and at the same time have obviated all those difficulties which were but too apparent in the siege of Barcelona."* King Philip was at Madrid with few troops. All the Spanish forces were on the frontiers of Portugal, or in Catalonia. It was only a march of fifty leagues from Valencia to Madrid, and the centre of Spain was undefended. Such an exploit had every chance of success, if Peterborough could have dashed upon the capital without being fettered by the hesitation of Charles or the preconceptions of Darmstadt. He was overruled. The Valencians were left to shout "Viva Carlos" in vain. The expedition went on, under the pressure of weak and timid, but truly rash counsels, to attack "one of the largest and most populous cities in all Spain, fortified by bastions, one side secured by the sea, and the other by a strong fortification called Montjouich."† A council of war had decided against Peterborough's plan of a march to Madrid; but when the expedition arrived before Barcelona, another council thought the undertaking of a siege too formidable. Charles, however, pressed the enterprise with a tenacity that could not be resisted, and to which Peterborough at length yielded. The troops were landed on the 27th of August.

In three weeks there was nothing but dissensions among the great men of this expedition. Peterborough had received new instructions from home to respect the opinions of the princes and of councils of war. They were all differing in opinion. The Prince of Darmstadt and the earl had come to an open rupture. The Dutch officers said their troops should not join in an enterprise so manifestly impossible of success for a small force. It was considered by them an act of madness to attack the town from the eastern plain where the troops were encamped—a position which involved the necessity of making regular approaches under the fire of heavy batteries. Peterborough conceived a plan of attack totally opposed to all the routine modes of warfare. The citadel of Montjouich, built on the summit of a ridge of hills skirting the sea, commanded the town. Peterborough went out secretly from the camp, viewed the ground, and determined upon attempting a surprise of a garrison that considered themselves safe in an impregnable place. He gave notice that he should raise the siege, sent his heavy artillery on board the ships, and made every preparation for embarking the troops. With twelve hundred foot soldiers and two hundred horse he marched out of the camp on the evening of the 13th of September, and, passing by the quarters of the Prince of Darmstadt, told him that if he chose to come with him he might see what troops could do that had been subjected to his reproaches. The prince took him at his word. They marched all night by the side of the mountains, and before daybreak were under the hill of Montjouich, and close to the outer works. Peterborough's officers thought that their general would make the attack in the dark. He showed them that when they were discovered at daylight the enemy would descend into the outer ditch to repel them, and that then was the time to receive their fire, leap in upon them, drive them into the outer works, and gain the fortress by following them close. The scheme succeeded, and the English were soon masters of the bastion. A similar attack on the opposite side of the fortress was also successful. But the governor of the fort, having obtained some reinforcements from Barcelona, the men were welcomed with shouts by their comrades, which the Prince of Darmstadt mistaking for a signal of surrender, he incautiously advanced, lost two hundred of his party as prisoners, and was himself killed at the moment when Peterborough came to his rescue. Intelligence then arrived that three thousand men were marching from Barcelona. Peterborough rode out to reconnoitre. As he returned he was told by Carleton that the men were flying out of their posts, in one general panic, with Lord Charlemont at their head. "Immediately upon this notice from me," says Carleton, "the earl galloped up the hill, and alighting when he came to Lord Charlemont, he took his half-pike out of his hand, and turning to the officers and soldiers, told them, if they would not face about and follow him they should have the scandal and eternal infamy upon them of having deserted their posts and abandoned their general." All the posts were regained; and the three thousand Spaniards returned alarmed to Barcelona. The citadel held out for several days, but was finally reduced by a bombardment from the hills, the cannon having been relanded from the ships. The reduction of Montjouich by this extraordinary act of daring was very soon followed by the surrender of Barcelona. Success gave spirit to those who had before been hopeless. The sailors dragged heavy guns up the hills, and joined the land-troops in forming intrenchments. The town was so fiercely bombarded that a breach was soon effected; and the besiegers were preparing to storm, when the governor beat a parley, and agreed to surrender with all honors of war. His soldiers had mutinied; the people of the city were in a state of riot; and the governor, who was unpopular, was in danger of his life. Peterborough, with the same indomitable courage that he had shown in the assault of Montjouich, being apprised of the tumult, demanded admittance at one of the gates. Carleton, who accompanied him, describes a scene very characteristic of this modern Amadis. He met a lady of extraordinary beauty flying from the fury of the Miquelets—the armed peasants of the province—who implored his protection. Peterborough took the lady by the hand—she proved to be the Duchess of Popoli—and conveyed her through the wicket by which he entered, to a place of safety without the town. "I believe it was much the longest part of an hour," says Carleton, "before he returned." When he did return he saved the governor, got him on board one of the ships, and by that extraordinary ascendency which a determined will and the total absence of fear have over the passions of a multitude, "wherever he appeared the popular fury was in a moment allayed."

The possession of Barcelona, in which King Charles III. was proclaimed with great solemnity, was followed by the adhesion to his cause of the chief towns of Catalonia. Peterborough was for following up his wonderful success by other daring operations. The German ministers and the Dutch officers opposed all his projects. At length a pressing request came to Charles to send assistance to San Mateo, which was besieged by the Count of Las Torres. There were twelve hundred troops at Tortosa, to which Peterborough sent orders to cross the Ebro. He was with them as soon as his messenger, expecting to find a large army of peasantry ready to join him, as he had been informed. The army was a mere illusion. But there was a small force only, he was told, before San Mateo. He found seven thousand; and yet, by a series of daring efforts, he raised the siege and entered the town in triumph. But for him there was no repose. He determined to follow Las Torres. "His foot were marching on the stony mountains, and in a winter season, without clothes or shoes, and his few dragoons were upon horses that could hardly go on." * He received an express, commanding him to send his troops back to Barcelona, for the safety of the king's person. He sent back his infantry, and followed the retreating army of Las Torres with only two hundred cavalry. What would have been mere desperation in another man, was, in his conduct of such a warfare, the most perfect strategy. By his rapid marches, his confident tone, his disguise of his real strength, he kept up the terror of the thousands who were flying before his two hundred, and towns opened their gates to him without a blow. But a more important service awaited Peterborough. The magistrates of Valencia, which city had thrown off its allegiance to King Philip, sent messengers to implore the aid of Peterborough; for a body of ten thousand men was approaching to invest their city. He managed to recall the infantry which he had sent back to Barcelona, and obtained some other reinforcements. On the 1st of February, 1706, Peterborough had about three thousand men under his command. The Duke of Arcos, the Spanish general, was encamped upon a wide plain, over which Peterborough must pass on his way to Valencia. Between him and the plain was a formidable pass under the walls of Murviedro, built under the hill upon which Carleton saw "the ruins of the once famous Saguntum; famous sure to eternity, if letters shall last so long, for an invincible fidelity to a negligent confederate against an implacable enemy." The classic mind of Peterborough might have thought of Hannibal's eight months' siege of Saguntum; but he was not to be stopped by any such tedious process. The commander at Murviedro, Mahoni, was of Irish extraction, and was not unknown to Peterborough, having been related to his first wife. By a stratagem of no very worthy character—more resembling some of his old political manœuvres than the frank honesty of a soldier—he succeeded in throwing Mahoni off his guard, and then in inspiring the Duke of Arcos with suspicion of his faithful officer at Murviedro. Peterborough requested a conference with Mahoni; endeavored in vain to induce him to join the cause of King Charles; drew from him an admission of the advice which he meant to give to Arcos, which was to remain in the plain; and then contrived to send the duke an intimation, through two of his men, who pretended to be deserters, that Mahoni had undertaken to betray his post, and to advise the duke to remain in his position, that he might there be sacrificed. When the frank Irishman's letter of advice was delivered to Arcos, he determined to move precisely in an opposite direction to that which was advised. He thus left the way open to Peterborough to march to Valencia; for Mahoni was arrested, and as Arcos was gone, the pass of Murviedro was undefended.* Peterborough had not long rested in this pleasant city when he sallied forth to attack a body of four thousand horse; came upon their encampment with a force not a third of their number, and returned to Valencia with six hundred prisoners, having utterly routed the troops of King Philip. "Here," says Carleton, "the Earl of Peterborough made his residence for some time. He was extremely well beloved; his affable behavior exacted as much from all; and he preserved such a good correspondence with the priests and the ladies that he never failed of the most early and best intelligence."

While Peterborough was carrying on this astonishing warfare in Valencia, the news of the fall of Barcelona had reached England, and the queen had gone to parliament in great exultation, to recommend the Commons especially "to improve the opportunity which God Almighty is pleased to afford us, of putting a prosperous end to the present war." † Such was the estimation in which the deeds of Peterborough were then regarded. A sum of two hundred and fifty thousand pounds was voted, "for her majesty's proportion of the charge of prosecuting the successes already gained by King Charles III., for the recovery of the monarchy of Spain to the house of Austria." It was soon found that King Charles was incompetent to follow up the successes which Peterborough had accomplished for him. The young Bourbon king, Philip V., took a vigorous resolution. He marched from Madrid with a force which, being joined by that of Marshal Tessé, enabled him to enter Catalonia with twenty thousand men. Charles in April was shut up in Barcelona, while a large army was investing the city by land, and it was blockaded by a French fleet. The officers of Charles exhorted him to fly. Though he wanted energy he had passive courage; and he remained in the beleaguered city, animating the population with appeals to their superstitious feelings, for he declared that the Holy Virgin had manifested herself to him, and told him that the Catalans would never forsake him. Nevertheless Montjouich fell, after being bombarded for twenty-three days. Peterborough, meanwhile, had rapidly marched from Valencia, with two thousand foot and six hundred horse, and from the mountains above Barcelona he kept the besieging forces in perpetual alarm. But he had a project of more importance than this partisan warfare, however suited to his genius. A fleet was coming from England under Admiral Leake, on board of which was General Stanhope with reinforcements. Leake, whose caution was in signal contrast to Peterborough's daring, would not risk an encounter with the French squadron before Barcelona until he was joined off the Spanish coast by another fleet, under Admiral Byng. Stanhope, by an ingenious device agreed upon with Peterborough—that of transmitting a blank sheet of paper cut in a particular form—apprised him of the junction which had been so long delayed. Peterborough had a commission to command at sea. He immediately marched to a small seaport, Stiges; made every preparation for his troops to embark; and for two nights, to the amazement of his officers and men, went out to sea in an open boat. He at last discerned the fleet; leaped on board one of the ships, and hoisted his flag; sent orders to Leake and Stanhope; had his men soon on board; hoped to reach Barcelona in time to fight the Count de Toulouse. But the Frenchmen had sheered off. The English troops were, however, thrown into Barcelona, and the French general Tessé, filled with apprehensions of defeat if he should attempt to storm the city, raised the siege, and the great army moved off, leaving their heavy cannon behind. King Philip retired to Madrid. But he had little time for resting there. The allies from the Portuguese frontier were marching upon the capital, and the court having fled, they entered Madrid on the 25th of June. Here they wasted their time, instead of marching after the Duke of Berwick, who had been joined by Philip. In the same way Charles lingered at Barcelona when it was no longer in danger. But success still followed the house of Austria. Arragon had imitated Catalonia and Valencia in acknowledging King Charles. It seemed as if the dominion of Spain was melting away from the house of Bourbon.

At this crisis, if one tenth of the energy of Peterborough, and even a smaller portion of the common-sense of Stanhope, could have been infused into the slow and formal Austrian prince, the contest might have been decided. Charles was urged by them to take the road to Madrid through Valencia, whither Peterborough had gone by sea with his men. Charles lingered at first, without showing any inclination to move at all. His equipage was not ready, he said, to enable him to enter the capital with proper state. "Sir," said Stanhope, "our William III. entered London in a hackney, with a cloak-bag behind it, and was made king not many weeks after." * When Charles did move, he went into Arragon and loitered at Saragossa. Peterborough was disgusted that his advice was not followed, and he gave himself up to the same inaction, which appeared a fatality in this summer. When he was sailing to Valencia he wrote a letter to Halifax, "aboard the Somerset," which sufficiently shows his gay temper under the most serious responsibilities: "There cannot be worse company than a beggarly German and a proud Spaniard, particularly to my humor; and were it not for the revenge we seek in the disagreeable men with the agreeable ladies, our condition were intolerable, black eyes and wit in the wives being what alone can make us endure the husbands." † But a cloud was to come over even Peterborough's gayety. All that he had accomplished was to be thrown away.

Whether any energy on the part of Peterborough could have made effectual resistance against the spirit which was rising up in Spain may be doubted. Charles had done nothing to identify himself with the nation. The majority of the nation felt that foreign invaders had come against them. The Castilians took up the cause of Philip as if it were a national cause. The western provinces were imbued with the same spirit. Charles advanced toward Madrid. Peterborough was ordered to join him. But Berwick, knowing the full value of the enthusiasm which had gone so thoroughly in favor of Philip, compelled the allies to evacuate the capital. Peterborough saw that the game was up; and declared "that all the force of Europe would not be sufficient to subdue Castile." ‡ Charles and he met as the one was leading his forces from Saragossa and the other from Valencia. They were unsuited to act in unison. The impetuosity of the one and the frigid obstinacy of the other made them natural antagonists. Peterborough resolving, or affecting to resolve, upon transferring his services to another field, proposed that he should go to the relief of Turin. He was taken at his word. Charles and his advisers were left to their own ruinous course. What Peterborough's feelings were at this juncture may be collected from a letter of singular interest, addressed by him on the 25th of August to Admiral Wassenaer: "Our circumstances, in a few words, are brought to this: from being sure of the monarchy of Spain without a blow, without further expense or hazard, it is now not only a doubtful case, but I fear worse. Our army in the midst of an enemy's country (as it has been managed) without magazines, without any place of strength, without bread, or a farthing of money, the communication being cut off with Portugal, the enemy stronger in horse, and almost equal in foot: we lost Madrid like fools, with our army superior in number, without a blow, and such confusion and want of discipline was never known, the troops subsisting upon nothing but rapine. These are the effects of a young prince's giving ear to such wretched creatures who, contrary to such solemn councils of war, and measures so unanimously agreed to, contrary to the protestations of ambassadors and ministers, the repeated instances of generals and all mankind, have lost, perhaps, such an empire to their prince, by carrying him up and down, selling offices, and picking up little sums of money in exchange for Peru and Mexico." * From this time we do not find Peterborough in any of the more important transactions of the war. He returned early in 1707 to Spain as a volunteer; and he offered judicious advice which was rejected. He then received his formal recall to England; rushed about Europe, sometimes on public business and oftener for his private pleasures; seems to have looked with something like contempt upon his military vocation, when he said, "A general is only a hangman in chief;" † and exhibited the versatility of his talents in dictating to nine amanuenses at once, and in superintending Pope's horticulture at Twickenham.

> "He whose lightning pierced the Iberian lines, > Now forms my quincunx, and now ranks my vines."

Peterborough, we have seen, had proposed to go to the relief of Turin. The Duke of Savoy, having been enabled through the subsidies of England and Holland to expend large sums in preparations for the defence of his capital, treated with contempt the summons to surrender of La Feuillade, the French general, who invested the city with an immense army. The successes of the French in the early part of the campaign had been very great; and though Victor Amadeus lost not heart, even when he left Turin with a part of his forces, while the siege was carried on for three months with a fearful loss of life, it appeared very doubtful whether Savoy could be saved. Prince Eugene was beyond the Adige with an army of Imperialists. By a series of movements, in which he displayed that skill and energy which fitted him to be the colleague of Marlborough, he united his forces with the cavalry of the Duke of Savoy in September; attacked the French in their intrenchments, obtained a complete victory, and finally drove them out of Italy.

The great campaign of Marlborough in 1706, which we shall have to relate in the next chapter, completed a series of triumphs for the allies, which made this year one of the most memorable of the great War of the Succession.

"I NEVER knew the Duke of Marlborough go out so full of hopes as in the beginning of this campaign," says Burnet. ‡ He embarked at Harwich on the 31st of March. His ardent expectations were soon cooled by the opposition which the Dutch made to his plans. It was a month before he could get the States to agree to his design of leading the English and Dutch troops to the Moselle, there to co-operate with the forces under Prince Louis of Baden, and, marching from Treves between the Moselle and the Saar, to penetrate into Lorraine and thus carry the war into the French territory. Without waiting for the force of Baden, Marlborough crossed the Moselle and the Saar on the 3d of June. The French armies under Villars and Marsin had united. Marlborough was anxious to give them battle; but they retreated, and he followed, though ill-provided with artillery. He encamped at Elft, and there waited for reinforcements. On the 9th he wrote to Harley that he had not one man with him but those in the English and Dutch pay. He was desirous to begin the siege of Saar-Louis; yet for want of the troops under the Prince of Baden and the Prussians, "we are obliged to be idle a good part of the campaign, while the enemy are pursuing their designs without any manner of interruption."* Such was the essential disadvantage of an army composed of the various contingents of allied powers, compared with an army of one great military state. In the campaign of the Danube the English commander, by wonderful exertions, contrived to make a compact body out of many heterogeneous parts. In the campaign of 1705 he had to prove the full difficulty of divided counsels and petty jealousies. While in camp at Elft the weather was bitterly cold; and to this circumstance he attributes in some measure the desertions which weakened his army. On the 15th of June he writes to the States-General that the season is so inclement that there is nothing on the earth—that all the grass and oats have been destroyed by the cold—that he has no horses or carriages for the conveyance of heavy artillery, the German princes having utterly failed in their engagements.† Villeroy and the Elector of Bavaria were rapidly advancing so as to threaten Holland; and the States, in great alarm, sent express upon express to Marlborough to march with all haste to their succor. Villeroy had taken Huy, and was investing Liège. Marlborough apprehended that the Dutch would be frightened into a negotiation for peace. The imperturbable general is very nearly broken down with anxiety. He writes to Godolphin on the 16th, "I have for these last ten days been so troubled by the many disappointments I have had, that I think if it were possible to vex me so for a fortnight longer, it would make an end of me. In short, I am weary of my life."‡ A vigorous resolution roused Marlborough out of this despondency. On the 17th of June, at midnight, he broke up the camp at Elft, and marched back to the position which he had occupied a fortnight before. By a series of rapid movements he united his army with that of the Dutch general, D'Auverquerque, and Villeroy retreated within the formidable lines which the French had constructed, extending from the Meuse, near Namur, to the Scheldt at Antwerp. Marlborough's first object was to regain possession of Huy, in which he succeeded by the capitulation of the garrison on the 11th of July. But this success was accompanied by a bitter mortification. Upon the approach of a French detachment, the Palatine general, D'Aubach, abandoned Treves and Saarbruch, and burned the magazines which contained stores that were essential to the further prosecution of the operations on the Moselle. Marlborough's disappointments in the campaign were matters of rejoicing to the High Tories in England, who were now distinguished as "the tackers." The great general took this so to heart that he writes to Godolphin, "This vile enormous faction of theirs vexes me so much that I hope the queen will after this campaign give me leave to retire."§ In answer to a consolatory letter from the queen, he writes to her majesty that he has received a list of the new parliament, by which he sees that there are enough tackers returned to stir everything that may be uneasy to the government; "to prevent which, I think your majesty should advise with lord treasurer [Godolphin], what encouragement may be proper to give the Whigs." But Marlborough does not want the Whigs to be in power. The lord treasurer, he writes, "is the only man in England capable of giving such advice as may keep you out of the hands of both parties, which may at last make you happy, if quietness can be had in a country where there is so much faction."‖

The great operation of this campaign was the forcing of the French lines on the 17th of July. This formidable barrier between Dutch Brabant and the Austrian Netherlands had been three years in construction. In part of their extent the lines followed the course of the river Gheet, and the river Demer; and, at various intervals, were fortified posts of considerable strength. Distributed along convenient parts of the lines was the French army of seventy thousand men. Marlborough maintained his usual secrecy, confiding his plans to no one but Auverquerque. He had determined to attack the lines by passing the Gheet near Leuwe—a part where the greatest difficulties appeared to present themselves. The weaker part of the lines was to the south of the Mehaigne; and thither D'Auverquerque was directed to march, "to give the enemy a jealousy that they were to be attacked on that side, and so oblige them to draw their greatest strength that way."* The feint had its effect. Villeroy collected his main strength on that weak part where D'Auverquerque had crossed the Mehaigne. "But the bridges prepared over the Mehaigne served equally to bring back Auverquerque's troops to the left of that river, and to unite them to the army of Marlborough; and the movements being all made under cover of night, the object aimed at was attained before the enemy could discover which was the real point of attack. The lines were, however, of the most formidable description: for, besides the height of the ramparts and the largeness of the ditch, they were further defended by the difficulties of the ground over which they were to be approached; and by the River Gheet, which could not be crossed without laying bridges over it, and which was near enough to the lines to be defended by the fire from the parapet. All these obstacles would have been sufficient to have rendered the lines unassailable, though defended by a very inferior body against a whole army, but for the ability with which the attention and the main force of the enemy was diverted from the real point of attack, and the energy with which that attack was conducted."†

During the day of the 17th Villeroy was employed in watching the movements of Auverquerque. At eight o'clock at night a detachment of Marlborough's army began its march toward the Little Gheet River; and at the same time Auverquerque recrossed the Mehaigne, and connected his vanguard with the rear of Marlborough. When the morning dawned, the English and Dutch were approaching the French works, concealed by a thick fog. They carried the Castle of Wange, and without waiting for the construction of bridges, the troops scrambled through the marshy ground, crossed the Gheet, mounted its slippery banks, rushed into the trench, and were within the enemy's lines. They were encountered by the Marquis d'Allegre with twenty battalions of infantry and fifty squadrons of horse. Marlborough himself headed a charge of cavalry, and for a short time, having only a trumpeter and a servant with him, was surrounded as the French repulsed his charge. But the English troops rallied to his rescue, and a second charge left them masters of the lines. Villeroy came up too late, and had no resource but a retreat. Marlborough was anxious to pursue, but the Dutch thought a pursuit hazardous, and he encamped near Tirlemont. L'Allegre was taken prisoner, with four other general officers and a thousand men. Harley wrote to Marlborough, after the news of his success, "Your friends and servants here cannot be without concern upon your grace's account, when we hear how much you expose that precious life of yours upon all occasions, and that you are not contented to do the part of a great general, but you condescend to take your share as a common soldier."‡ Harley's friend, Swift, ventured to insinuate, after a few years, that Marlborough wanted courage.

Villeroy retreated beyond the Dyle, and there established a strong position near Louvain. Marlborough was prevented taking any immediate offensive measures through the constant interference of the deputies of the States. The English general was indignant, and sent an officer to the Hague, to represent "that unless the command be more absolute in one person, we shall hardly be able to do anything." Councils of war, he said, were called on every occasion, "which entirely destroys the secrecy and dispatch upon which all great undertakings depend."§ He wanted to force the passage of the Dyle; and he traversed ground which, somewhat more than a century after, became familiar to every Englishman. On the 27th of August he writes to the Duke of Shrewsbury, "I had at the camp at Meldert with great difficulty brought together a provision of about ten days' bread; and having marched four days together through several defiles, and part of the Bois des Soignies, the army came the 18th instant into a spacious plain, with only the Yssche between us and the enemy. About noon we were formed in order of battle, and having visited the posts with M. D'Auverquerque, we had resolved upon making the attack, thinking there was no more to do but to order the troops to advance, when the deputies of the States, having consulted their other generals, would not give their consent, so that I was with great regret obliged to quit the enterprise, which promised all imaginable success." * There was a skirmish on the plain of Waterloo. But for the interference of the Dutch deputies there might have been a decisive battle on that ground, of which Byron wrote, after the eventful day of the 18th of June, 1815, "Waterloo seems marked out for the scene of some great action, though this may be mere imagination." The opportunity was lost of anticipating the later glories of that plain. Marlborough wrote to Harley on the 2d of September, entreating that the government should not take any formal notice at the Hague of his "late disappointment," for "I am persuaded if an opportunity should now offer before our leaving the field, the greatest part of the generals who were against engaging the enemy are so sensible of their error that they would not obstruct anything that might be proposed for our advantage." He was looking forward to a new pleasure when he returned home. Mr. Vanbrugh had informed him that "the first stone at Woodstock" had been laid, and he compliments the architect upon his plans, saying, "The greatest satisfaction I enjoy on this side is from the hopes I have of finding the house in good forwardness at my return in the winter." †

The elections of 1705 roused up a bitterness of party feeling that had rarely been equalled in England. It is difficult to look back upon these times and not to be moved to pity, if not to despise, the people that could be stirred into the most violent wrath against each other by the cry that was raised from the Land's End to Berwick. That cry was, "The Church in danger." The queen had manifested less disinclination to transfer a portion of her favor to the Whigs. The high-churchmen gave out the rallying-cry from their pulpits. The Jacobite and Tory pamphleteers told the nation "that the Church was to be given up; that the bishops were betraying it; that the court would sell it to the dissenters." ‡ The elections seemed to have been managed in a most extraordinary way, if we may judge from Defoe's description of the election which he saw at Coventry. Mobs, drawn up in battle array, were fighting in the streets; while freemen, or pretended freemen, went up to vote, without any examination of their qualifications—no list of voters—no oath tendered—no books kept. "The dissenters," says Burnet, "who had been formerly much divided, were now united entirely in the interests of the government, and joined with the Whigs everywhere." It was seen that the Whigs would have a parliamentary majority; so Godolphin declared in their favor "more openly than he had done formerly." The Duke of Newcastle was made lord privy seal in the place of the Duke of Buckingham. The incapable and violent Sir Nathan Wright was removed from the office of lord keeper, and Mr. William Cowper was appointed to that high place.

When the parliament met at the end of October, the contest of the Commons began with the election of speaker. The Whig candidate, Mr. John Smith, had a majority. The queen's speech complained of the malicious insinuations that the Church was in danger. "I will always affectionately support and countenance the Church of England as by law established. I will invariably maintain the Toleration. I will do all I can to persuade my subjects to lay aside their divisions, and will study to make them all safe and easy." This was plainer language than had been spoken since the time when William uttered what he thought from that throne. The Tories were angry with the queen, and they took a course which they judged would annoy her. Anne looked with little real complacency upon the Act of Settlement. Lord Haversham, one of the Tory leaders, moved in the Lords that the Princess Sophia of Hanover should be invited to reside in England, as presumptive heir of the crown. The motion was negatived, although very strongly supported by Buckingham, Rochester, and other Tory peers. The queen was indignant, for "these very persons, having now lost that interest in her and their posts, were driving on that very motion which they had made her apprehend was the most fatal thing that could befall." § So Queen Anne writes to the Duchess of Marlborough, "I believe dear Mrs. Freeman and I shall not disagree as we have formerly done; for I am sensible of the services that those people have done me that you have a good opinion of, and will countenance them; and am thoroughly convinced of the malice and insolence of them that you have always been speaking against."

The question of the succession being thus stirred again by the Tories, the Whigs proposed a measure which had some practical utility. They brought forward a bill for appointing a regency, which should carry on the government, in the case of the demise of the queen, until the arrival of her successor. The regents were to consist of the Archbishop of Canterbury, the lord keeper, the lord chief justice, and four great officers of state. The bill was carried. Halifax moved in the Lords that an inquiry should be made into the alleged danger of the Church. After a long debate it was voted by a majority of 61 peers against 30, that the Church was not in danger. The Lords and Commons then subsequently agreed in the following resolution: "Resolved by the Lords spiritual and temporal, and Commons in parliament assembled, that the Church of England, as by law established, which was rescued from the extremest danger by King William III., of glorious memory, is now, by God's blessing, under the happy reign of her majesty, in a most safe and flourishing condition, and whosoever goes about to suggest and insinuate, that the Church is in danger under her majesty's administration, is an enemy to the queen, the Church, and the kingdom." The queen then issued a proclamation, at the instance of parliament, declaring that "we will proceed with the utmost severity the law should allow of, against the authors or spreaders of the said seditious and scandalous reports"—namely, that the Church is in danger. To us at the distance of a century and a half, the whole affair seems ludicrous and beneath the gravity of parliamentary proceedings. In three years more we shall see the nation stirred to a temporary frenzy by the same spirit of ecclesiastical controversy, displaying itself in absurdity still more outrageous, as it now must appear. But, after all, we cannot regard these things with the eyes of our forefathers, and must judge the actors in them with that charity in which they appear to have been themselves deficient.

Godolphin and Marlborough are dining in perfect cordiality with Halifax, Cowper, and Sunderland, at Harley's house; and Harley drinks "to love and friendship and everlasting union, and wishes he had more Tokay to drink it in." * Marlborough is setting his face against jobbery with exemplary fortitude. Lord Albemarle wants a commission for some lower-school boy of Eton or Westminster. The queen, replies Marlborough, "has lately shown so much aversion to anything of that kind, upon notice taken in parliament, of children's being commissioned in the troops, that she has given me repeated orders to the contrary." † Disinterested is he also in the management of one of the corruptions of that day, which still flourishes in its original luxuriance—the sale of commissions. Mrs. Selwin is unreasonable enough to be "dissatisfied with the offer I have made Mr. Selwin of a company in the guards, upon his laying down eight hundred pounds. . . . I could wish Mr. Selwin might have it for nothing, but there is a necessity of applying this sum at least in charity to the widows, and to satisfy other pretensions." ‡ Such are the occupations of the great captain, before he gets out of England to his accustomed battle-ground. He goes at last, and is at the Hague on the 27th of April. His notion of a campaign in 1706 was to shift his ground; to go to the relief of the Duke of Savoy, who was expecting to be besieged, and to co-operate with Prince Eugene in freeing Italy from the French armies. This plan had the countenance of the English ministry. But the Elector of Hanover would not consent that his troops should assist in Marlborough's project; and the Danes and Hessians also refused their co-operation. Meanwhile the French on the Upper Rhine had obtained some successes; and thus the Dutch again became alarmed for their own safety. Marlborough consented to remain in the command of the English and Dutch armies, provided that his power was unfettered. To this the States consented; and the troops began to march from the Hague on the 7th of May. They were to be joined by various garrisons, and to encamp near Maestricht. On the 15th Marlborough wrote to the duchess to inform her that, in all likelihood, he should make the whole campaign in the Netherlands—not such a campaign as would please him. "Let me say for myself that there is more credit in doing what is good for the public than in preferring our private satisfaction and interest; for my being here in a condition of doing nothing that shall make a noise has made me able to send ten thousand men to Italy, and to leave nineteen thousand more on the Rhine."* The great general scarcely saw the opportunity of "making a noise," that he would be able to insure in little more than a week after he had reluctantly turned away from the plan that would best promote his "private satisfaction and interest." On the 20th of May he wrote to Harley to express his hope that he might bring the enemy to a battle, for the French had drawn all their garrisons together, had passed the Dyle, and were posted at Tirlemont. In a letter of the next day to M. Hop, at the Hague, he says that this movement of the enemy "has quite broken the measures we were projecting at Maestricht. . . . We design to advance to gain the head of the Gheet, to come to the enemy if they keep their ground. For my part, I think nothing could be more happy for the allies than a battle; since, I have good reason to hope, with the blessing of God we may have a complete victory."† There is nothing more remarkable than the unswerving confidence of Marlborough in his own happy fortune. Here were no particular circumstances to inspire him with this confidence. He had no superiority of numbers; for his English, Dutch, and Danes amounted to sixty thousand men, while Villeroy's army of French and Bavarians amounted to sixty-two thousand. He had no superiority in the distribution of his forces in his advance to battle; and in the same way as at Blenheim, he found the enemy in possession of the ground which he had hoped to take up. The famous novelist, who has described the men and manners of these times with a rare fidelity, has truly said, "The great duke always spoke of his victories with an extraordinary modesty, and as if it was not so much his own admirable genius and courage which achieved these amazing successes, but as it he was a special and fatal instrument in the hands of Providence, that willed irresistibly the enemy's overthrow. . . . And our army got to believe so, and the enemy learned to think so too."‡

It was Whitsunday, the 23d of May, when Marlborough began his march, at three o'clock in the morning, to gain the open space between the Mehaigne and the Great Gheet.§ That position was found to be occupied by the enemy. The allies, in eight columns, passed the once formidable lines which had been demolished in the preceding year; and having cleared the village of Mierdorp, formed in order of battle in the plain of Jandrinœuil. The enemy was posted in two lines on eminences above the marshes, stretching from the Little Gheet to the Mehaigne, having the village of Ramilies in the centre. It was a formidable position. From Mierdorp, near which the allies crossed the lines, to Ramilies, was a distance of nearly three miles. The whole plain, about three miles in breadth, is bounded on the north by the Little Gheet, on the south by the Mehaigne. The plain narrows toward the west, being bounded by the rising ground through which the Little Gheet flows from its sources near Ramilies.‖ Villeroy waited for the attack in his camp, on the rising ground of Mont St. André, a plain with gentle undulations and interspersed with coppices. Behind this rising ground is the Great Gheet. The allies formed their order of battle in the plain, between the village of Boniffe, on the Mehaigne, and the village of Foulaz, on the Little Gheet—having two lines, the infantry in the centre, the cavalry on the wings, with twenty squadrons of Danes to support the left of the infantry. In this order Marlborough advanced to the western extremity of the plain. Ramilies, an inclosed village, was defended by twenty battalions of French. Between Ramilies and the marshes of the Mehaigne were posted nearly the whole of the French cavalry. Their centre and left, composed of infantry, extended from the village of Autre-église to the village of Offuy, and thence behind Ramilies. Marlborough determined to make a demonstration of attack upon the left of the French, at Autre-église and Offuy. Villeroy immediately drew his troops from the centre to support his left. Marlborough had the advantage of moving in a smaller space than the enemy, whose position formed an arc on the hills, while the allies could traverse the chord of the plain. Directly Villeroy had weakened his centre, Marlborough ordered the second line of the troops that were advancing to Autre-église to defile to the left, by a hollow way that concealed them. The first line of his right wing ascended the rising ground at Autre-église and opened their fire. But the main brunt of the battle was on his left, where the French were attacked at Ramilies and at Tavieres, a village on the Mehaigne. The assault on Tavieres by the Dutch infantry was successful. But the French cavalry then came into conflict with the Dutch cavalry under Auverquerque, and repelled them in great disorder. This was the crisis of the battle. The vast body of French and Bavarian horse had every chance of taking in the rear the allied infantry who were attacking Ramilies. Marlborough saw the danger. He put himself at the head of seventeen squadrons, and charged the French cavalry. This was indeed a fight of horse to horse, to be decided by main strength more than strategy. Marlborough, who was recognized, was surrounded and nearly made prisoner. He cut his way through; his charger fell; his equerry had his head shot off by a cannon-ball as he held the stirrup for his general to mount another horse. But now a reserve of cavalry that Marlborough had sent for came up; and an irresistible charge determined the battle on the left. The allies mounted the heights above Ramilies, and the shout of victory announced that the position had been gained which insured an ultimate success. The conflict was not over in and around the village of Ramilies. The fight among the cottages was long and doubtful. But the ever-watchful general ordered up a reserve of infantry, and the allied horse descending from the heights, their united force completed the triumph of the left and centre. Three hours had been occupied in these terrible encounters. But the changes of fortune had been so various—the confusion of onset and retreat so great—the disorder attendant upon troops of all arms being mixed in one common effort so extreme, that Marlborough was compelled to form his forces again upon the ground they had won. Villeroy now endeavored to take up a new line, but was impeded by his own baggage. Before he could get his battalions formed, Marlborough ordered a general advance to the sources of the Little Gheet; but before the morasses were crossed the French began to fly, and one headlong panic and slaughter closed that fearful evening. Onward went the pursued and the pursuers toward Louvain. Marlborough did not halt till the had reached Mildert, thirteen miles from the battle-field. The Elector of Bavaria and Villeroy reached Louvain at two o'clock on the morning of the 24th; held a council in the market-place by torch-light; and determined to abandon their fortified towns, and save the remnant of their force by a hurried retreat. The French and Bavarians lost seven thousand men, killed and wounded, and six thousand prisoners. The allies lost nearly four thousand men. The artillery, baggage, and eighty standards, were the spoil of the victors.

On the 3d of June Marlborough wrote to St. John, "It is very astonishing that the enemy should give up a whole country, with so many strong places, without the least resistance." He had entered Louvain without meeting any obstacle. Malines, Alost, and other places had submitted. The estates of Brabant assembled at Brussels had acknowledged the authority of King Charles III., and they sent out their commands to other fortified towns to make a like submission. Antwerp, Ghent, Bruges, and Oudenarde were surrendered without a shot being fired. In his exultation Marlborough exclaimed in his letters home, "Now is the time, certainly, to reduce France to reason." St. Simon says, "with the exception of Namur, Mons, and a very few other places, all the Spanish Low Countries were lost." The king, he tells us, felt this misfortune to the quick, however tranquilly he appeared to sustain it. But there was work still to do, before that campaign was ended. Ostend was besieged by a powerful land force and by nine ships of the line. The garrison of five thousand men capitulated on the 7th of July. Menin, one of the greatest fortresses of Vauban, was carried by assault, with immense loss, on the 22d of August. Dendermonde surrendered on the 5th of September. It might long have held out, had there not been seven weeks of excessive drought, which enabled the besiegers to approach, without being held back by the inundation which the besieged could command in ordinary seasons. Ath was the last fortress to fall on the 4th of October.

Marlborough returned home to receive the thanks of parliament, and to take part in the great event of the session of 1706–7—the union of England and Scotland into one kingdom. But the victor at Ramilies had already done far more for this object than anything he could do by his political influence. "If it were to be asked what one man did most for the accomplishment of the union, it would not be unreasonable to say it was the Duke of Marlborough." * At the precise juncture when the campaign of 1706 had inflicted a blow upon France that left her in dread of her own dismemberment, instead of holding the fate of Europe in her hands, the Jacobites of both kingdoms, and some not so honest as the Jacobites, were looking to the aid of the great Louis to prevent the ruin of Scotland, by preventing her entering upon an equal partnership in the liberties, the power, and the glory of England. The King of France was invited to invade Scotland. The invitation was not responded to, for the very obvious reason that the policy of William III. and the victories of the Duke of Marlborough had saved England from being a tributary of France, and now stood between Scotland and the real degradation which some of her children would have regarded as independence.

CHAPTER CXXXVIII.

Scotland—New parliament assembled in 1703—Irritation against England—Proposal for a treaty of union—Meeting of commissioners of each nation—Articles agreed upon by the commissioners—Charges of corruption—Demonstrations against the union—Debates in the Scottish parliament—Lord Belhaven's oration—Material interests of Scotland—Views of the union by Seton of Pitmedden—Provision for the Church of Scotland—Riots—Demonstration of the Cameronians—The Act of Union passed in Scotland—The act passed in England.

"It may be done, but not yet," said King William to Defoe, speaking of that union which he so fervently desired.† When commissioners were appointed in 1702 by an act of the English parliament, and the Scottish parliament responded by also appointing commissioners, each body being empowered to negotiate for a union, the difficulties of accomplishing this great measure were, probably, not correctly estimated. The "not yet" was not sufficiently manifest. These commissioners debated for six months without any result. The demands of the Scotch for a participation in the colonial trade were treated with indifference, as well as the demand for other commercial privileges that were to rest upon a perfect equality.

The Scottish parliament, or convention of estates, had sat from the time of the revolution. A new parliament was assembled in May, 1703. All the old feudal usages were strictly observed in the procession on this occasion called a "Riding." Every member was on horseback—the Commons in dark mantles, the nobles in splendid robes. Lackeys walked by the side of every horse, numerous in proportion to the rank of the rider. The regalia of Scotland were borne in solemn state, amid a cluster of heralds, and pursuivants, and trumpeters, guarding the crown, the sceptre, and the sword.‡ This wondrous pageantry was not without its significance at this period.

This parliament of 1703 was not in a temper of conciliation toward England. Glencoe and Darien were still watchwords of strife. The failure of the negotiations for union necessarily produced exasperation. While Marlborough was fighting the battles of the allies, the Scottish parliament manifested a decided inclination to the interests of France, by removing restrictions on the importation of French wines. The "Act for the Security of the Kingdom" was a more open declaration not only of the independence of Scotland, but of her disposition to separate wholly from England—to abrogate, on the first opportunity, that union of the crowns which had endured for a century. The Act of Settlement, by which the crown of England was to pass in the Protestant line to the Electress Sophia and her descendants, was not to be accepted; but on the demise of Queen Anne without issue, the estates of Scotland were to name a successor from the Protestant descendants of the Stuart line, and that successor was to be under conditions to secure "the religious freedom and trade of the nation from English or any foreign influence." For four months this matter was vehemently debated in the Scottish parliament. The Act of Security was carried, but the lord high commissioner refused his assent. Following this legislative commotion came what was called in England the Scottish plot—a most complicated affair of intrigue and official treachery, with some real treason at the bottom of it. The House of Lords in England took cognizance of the matter, which provoked the highest wrath in Scotland, that another nation should interfere with her affairs; and this embroilment led to a dispute between the two houses of the English parliament about their privileges. When the Scottish estates reassembled, in 1704, they denounced the proceedings of the House of Lords as an interference with the prerogative of the Queen of Scotland; and they again passed the Security Act. The royal assent was not now withheld; whether from fear or from policy on the part of the English ministry is not very clear. The parliament of England then adopted a somewhat strong measure of retaliation. The queen was addressed, requesting her to put Carlisle, Newcastle, Tynemouth, and Hull in a state of defence, and to send forces to the border. A statute was passed which in the first place provided for a treaty of union, and then enacted that until the Scottish parliament should settle the succession to the crown in the same line as that of the English Act of Settlement, no native of Scotland, except those domiciled in England, or in the navy or army, should acquire the privileges of a natural-born Englishman; and prohibiting all importations of coals, cattle, sheep, or linen from Scotland. It was evident that there must be union or war.

One other circumstance of national rivalry filled the cup of bitterness to the brim. The Darien company was making efforts to trade to the East Indies; and one of their vessels going into an English harbor to obtain seamen was seized and condemned for a violation of the chartered privileges of one of the two East India companies. An opportunity of revenge soon occurred. A vessel of the other East India Company went into the Frith of Forth for repairs; and the Darien company, having a power under their charter to make reprisals, seized this vessel by stratagem. A suspicion arose, out of some incoherent talk, that the captain of this vessel, named Green, and his crew had been guilty of crimes on the high seas. One of the Darien company's vessels had not returned from its voyage, and Captain Green and some of his men were prosecuted, upon the belief that they had murdered Captain Drummond and his men, on board the Speedy Return, as the Darien ship was named that had not returned at all. Green and two of his crew were convicted; and they were executed, in defiance of the queen's desire that the execution should be postponed. The privy council of Scotland were terrified by the Edinburgh mob, who threatened the magistrates and rabbled the chancellor; and the three sailors were hanged at Leith. "The poor men were sacrificed, not to penal laws, but to national hostility—they were victims of war rather than of justice." Mr. Burton adds to this expression of his opinion, "there was afterward abundant reason for believing that Captain Drummond, whom they were charged with murdering, was alive in a distant land." *

In this defiant attitude toward England stood Scotland in 1704 and in 1705. Her mobs were howling for English blood before her courts of justice; her patriots were hooting and hissing when the name of the Princess Sophia was uttered in the parliament house. "If a member said anything that could be construed as a leaning to England, cries to take down his words, or to send him to the Castle, imported that scornful denunciation of his sentiments for which his opponents could not find argumentative expressions sufficiently powerful." † This temper, which had lasted for several years, had filled the northern population of England with apprehensions of a Scottish war. The zealots of Scotland talked loudly of girding on their swords, and thought of Bannockburn. The rumors of border-feuds revived, and the stout borderers of Cumberland and Northumberland thought of Dunbar. There were words of common-sense uttered in the English parliament by Lord Haversham: "There are two matters of all troubles; much discontent, and great poverty; and whoever will now look into Scotland will find them both in that kingdom. It is certain the nobility and gentry of Scotland are as learned and as brave as any nation in Europe can boast of; and these are generally discontented. As to the common people, they are very numerous, and very stout, but very poor. And who is the man that can answer what such a multitude, so armed, so disciplined, with such leaders, may do, especially since opportunities do so much alter men from themselves. And there will never be wanting all the promises and all the assistance France can give." * These apprehensions were happily averted by a show of moderation in the Scottish parliament, and by a consummate exercise of prudence on the part of Godolphin, who, as the head of a ministry chiefly composed of moderate Whigs, had greater power than he had possessed when reconciling the divided opinions of the first years of his administration. In August, 1705, the draft of an Act for a Treaty of Union was brought into the Scottish parliament. Violent were the debates; but it was at last passed, by a majority of two, but accompanied by a resolution that the commissioners for the treaty should not meet those in England until an offensive statute of the English parliament which had been recently passed should be repealed. It was proposed that this resolution should form part of the Scotch statute for a treaty; but the more moderate members carried that the resolution should be embodied in an address to the queen. In the new English parliament of 1705 the address of the Scots' parliament, "against any progress in the treaty of union, till the act which declared them aliens by such a day should be repealed," was laid before the two houses; and to the surprise of all parties the ministers of the queen advocated the repeal, not only as regarded the question of denying the Scots the privileges of native-born subjects, but as to the restrictions of that statute upon commercial intercourse. The friendly hand was cordially held out; and if it were not as cordially grasped—if, at some stages of the coming negotiations it were roughly pushed aside—it is to the immortal credit of the English statesmen that they went calmly forward with their great work, and accomplished it by honest perseverance, without trickery and without coercion. The reflecting politicians in both countries saw the perils that would result to both from being swayed by national prejudices and popular jealousies. There were old wounds to be healed, old injuries to be forgiven, existing injustice to be redressed, friendship to be established upon conditions of equal rights and liberties. The people of both countries were not wholly insane. Defoe has said, with a vigor which sometimes bursts forth out of the dry details of his history of the union, "God's providence unravelled all the schemes of distinction, which madmen had drawn for the ruin of their native country: and as many times things evil in their design are overruled by an invisible hand, and bring to pass that very good which they were prepared to destroy, even so it was here; for these confusions were the very things that brought both the nations to their senses; I mean, brought them both to better temper. The consequences of a bloody war just breaking out in the bowels of their native country, in the ruin and certain desolation of which they must necessarily have a great share, opened the eyes of the most thinking people on both sides, even of those who in themselves had no real inclination to the conjunction of the kingdoms, and thus the necessity of taking new measures began to appear both ways." †

In the spring of 1706 thirty-one commissioners were nominated on the part of each kingdom, for negotiating the terms of union. The nomination of the Scottish commissioners was left to the queen, after a violent opposition by those who desired the nomination to be in the estates of parliament. To the surprise of many, that nomination included several violent opposers of the union—a "courageous policy," as Mr. Burton truly observes. On the 16th of April the commissioners assembled in the cockpit at Whitehall. The lord keeper, Cowper, delivered an address on the part of England, and the Scottish chancellor on the part of Scotland. The success of these negotiations may be attributed in no small degree to the wisdom and justice of Lord Somers, one of the commissioners, although he held no office. His ruling principle was that of acting with perfect fairness to Scotland. The commission sat till the 22d of July, when the articles of union were finally agreed upon.

A complete union of two independent nations, to be brought about by common consent, and the terms to be settled as in a commercial partnership, was an event which seems natural and easy when we look to the geographical position of the two nations, and to the circumstance that they had been partially united for a century, under six sovereigns wearing the crown of each kingdom. But when we look to the long-standing jealousies of the two nations—their sensitive assertions of ancient superiority—the usual haughty condescension of the wealthier country—the sturdy pride of the poorer—the ignorance of the bulk of each people of the true character of the other—the differences of the prevailing forms of religion—the more essential differences of laws and their modes of administration—we may consider the completion of this union as one of the greatest achievements of statesmanship. "If those continental nations which had been for centuries accustomed to see annexations, partitions, and the enlargement of empires by marriage and succession, had been told how many different parties and interests it was necessary to bring to one set of conclusions, before the desired end could be accomplished, they would have deemed the project utterly insane, as, indeed, it would have been, if laid before two nations less endowed with practical sense and business habits." * At the very outset of the treaty, the vital principle of union was to be debated—that fundamental article upon which all other articles were to be based—an entire union of the two kingdoms—one kingdom, one crown, one parliament. This article was proposed, at the opening of the negotiations, by the English commissioners. The Scottish commissioners demurred. The descent of the crown of Scotland might go according to the Act of Settlement; mutual free-trade—mutual rights—a federal union. The English commissioners declined to proceed upon such terms, "convinced that nothing but an entire union of the two kingdoms will settle perfect and lasting friendship." The Scottish commissioners yielded, but at the same time demanded reciprocity of citizenship and of privileges of trade. Unquestionably so, replied the English commissioners. It was "a necessary consequence," they said, of the first great condition.

The fundamental principle of the union was thus settled, in the words of the resolution of the English commissioners, to be "an entire and incorporating union, by which the two nations should be formed into one government, be under one sovereign head, in one represented body, standing upon one foundation, enjoying equal privileges, and in common bearing one general proportion of burdens, the same in end and mean, having but one common interest, one name, and being forever hereafter but one people." † How to carry out this amalgamation, in the several relations of "one represented body"—"one general proportion of burdens"—might have presented insuperable difficulties to any set of negotiators who were not thoroughly convinced of the necessity of making a compromise of many supposed particular interests. The question of "proportion of burdens" claimed precedence of that of "one represented body." The English commissioners cleared away many objections, by proposing an equivalent to Scotland in a money payment, for any disadvantages she might be subjected to in a joint principle of finance. By a system of equal duties upon imports and exports, the freedom of trade was established, and to that system no objection could be rationally offered. There were long discussions about duties of excise—about malt, and salt, and ale—which were satisfactorily adjusted. The land tax was arranged in a manner eminently favorable to Scotland. All these matters were got over, when the complex question of representation arose. The English commissioners proposed that Scotland should have thirty-eight members in the united House of Commons. The Scottish commissioners proposed fifty. The number was settled at forty-five—about one twelfth of the whole house. The system of electing peers to sit in parliament was also settled; sixteen being taken out of the hundred and fifty-four who were then peers of Scotland. The laws of Scotland, with the exception of those relating to trade, customs, and excise, were to remain in force, though subject to alterations by the parliament of Great Britain, as the united kingdom was to be called; it being provided "that laws relating to public policy are alterable at the discretion of the parliament; laws relating to private right are not to be altered, but for the evident utility of the people of Scotland." ‡ The standards of the coin, of weights, and of measures, were to become uniform with those of England. For removing national distinctions, the crosses of St. George and St. Andrew were to be conjoined when used in flags, banners, standards, and ensigns. "The coat armorial was to be quartered according to heraldic rules, so that in its employment for Scottish national purposes the arms of Scotland might have the dexter, or pre-eminent side—a privilege for some time adopted, and not lightly esteemed."* In the negotiations of the commissioners all matters relating to the Church of Scotland were excluded. The preservation intact of the constitution and rights of that church was provided for in the acts of parliament under which the union was established.

The history of these negotiations has been told by Sir Walter Scott with a bias which can only be attributed to that nationality which, in its intensification, may cease to be a virtue. He, who in the political questions of his own time was strenuously opposed to what may be called democratic principles, complains that the population of Scotland being as one to six, if the rule of population, "which seems the fairest that could be found, had been adopted, Scotland would have sent sixty-six members to the united parliament," instead of forty-five.† The Whig, Hallam, takes a very different view from the Tory, Scott: "The ratio of population would indeed have given Scotland about one eighth of the legislative body, instead of something less than one twelfth; but no government, except the merest democracy, is settled on the sole basis of numbers; and if the comparison of wealth and of public contributions was to be admitted, it may be thought that a country which stipulated for itself to pay less than one fortieth of direct taxation, was not entitled to a much greater share of the representation than it obtained."‡ Scott, again, takes occasion to accuse the Scottish commissioners of having "sold their own honor and that of Scotland," upon "being given to understand that a considerable sum out of the equivalent money would be secured for their especial use." He then goes on to state, in the most precise way, from the papers of Lockhart, a furious Jacobite, the names of the many recipients of the sum distributed, being £20,540 17*s.* 7*d.*; and says, "it may be doubted whether the descendants of the noble lords and honorable gentlemen who accepted this gratification, would be more shocked at the general fact of their ancestors being corrupted, or scandalized at the paltry amount of the bribe. One noble lord accepted of as low a sum as eleven guineas." Mr. Burton has shown that the sum which was unquestionably advanced by the English government was "employed in paying arrears of salary, or other debts. . . . The general fact that at that time all classes of public creditors in Scotland were in arrear is too palpably notorious." The mere circumstance that arrears were paid out of an advance by England does not imply that there was a previous promise to pay, if the statesman should give a vote against the interests of his country. We lament with the more sober historian of Scotland, that "Sir Walter Scott's national pride seems to have been so entirely overwhelmed by his prejudice against the union that no tale against its supporters is too degrading to secure his belief."§

It was on the 12th of October, 1706, when the estates of Scotland began to consider the articles of union. Immense pains had been taken by the opponents of the measure to rouse the people to a tumultuous opposition. They were in some degree successful. There was a riot in Edinburgh on the 23d of October, when the populace broke the windows of Sir Patrick Johnson, who had been lord provost, and one of the commissioners of the treaty. They were dispersed without any loss of life. Those who consider that the outbreak of a mob—that appears to have been really very harmless—is evidence of the opinions of a nation, may agree with Lockhart that this midnight riot made "it evident that the union was crammed down Scotland's throat."‖ Unprecedented pains had been taken to rouse the passions of the people; and yet any tumult making an approach to insurrection cannot be traced, even in the most exaggerated narratives of those who represent the union as hateful to the Scottish people. Addresses, indeed, came from many places to the parliament against the incorporating principle of the union. Defoe, who was busily engaged in Edinburgh, in a sort of semi-official capacity—chiefly from his knowledge of commercial matters, on which he had made useful suggestions—had represented these addresses as got up by the political opponents of the treaty. Lockhart writes: "That vile monster and wretch, Daniel Defoe, and other mercenary tools and trumpeters of rebellion, have often asserted that these addresses, and other evidences of the nation's aversion to the union, proceeded from the false glosses and underhand dealings of those that opposed it in parliament;" and then he admits that "perhaps this measure had its first original as they report."* Such arts were natural to be used, especially by the Jacobites. They saw that the union would go far to destroy their hopes of a Stuart king for Scotland, if England persisted in her resolution of having no more right-divine sovereigns. The Cameronians held that the wicked union was a breach of the Solemn League and Covenant, they having been sworn to do their endeavor to reform England in doctrine, worship, and discipline. But these were very far from representing the opinions of the dispassionate middle classes. Edinburgh shopkeepers were alarmed at the possible loss of customers; but calculating merchants saw very clearly the opening for successful enterprise, when the commerce of the two nations should be put upon an equal footing. The popular arguments against the union were chiefly appeals to nationality, which has always its amiable side, however it may sometimes exhibit a want of judgment in exact proportion to its enthusiasm.

There was an interval in the proceedings of the Scottish parliament when the parties for or against the union were gathering up their strength for a mortal conflict. The first great oratorical display was made by a young man, Lord Belhaven—a speech, says Defoe, "which, being so much talked of in the world, I have also inserted here."† It was, indeed, "much talked of in the world," being wholly addressed to "the world;" and not very much fitted for a sober Scottish audience. Yet the "bended knees," and the choking passion of tears, of this orator, have had imitators in other solemn assemblies. The speech "was circulated in all known shapes among the people, passed through unnumbered editions, and was so plentifully dispersed that a book-collector seldom buys a volume of Scottish political pamphlets of the early part of the eighteenth century, which does not contain 'The Speech of the Lord Belhaven on the subject-matter of an Union betwixt the two Kingdoms of Scotland and England.'"‡ This singular production has many of the characteristics of a noble eloquence; it has also not a few of those qualities which are most acceptable to a false taste. But it not our province here to criticise this oration. It is desirable, however, to look at it, as indicating the topics which were then best calculated to rouse and embitter the popular passions and prejudices. We therefore print the exordium, which will at least amuse our readers. It may, perhaps, incline most of them to say, as Lord Marchmont said when the speaker sat down, "Behold he dreamed, but lo, when he awoke, he found it was a dream." Lord Belhaven thus commenced his oration:

"My Lord Chancellor: When I consider the affair of an union betwixt the two nations, as it is expressed in the several articles thereof, and now the subject of our deliberation at this time, I find my mind crowded with variety of melancholy thoughts, and I think it my duty to disburden myself of some of them, by laying them before, and exposing them to, the serious consideration of this honorable house. I think I see a free and independent kingdom delivering up that which all the world hath been fighting for since the days of Nimrod; yea, that for which most of all the empires, kingdoms, states, principalities, and dukedoms of Europe are at this time engaged in the most bloody and cruel wars that ever were, to wit, a power to manage their own affairs by themselves, without the assistance and counsel of any other. I think I see a national Church, founded upon a rock, secured by a claim of right, hedged and fenced about by the strictest and most pointed legal sanction that sovereignty could contrive, voluntarily descending into a plain, upon an equal level with Jews, Papists, Socinians, Arminians, Anabaptists, and other sectaries, etc. I think I see the noble and honorable peerage of Scotland, whose valiant predecessors led armies against their enemies, upon their own proper charges and expenses, now divested of their followers and vassalages, and put upon such an equal foot with their vassals, that I think I see a petty English exciseman receive more homage and respect than what was paid formerly to their quondam Macallamores. I think I see the present peers of Scotland, whose noble ancestors conquered provinces, overran countries, reduced and subjected towns and fortified places, exacted tribute through the greatest part of England, now walking in the Court of Requests like so many English attorneys, laying aside their walking swords when in company with the English peers, lest their self-defence should be found murder. I think I see the honorable estate of barons, the bold assertors of the nation's rights and liberties in the worst of times, now setting a watch upon their lips and a guard upon their tongues, lest they be found guilty of scandalum magnatum. I think I see the royal state of boroughs walking their desolate streets, hanging their heads under disappointments, wormed out of all the branches of their old trade, uncertain what hand to turn to, necessitate to become 'prentices to their unkind neighbors; and yet after all, finding their trade so fortified by companies and secured by prescriptions that they despair of any success therein. I think I see our learned judges laying aside their practiques and decisions, studying the common law of England, gravelled with Certioraries, Nisi Priuses, Writs of Error, Verdicts, Indovar, Ejectione Firmæ, Injunctions, Demurs, etc., and frighted with appeals and avocations, because of the new regulations and rectifications they may meet with. I think I see the valiant and gallant soldiery, either sent to learn the plantation trade abroad, or at home petitioning for a small subsistence, as a reward of their honorable exploits; while their old corps are broken, the common soldiers left to beg, and the youngest English corps kept standing. I think I see the honest industrious tradesman loaded with new taxes and impositions, disappointed of the equivalents, drinking water in p'ace of ale, eating his saltless pottage, petitioning for encouragement to his manufactures, and answered by counter-petitions. In short, I think I see the laborious ploughman, with his corn spoiling upon his hands for want of sale, cursing the day of his birth, dreading the expense of his burial, and uncertain whether to marry or do worse. I think I see the incurable difficulties of the landed-men, fettered under the golden chain of equivalents, their pretty daughters petitioning for want of husbands and their sons for want of employment. I think I see our mariners delivering up their ships to their Dutch partners, and what through presses and necessity, earning their bread as underlings in the English navy. But above all, my lord, I think I see our ancient mother Caledonia, like Cæsar, sitting in the midst of our senate, ruefully looking round about her, covering herself with her royal garment, attending the fatal blow, and breathing out her last with an 'Et tu quoque, mi fili.'" *

The Scottish orator was a bold imitator of him who "fulmin'd over Greece." But his rhetoric and his logic would appear to have been ill companions. He contrasts England and Scotland. Our neighbors in England are great and glorious; provinces and kingdoms are the results of their victories; the royal navy is the terror of Europe; their trade and commerce extends through the universe, encircling the whole habitable world, and rendering their own capital city the emporium for the whole inhabitants of the earth. Scotland, he says, is quite otherwise. We are an obscure, poor people, though formerly of better account; removed to a remote corner of the world, without name and without alliances; our posts are mean and precarious. "Our all is at stake," he then exclaims: "Hannibal is at our gates. Hannibal is come within our gates. Hannibal is come the length of this table. He is at the foot of this throne; he will demolish this throne. If we take not notice, he'll seize upon these regalia; he'll take them as our spolia opima; and whip us out of this house never to return again." Hannibal did some of these terrible things. But Caledonia did not, "ruefully looking about her, covering herself with her royal garment," sit idly upon the oak-chest in which the spolia opima were locked up. She bestirred herself to make her obscure poor people great and glorious as their neighbors; to make their joint trade and commerce extend through the universe in a generous rivalry; to change the mean and precarious posts of Scottish administration into a more than equal participation in the greatest offices and distinctions of the British commonwealth; to divest, indeed, the peerage of Scotland of feudal jurisdiction, of followers and vassalages, and thus to make them truly noble and honorable in their obedience to laws which should override the old local tyrannies; to inspire the soldiery of Scotland with the true patriotism that has survived the false glory of border hatred, and made the Abercrombies, and Moores, and Campbells fight for the island as the heritage of one free people; to make the artisans and tradesmen of decayed royal burghs, instead of walking their desolate streets, or becoming 'prentices to their unkind neighbors, raise up factories that might rival the proudest of Lancashire and Yorkshire, and fill the Clyde and the Forth with forests of masts; to cure the difficulties of the landed men by increasing their rents ten-fold, and twenty-fold; to convert the laborious ploughman, with his patch of oats, into the most flourishing, because skilful, farmer on the face of the earth. Caledonia, with a few occasional heart-burnings, has been smiling to see this process going forward for a century and a half; and though she duly believes that her youngest sister had the best of the bargain of 1706, she rejoices with her inmost heart that, under that partnership, enmity gradually passed into mutual confidence, and then into reciprocal esteem and firm friendship.

Standing as we now do upon the platform of a hundred and fifty years' experience, it would be manifestly unwise and unjust to speak of the convictions of such minds as those of Belhaven and Fletcher, and others of the honest patriots at this great crisis of their country's destiny, as manifesting their incapacity of looking beyond their own immediate times. They rested their opposition to an incorporating union upon their belief that it would destroy the nationality of Scotland, without any corresponding public benefits. "Should not the memory of our noble predecessors' valor and constancy rouse up our drooping spirits?" ejaculated Belhaven. "Are our noble predecessors' souls got so far into the English cabbage-stock and cauliflowers that we should show the least inclination that way?" Their watchword was "our ancient kingdom"—a kingdom with a long uninterrupted line of kings, even a hundred and twelve kings, whose veritable portraits are in Holyrood. Belhaven had a right to be proud of the great memories of his nation—of its historical prowess blending with its mythic glories. The fables of such a nation are not to be despised. England could match Scotland in traditions of

Which had seven hundred years this sceptre borne." *

She could match Scotland also in "fathers of war-proof." But it was the mistake of the Scottish patriots to believe that Englishmen were degenerate—wholly given up to money-getting and luxurious gratification—"epicures," as they were called of old—devoted to Dutch cabbages and wheaten bread, and despising honest kale and oatmeal. Yet if the Scots had their prejudices, so had the English. Defoe told his countrymen, "Those who fancy there is nothing to be had in Scotland but wild men and ragged mountains, storms, snows, poverty, and barrenness, are quite mistaken." † John Taylor, the Water Poet, had maintained, a century before, that in his "Pennilesse Pilgrimage" he had never seen "more plenty or more cheap" than in Scotland. But both English and Scots knew full well that the superiority of England was not in the fertility of her land, but in the activity of her commerce. Her capital, from the days of the Tudors, had been steadily devoted to the extension of her trade. In truth, the strongest argument which the advocates of the union could present to the sober Scottish mind—an argument which overthrew all appeals to "free and independent kingdom," "national church," "noble ancestors"—was that the trade of the world should be as open to the Scot as to the Englishman. This was a concession which the Englishman long grumbled against. "It was a common apprehension in England, before the union," says Hume, "that Scotland would soon drain them of their treasure, were an open trade allowed." ‡ The Scots were somewhat amazed when Godolphin at once consented to renounce most of the rubbish of prohibitory statutes, and when the Scotch woollen manufacture was absolutely to receive encouragement. Yet when the articles of union agreed to by the commissioners were known, there were many in Scotland who maintained that the commercial advantages might be equally gained by a federal, instead of an incorporating union. Mr. Seton, of Pitmedden, who was one of the commissioners, contended in the Scottish parliament that this notion was a delusion: "This nation is behind all other nations of Europe, for many years, with respect to the effect of an extended trade. This nation being poor, and without force to protect its commerce, cannot reap great advantages by it, till it partake of the trade and protection of some powerful neighbor nation that can communicate both these." He then shows that, "supposing an entire separation from England," the established commerce of the English and Dutch, especially, would prevent any successful rivalry. The alliance of a neighbor nation was therefore essential. There was no chance of such an alliance with Holland, for they were each dealers in the same goods. With France "few advantages can be reaped, unless the old offensive and defensive league be revived between France and Scotland," and then there would be war with England. The possible results of such a war are thus gravely stated by Seton: "Allowing the Scots, in such a juncture, with the assistance of France, to conquer England, Scotland, by that conquest, could not hope to better its present state; for it is more than probable the conqueror would make her residence in England, as formerly the northern people used to do in their southern expeditions." The conquering Scot could not "quaff the pendent vintage as it grows;" but when the commerce of the Thames poured into his lap all the treasures of the East and of the West, he would leave the port of Leith to the petty gains of her fleet of herring-busses, and would drink "the blude-reid wine" with his king at Westminster, who would scorn to sit "in Dumferling toune." It was long the dream of the Jacobites that Scotland, with the assistance of France, might conquer England. The dreamers awoke, in 1745, to the dirge of "Mourn, hapless Caledonia, mourn." The strong common-sense of Seton of Pitmedden sums up the benefits to Scotland of an incorporating union, in words which sound more like a true prophecy than the rhetorical visions of the young seer, Belhaven: "I may assert that by this union we will have access to all the advantages in commerce which the English enjoy: we will be capable by a good government to improve our natural products for the benefit of the whole island; and we will have our liberty, property, and religion, secured under the protection of one sovereign, and one parliament, of Great Britain." * It is satisfactory to contrast the manifestations in the Scottish parliament of an enthusiastic exclusiveness, and of a less self-satisfied patriotism. It is satisfactory, because out of the fervid nationality and the practical wisdom have been formed that Scottish character, which has tardily but surely amalgamated with the English character, "for the benefit of the whole island"—a character upon which the old English belief in the real and the stage Macsycophants has left no enduring taint—which has survived the growls of Johnson and the libels of Churchill; which has ceased to be violently combative when any assimilation of the laws and institutions of the northern and southern sides of the Tweed is proposed; which calls up all the old fire of as true a nationality when a common enemy of the whole island is to be fought, a common injustice to be redressed, or a common reform to be struggled for.

When the vote was taken upon the first article of the Treaty of Union, viz., "That the two kingdoms of Scotland and England shall, upon the first day of May next ensuing the date hereof, and forever after, be united into one kingdom by the name of Great Britain," there was a majority of thirty-three in favor of this fundamental proposition. There was a majority in each estate—of peers, of barons or representatives of counties, of representatives of towns. The second article for the succession of the monarchy, and the third for representation by one parliament, were also carried within the next fortnight. The question which was excepted from the treaty, that of the Church of Scotland, was then agitated; and it was resolved in a way which abated the fears of the Presbyterians, by passing a separate act to provide for the security of the Church; which act was to be repeated as a part of any act of the Scottish or English parliament adopting the union. Under this statute every sovereign of Great Britain, upon his or her accession, is to take an oath to protect the government, worship, discipline, rights, and privileges of the Church of Scotland. The estates then proceeded to the consideration of the minute details of the remaining twenty articles of the treaty. This discussion lasted till the middle of January, 1707.

The opposition to the union beyond the walls of the Scottish parliament could scarcely be called national, in a large sense of the word. But it was nevertheless a formidable opposition, manifesting itself among very various parties and conditions of society. The Duke of Queensberry, the queen's high commissioner, was instrumental in disarming the violence, both within the parliament and without, by his patience and moderation. "The duke, in all the heats and animosities of the party, in all the convulsions of the kingdom, carried on the treaty with easiness, temper, and extraordinary conduct, not taking advantage of the rashness and madness of the people, pitying rather than apprehending danger from their folly." * Queensberry was threatened with assassination. He was told that two and twenty had subscribed an oath with their blood, by which they were bound together to assassinate him. No attempt was made to commit this crime. There was a second outbreak in Edinburgh, but there was no bloodshed. Those who have been described as the fiercest mob in Europe were singularly harmless during the three months of excitement which preceded the passing of the Act of Union. There was a more serious riot at Glasgow on the 7th of November, which lasted several days. Those who had been fighting at Bothwell Brig with a fury which Claverhouse and Balfour have impersonated for history and romance, were now united to hunt after an obdurate provost who had declined to sanction a city address against the union. Jacobites and Cameronians, papists and hill-preachers were masters for a time of the city of Glasgow. "They ranged the streets and did what they pleased; no magistrate durst show his face to them; they challenged people as they walked the streets with this question, Are you for the union? and no man durst own it but at his extremest hazard."† They searched for arms in private houses; and their rudeness, says Defoe, is not to be described. But this rude mob took no life away. "Except that there was no blood shed, they acted the exact part of an enraged ungoverned multitude." A few of the leaders of these riots were taken, and the Glasgow baillies were soon relieved of their fears.

There is a grave record of an important demonstration of this period, in a work which might pass for such an ingenious fiction as the famous "Gil Blas de Santillane," or "The History of the Life of Mr. Jonathan Wild, the Great," if the author were not a distinguished personage known by "his several transactions and negotiations in Scotland, England, the courts of Vienna, Hanover, and other foreign parts," as the title-page of his book duly sets forth.‡ John Ker describes the three great parties of Scotland—the Presbyterian, the Cameronian, and the Episcopal. The Presbyterian were divided into the complying and the nonjuring; the nonjurors taking exception to the oath which referred to the English statute under which the sovereign was required to be of the communion of the Church of England. He paints the Cameronians as cleaving to the form of church government established in 1648; despising the indulgence of Charles II., the toleration of James II., and the revolution establishment; they continue to preach in the fields, still retaining the doctrine of resistance, and self-defence, however peaceable. The Episcopal party, he says, "are generally in the pretender's interest, and are near one half of the nation," among whom are to be reckoned the most part of the Highland clans. John Ker was considered as one of great influence among the Cameronians. But, as he himself professes, he was strenuously opposed to the schemes of the Jacobites, who were endeavoring to engage the Presbyterians and Cameronians on their side, to prevent the union. "I soon perceived," says the man of influence, "abundance of private transactions in favor of the pretender; for it was impossible for the Jacobites to carry them on without my knowledge, considering the great interest I had with the Cameronians." The Duke of Queensberry sent for Mr. Ker, for the government had advices that the Cameronians and Jacobites were to meet in arms on the river Nith, near Sanquhar, to put an end to the parliament, and that the French king would send over troops, "to improve the opportunity." The Laird of Kersland said he was always an enemy to popery and the pretender; but then was he able to dissuade the Cameronians from their purpose? He could not resist the duke's "rhetorical arguments;" and so an ingenious device occurred to the loyal man: "If I purposed to do any effectual service, I must enter into all their measures, and then probably they would honor me with the chief command, and by being at their head in rebellion against the queen and government I should expose myself to their displeasure; and therefore it would be proper I should have a privy seal, authorizing me to act as I found convenient." * So John Ker wends his thoughtful way from Edinburgh to Killoch Side, near Sanquhar, where the Cameronian leaders were assembled; and they admitted him forthwith into their general meeting. He gives his harangue to this meeting. Matters are now brought to a crisis. All that is dear to us as Protestants is likely to be rendered precarious by the proposed union. Are we to oppose this union or not? "If you agree in the affirmative, then what sort of opposition this shall be; for it is very evident that the parliament resolves to ram it down our throats." Prevail upon them, said Queensberry, to decline their desperate resolutions. The eloquence of Ker produced a determination to do something more decided. "I pretended—and would to God I had dealt more sincerely—to join with them in all their measures, and offered to fortify their resolutions with some arguments of my own." Then they resolved to burn the articles publicly at the Market Cross of Dumfries, and to publish their declaration that all who supported the union were enemies and traitors to their country. On the 20th of November the burning was "very solemnly performed, by a considerable party of horse and foot under arms, with sound of trumpet and beat of drum." The worthy orator of Killoch Side quieted the apprehensions of the government that horse and foot and beat of drum meant insurrection: "I dispatched an express to the Duke of Queensberry, and told him, though I had given way to such a solemn execution of the union articles, that he might be easy notwithstanding, for it was necessary to keep up to the decorum they expected, in order to prevent their prosecution of such measures as must infallibly disappoint him. And further, I told him, it might be found expedient to burn the houses of some that had been most instrumental in carrying on the union; but nevertheless, I doubted not to order matters so, as that nothing was to be feared from the Cameronians upon this conduct, which looked very like earnest. I am convinced the whole body of the Cameronians were resolved, my unworthy self only excepted."

John Ker, of Kersland, is the type of many an intriguing spy, who, in dangerous times, has encouraged the agitation which he was employed to watch. It was fortunate that the Cameronians were not driven to carry their zeal beyond the Market Cross at Dumfries. Vast things were expected from the junction of the true League and Covenant men with the Jacobites, Papists and Episcopalians. They were to march to Hamilton, seven thousand in number. The Duke of Athol was to lead his Highlanders through the famous pass where Dundee scattered six thousand veterans. The Duke of Hamilton was to head this motley army. The duke was wiser. He sent orders to the Highlanders and Cameronians to disperse and return home. The duke was unstable in his modes of opposition to the union. All parties began to look with suspicion upon his alternations of a hot and cold policy, and upon the blandishments of his mother toward the Presbyterians. "It was suggested," says Burnet, "that she and her son had particular views, as hoping that if Scotland should continue a separated kingdom, the crown might come into their family, they being the next in blood after King James's posterity." †

Despite the Jacobites and the Cameronians, the timid Presbyterians and the semi-papist Episcopalians, the Act of the Scottish Estates for the Union was finally passed on the 16th of January, by a hundred and ten votes against sixty-nine. "And there's an end o' an auld sang," said the chancellor. It was an insult, cries the chivalrous Sir Walter Scott, "for which he deserved to be destroyed on the spot by his indignant countrymen." ‡ Belhaven complained that the union would compel the peers of Scotland to "lay aside their walking-swords when in company with the English peers, lest their self-defence should be called murder." We have outgrown the use of walking-swords, even for the self-defence which the Scottish thought a privilege of his order; certainly so for such homicid the Scottish poet thought a fitting propitiation to the shades of hundred and fourteen kings whose line began when Cheops wa unborn.

Before the Scottish parliament separated, they regulated the election of the representative peers, and the proportion of county and borough members of the Commons. They had to arrange the division of the equivalent money, of which the Darien or African Company had a large share. The last meeting of the Scottish Estates was on the 26th of March, 1707.

The Order of the Thistle, which had been revived by Queen Anne in 1703, was not filled up by elections till some few years had elapsed. James II. had contemplated the restitution of the order, but no patent for this object had passed the great seal. There was now in the possession of the crown the means of bestowing a great distinct n, essentially national; for in the statutes of 1703 the number of knights was limited to twelve peers of Scotland, the sovereign being the head. This number somewhat profanely kept in view the precedent of our Saviour and the twelve apostles. George I. broke through the principle of exclusive nationality by bestowing the honor upon a few English peers. George IV. overturned the scriptural character by raising the number of knights to sixteen.

The parliament of England had met in December, during the anxious discussion in Scotland of the articles of the Treaty of Union. At the end of January the queen sent to the House of Peers, and announced that the treaty for an union had been ratified by act of parliament in Scotland, with some alterations and additions. The articles were then presented. In the Lords a bill was brought in for the security of the Church of England as by law established; the movers having, of course, a slight apprehension that the sovereign's oath to preserve the Church of Scotland might be liable to misconstruction unless thus qualified. The debates in the English parliament on the principle of the union were animated, but were not violent. The ministry were anxious to pass the bill for the union, without making any alteration in the articles as adopted by the Scottish parliament. They succeeded in preventing a debate on each clause by inserting the articles in the preamble of the bill, with the two acts for the security of the churches of each country. By this device the measure was to be accepted or rejected as a whole. It was passed without difficulty, and on the 6th of March the queen gave the royal assent in these words: "My Lords and Gentlemen: It is with the greatest satisfaction that I have given my assent to a bill for uniting England and Scotland into one kingdom. I consider this union as a matter of the greatest importance to the wealth, strength, and safety of the whole island; and, at the same time, as a work of so much difficulty and nicety in its own nature, that till now all attempts which have been made toward it in the course of above a hundred years have proved ineffectual; and, therefore, I make no doubt but it will be remembered and spoke of hereafter, to the honor of those who have been instrumental in bringing it to such a happy conclusion. I desire and expect from all my subjects, of both nations, that from henceforth they act with all possible respect and kindness to one another, that so it may appear to all the world they have hearts disposed to become one people. This will be a great pleasure to me, and will make us all quickly sensible of the good effects of this union. And I cannot but look upon it as a peculiar happiness, that in my reign so full provision is made for the peace and quiet of my people, and for the security of our religion, by so firm an establishment of the Protestant succession throughout Great Britain."

by a parliament which met in December, 1706, is chiefly memorable for its ratification of the Treaty of Union. The ministry was all-powerful, chiefly through the splendid successes of Marlborough in the Netherlands, and from the favorable aspects of the war in Spain and Italy. An indirect overture for peace had been made by Louis; but the English parliament was in no pacific attitude. The queen called for supplies, "sufficient for carrying on the war next year in so effectual a manner that we may be able to improve everywhere the advantages of this successful campaign." The Lords congratulated her majesty upon "the ever-memorable victory of Ramilies," and expressed what they called "the universal satisfaction of your people," at the public declaration which the queen had made "that no negotiations for peace should be entered into, but in conjunction with all the members of the Grand Alliance." The Commons promised "such speedy and effectual supplies as, by the continuance of God's blessing upon your majesty's arms, may establish the balance of power in Europe, by a safe, honorable, and lasting peace." The supplies were granted with unusual rapidity; and the pension of 5000*l.* per annum to the Duke of Marlborough was settled upon his posterity. When the parliament was prorogued, it was renewed by proclamation, declaring that the first parliament of Great Britain should be held on the 23d of October.

The warlike successes of the allies during this year were by no means commensurate with the expectations of the government. In Spain there was a fatal reverse. We have already seen how the insurrection of Catalonia and Valencia had utterly failed, through the incompetency of the Austrian prince and his generals. When Peterborough no longer animated their courage by his daring, and combated their hesitation by his energetic sagacity, the good fortune which gave the allies Barcelona utterly forsook them. Madrid had been retaken by Marshal Berwick, and King Philip was again seated in the Escurial. The so-called King Charles, instead of remaining with the army in Valencia, to lead them against Berwick, returned to Barcelona. In April Lord Galway and the Portuguese general, Das Minas, took the field, with about seventeen thousand men. The French and Spanish army was superior in numbers, especially in cavalry. They met on the plain of Almanza; and there a battle was fought, in which the allies were utterly routed. Four thousand of the English, Dutch, and Portuguese were slain on that fatal Easter Monday, the 25th of April, and eight thousand were taken prisoners. A letter from Mr. Methuen, the English minister at Lisbon, to the Duke of Marlborough, says, "Our infantry is wholly taken or destroyed; but of the horse three thousand five hundred are saved, the greater part of which are Portuguese, who, being on the right, gave way upon the first shock of the enemy, and abandoned the foot." * The towns of Valencia and Arragon were surrendered to the victor. Peterborough's exploits were nearly fruitless. In Catalonia alone had King Charles any adherents. That province continued the seat of warfare, with English assistance, for three more years; but the spirit which only could secure success was gone. It was no longer an insurrection in favor of the house of Austria against the house of Bourbon; it was a national demonstration for King Philip against a foreign enemy. The terrible defeat of Almanza went to the heart of the humblest in England, if we may judge from Addison's amusing essay upon omens. The salt is spilt by an unlucky guest, and the lady of the house says to her husband, "My dear, misfortunes never come single. Do not you remember that the pigeon-house fell the very afternoon that our careless wench spilt the salt upon the table?" "Yes, my dear, and the next post brought us an account of the battle of Almanza." †

Marlborough the diplomatist was more busy in 1707 than Marlborough the general. There was a young King of Sweden, with a passionate desire for war and conquest, who would not take the orthodox course of heartily joining the Grand Alliance against France, or of throwing his weight into the scale of France against the Grand Alliance. Charles XII. had plans of his own, which he pursued with a self-will which had very little respect to the power or influence of any state or confederacy of states. He had defeated the Russians in 1700. He had first conquered, and then deposed, King Augustus of Poland, and had set up a man of noble family, Stanislaus, as king; Augustus was also Elector of Saxony. Charles led his army into Saxony, held its elector in a sort of honorable captivity, and from his camp at Alt Ranstadt, near Leipsic, demanded the submission of Europe to his decrees. Louis XIV. in the reverses of 1706 turned his views to Charles as an ally, bribed his ministers, even solicited him to become the mediator between the Bourbons and the allies. The English government had also its alarms; and Marlborough was in communication with General Grumbkow, who had been sent on a mission to Charles by the King of Prussia. The Prussian gave the young Swede a glowing account of Marlborough and his actions, which was duly reported to him whom the general styles "his hero:" "Among other particulars, he asked me if your highness yourself led the troops to the charge. I replied, that as all the troops were animated with the same ardor for fighting, your highness was not under the necessity of leading the charge; but that you were everywhere, and always in the hottest of the action, and gave your orders with that coolness which excites general admiration. I then related to him that you had been thrown from your horse; the death of your aide-de-camp, Brinfield, and many other things. He took such pleasure in this recital that he made me repeat the same thing twice. I also said that your highness always spoke of his majesty with the highest esteem and admiration, and ardently desired to pay your respects. He observed, 'That is not likely, but I should be delighted to see a general of whom I have heard so much.'" * The general of whom Charles had heard so much was not slow to gratify him. On the 27th of April Marlborough was at Alt Ranstadt. He writes to Harley that he had that day his audience of the king; delivered the queen's letter; and that his majesty seemed very well inclined to the interest of the allies. † Lediard, the biographer of Marlborough, who was in the camp of Alt Ranstadt, gives us a more precise view of the courtly management of the duke at this audience. "He presented to his Swedish majesty a letter from the Queen of Great Britain, and, at delivering it, made him the following compliment in French: 'Sir, I present to your majesty a letter, not from the Chancery; but from the heart of the queen, my mistress, and written with her own hand. Had not her sex prevented it, she would have crossed the sea, to see a prince admired by the whole universe. I am, in this particular, more happy than the queen; and I wish I could serve some campaigns under so great a general as your majesty, that I might learn what I yet want to know in the art of war." ‡ Charles was very gracious in return. He said he would do nothing to prejudice the common cause in general, or the Protestant religion in particular. He cared very little for the common cause. Voltaire has shown what he did really care for. Marlborough, Voltaire says, "fixed his eyes attentively upon the king. When he spoke to him of war in general, he imagined that he saw, in his majesty, a natural aversion toward France, and that he took a secret pleasure in speaking of the conquests of the allies. He mentioned the czar to him, and took notice that his eyes kindled whenever he was named, notwithstanding the moderation of the conference. He, moreover, remarked that the king had a map of Muscovy lying before him on the table. This was sufficient to determine him in his judgment, that the King of Sweden's real design and sole ambition were to dethrone the czar, as he had already done the King of Poland." Marlborough promised pensions to the Swedish minister, Count Piper, and other functionaries, paying one year in advance; and then he returned to the Hague, to go to his accustomed fighting-ground.

Marlborough wrote from Brussels to Harley, in the middle of May, "All our troops are in motion. . . . Since their success in Spain the enemy talk very big, and pretend to give us battle; for my part, I think nothing could be more for the advantage of the allies." § But there was no battle in the Netherlands during that campaign. Vendôme commanded the French army, and he was content with defensive operations. The States controlled Marlborough's plans. Thus the two generals were constantly occupied in watching and counteracting each the strategy of the other. But if Marlborough was unable to strike any decisive blow, he had consulted with Prince Eugene for the accomplishment of a plan that was calculated to injure France in a vital part. An attempt was to be made, by land and sea, to penetrate into the south-eastern part of Louis's own territory. The land forces, under the Duke of Savoy and Prince Eugene, were to invade Provence. An English and Dutch fleet, under Sir Cloudesley Shovel, were to co-operate in this bold attempt. In the beginning of July Victor Amadeus and Eugene crossed the Alps by the pass of the Col di Tende; on the 11th they made the passage of the Var; dislodged the French from their intrenchments on the right bank of that river; and on the 25th encamped near Toulon. The difficulties of this attempt at invasion are described by a high military authority. The fortifications of Toulon were "respectable;" the neighboring heights presented many strong positions, difficult to be acquired or to be retained; the force of the allies was wholly incompetent to invest the place, so that the communication between the garrison and the army of Marshal Tessé could not be impeded; the besiegers were wholly dependent upon the fleet for provisions and military stores.* In less than one month the object of the expedition was abandoned. To revenge, it is said, the bombardment of Turin, the Duke of Savoy resolved to bombard Toulon, in which act of destruction the fleet was the chief agent. The "diversion," as it was called, drew off some of the forces of France from other quarters; but the fires of Toulon blazed for no sufficient object, unless success in war is to be measured by the amount of havoc and misery which man can inflict on man.

All that naval daring could effect in the siege of Toulon was accomplished by the fleet under the command of Sir Cloudesley Shovel. This admiral was faithful and incorruptible, at the time when James II. employed every art to seduce the commanders of the English fleets to betray their trusts. "He was not a man to be spoken to," was the tribute of a Jacobite emissary to the character of Sir Cloudesley Shovel. Returning home from the siege of Toulon, with fifteen ships of the line, his flag-ship was wrecked on the rocks of Scilly, with two other vessels, on the night of the 22d of October. The crews of the Association, the Eagle, and the Romney all perished. The body of the admiral, supposed to be cast ashore by the waves, was found after some days, and was brought to Westminster Abbey for interment with all honor; and in that house of the illustrious dead may be seen his sumptuous monument. But there is a remarkable story connected with his fate, which was published under the authority of the Earl of Romney, grandson to Sir Cloudesley Shovel. Many years after the wreck an aged woman confessed to the parish minister, on her death-bed, that, exhausted with fatigue one man who had survived the wreck reached her hut, and that she had murdered him to secure the valuable property on his person. This worst of wreckers then produced a ring taken from the finger of her victim, and it was afterward identified as one presented to Sir Cloudesley Shovel by Lord Berkeley. Burnet has described the catastrophe of the wreck: "When Sir Cloudesley Shovel was sailing home with the great ships, by an unaccountable carelessness and security, he, and two other capital ships, ran foul upon those rocks beyond the Land's End, known by the name of the Bishop and his Clerks, and they were in a minute broke to pieces, so that not a man of them escaped. It was dark, but there was no wind, otherwise the whole fleet had perished with them: all the rest tacked in time, and so they were saved. Thus one of the greatest seamen of the age was lost, by an error in his own profession and a great misreckoning; for he had lain by all the day before and set sail at night, believing that next morning he would have time enough to guard against running on those rocks; but he was swallowed up within three hours after."† There was another disaster at sea, which in the ensuing session of parliament led, with other accidents, to serious complaints of naval miscarriages. A convoy of five ships of the line were to guard a fleet of merchantmen to Lisbon, chiefly laden with stores and horses for the King of Portugal. Fourteen sail of French ships from Brest and Dunkirk met the English ships off the Lizard; and of this convoy one vessel was blown up and three taken. Most of the merchantmen escaped, and reached their destination. The posture of affairs was not agreeable; and the first parliament of Great Britain met on the 23d of October, in no very placable temper. The Prince of Denmark was lord high admiral; and against his management, or rather that of his council, to whom he deferred in all things, were the complaints of parliament openly or covertly directed. Lord Haversham's denunciations spoke, to some extent, the murmurs of the people: "Your ships have been taken by your enemies, as the Dutch take your herrings, by shoals, upon your own coasts; nay, your royal navy itself has not escaped. And these are frequent misfortunes, and big with innumerable mischiefs. Your merchants are beggared, your commerce is broke, your trade is gone, your people and manufactures ruined. . . . My lords, the face of our affairs is visibly changed in the space of one year's time, and the temper of the nation too."* In all wars the English have ever been impatient of misfortune, and even of the absence of success. It was time that Marlborough and the Whigs should make some strenuous exertions to recover their popularity. They turned out Harley, and compelled St. John to resign; for these very able but not very scrupulous coadjutors were intriguing against them. Two more years of fierce warfare, in which the national excitement was abundantly kept up; and then a season of polemical fury, of court intrigue, an outcry for peace, and a total change of men and measures.

The union, as might be expected, has not worked very smoothly in Scotland. The general taxation of the two countries being assimilated, there were perpetual differences about the collection of the excise. The Scots had been accustomed to have their duties farmed, upon a system of composition for the tax-payers. When the gauger came with his accurate measurements, and the loose system would no longer prevail, the indignation was very general, though very unreasonable. The customs were also obnoxious, and a contraband trade was very soon established. The equivalent money, too, was delayed in its arrival, from the somewhat low state of the English exchequer. When it was paid there were only a hundred thousand pounds sent in specie, and the remainder in bills. Even the specie was not welcomed; for the populace of Edinburgh were incited to stone the carters who conducted the precious deposit to the castle. The people at first refused to take the bills; but regularity of payment soon removed the difficulty. There had been a year of grumbling on both sides of the Tweed; for the English merchants looked with aversion upon the system that had been attempted, of sending foreign goods to the Thames as Scottish merchandise. There were seizures of French wine and brandy, which were held to be smuggled from abroad. The interference of the government prevented a collision, by remitting the penalties which the Board of Customs would have exacted. But there was mutual exasperation, and very angry commercial jealousy.

After the discussions in the Scottish parliament upon the question of union, a Jacobite agent from France hid been busy in stirring up the disaffected to an insurrection. This ambassador from St. Germains was Colonel Hooke; and he came with offers of French assistance, to unite with the Scots to whom the union was held to be hateful, for the invasion of England. The legitimate king was to lead the conquering forces of his ancient realm; and he should wear the two crowns, as his royal ancestor, the sixth James, had worn them. This enthusiastic agent had communications with several peers of well-known Jacobite principles. He was also endeavoring to work among the Cameronians; and he received assurances from our amusing friend, John Ker, of Kersland, that five thousand of these fighting zealots should take the field. This worthy patriot had again seen the Duke of Queensberry, and told him that there was a project to bring in the pretender. "The duke was much surprised when he understood a French power was to land in Scotland, and desired me to go into their measures in order to discover the plot." Ker had scruples: "I told him I was afraid I had gone through too much dirty work already." The duke went to London. "I retired," he says, "to Kersland, to breathe some honest air in the country." But "the bugbear of popery" still troubled his head. The agents came from St. Germains; let him into the whole affair; promised that nothing should be wanting to secure the Protestant religion; settled that five thousand troops should be sent from France; and forthwith, says the candid autobiographer, "I acquainted the Duke of Queensberry with what had passed." In this juncture Ker exercised his influence with the Cameronians, not to excite them to insurrection, and then betray them, but in persuading them not to rise. His information, however, from the Jacobite agents was correct, and his warnings to the government were useful. But he received small personal benefit for his "good services;" and he adds, out of the depth of his frank soul, "Truly I dare say, I was rewarded just as I deserved."*

In January, 1708, the British government, with a full knowledge of the contemplated invasion, was carefully observing preparations for an armament at Dunkirk. Sir George Byng was cruising in the Channel with sixteen men-of-war. At the beginning of March fifteen French battalions and three hundred volunteers were embarked; and Prince James Edward, known as the pretender, having gone on board a fleet of twenty-eight vessels, commanded by the French admiral Fourbin, came out of Dunkirk. At Ostend Byng learned that they had evaded him; and from the state of the wind and tide, they had eight hours' start of him in their voyage toward Scotland. The French admiral overshot the Frith of Forth, but returned southward from the coast near Montrose, and lay off May Island. When the English squadron appeared, Fourbin sailed in hot haste into the North Sea, without making any attempt to land his troops. The Scots, it was said, made no response to his signals. Byng did not make any pursuit, and the troops and their leader were relanded at Dunkirk.

Had the French expedition made a descent, the government might have been seriously embarrassed, for the queen's troops in Scotland were very few, and there was little preparation for resistance. Previous to the attempt there had been a serious disorganization in the ministry. Harley was carrying on, through his influence over the queen, schemes for the construction of a party opposed to the powerful ministers, Godolphin and Marlborough, with whom he had been serving. A clerk of Harley, named Gregg, was detected in a correspondence with the French secretary of state, to whom he had communicated important secrets of office. He was tried, and convicted of treason on his own confession; but he persisted to the end in averring that Harley had no part in his treachery. Various revelations were made of the subtle minister's intrigues at court; and Godolphin and Marlborough insisted on his dismissal. The queen would not consent. The lord treasurer and the commander-in-chief did not appear at the cabinet council, refusing to meet Harley. The queen reluctantly yielded to necessity, and the secretary resigned the seals. St. John and other official persons also resigned. The wretched Gregg was executed. The dismissal of Harley was the prelude to that change in the councils of Anne which divided the nation more completely into Whig and Tory factions, and produced a struggle for political ascendency as remarkable as any in the history of parties. The Whigs, for a time, were in the ascendant. The resignation of St. John opened the important office of secretary at war to Robert Walpole.

It was not till the beginning of July, 1708, that the war in the Netherlands assumed any decisive character. There was a French army of a hundred thousand men advancing to Brabant, under the command of the Duke de Vendôme. The Dutch had conducted themselves with so much harshness in the fortified places which had been surrendered after the battle of Ramilies that the inhabitants had become thoroughly adverse to the cause of the allies, and they looked with joy at the advance of the French. Marlborough was inactive through June, waiting for Prince Eugene and his army, marching from Vienna. In the mean time the gates of Ghent and Bruges had been opened to the French; and Marlborough wrote to Godolphin, on the 9th of July, "The States have used this country so ill that I no ways doubt but all the towns in it will play us the same trick as Ghent has done, whenever they have it in their power."† At the date of this letter Marlborough was marching day and night, to come up with the French, who were preparing to invest Oudenarde. Prince Eugene had joined him alone, having hurried on before his troops. They immediately determined to attack Vendôme, and to take a line of march that would interpose between him and the French frontier.

But Marlborough, at this most important juncture, would have been little fitted for conducting a great battle had he been formed of the same yielding materials as ordinary men. In the letter to Godolphin of the 9th of July, in which he attributes the surrender of Ghent to the harsh conduct of the Dutch to the people of the Spanish Netherlands, he says, "I should answer two of your letters, but the treachery of Ghent, continual marching, and some letters I have received from England, have so vexed me, that I was yesterday in so great a fever, that the doctor would have persuaded me to have gone to Brussels; but I thank God I am now better, and by the next post I hope to answer your letters." This impassive man can feel then. His plans of warfare are disconcerted; he is exhausted by wearisome marches; but, worst of all, he has the agitation of letters "received from England." The future greatness of the ambitious commander, who has more of the dizzy heights of fortune yet to scale, may altogether depend upon those letters. He had written at the end of May to Godolphin, "I am very glad to find by yours of the 11th that you have hopes that Mrs. Morley, though late, will do what you desire. Nothing else can make us happy in serving her well; for though I should have success, that might give safety abroad, but could not hinder disagreeable things at home."* Mrs. Morley (the queen), though she had dismissed Harley from her councils, kept up her correspondence with him, through her new favorite, Mrs. Masham. Mrs. Freeman (the duchess) had not yielded up her old influence without an attempt to subdue Mrs. Morley entirely to her will, not by blandishments, but by an imperial contempt of her majesty's understanding and conduct. The duchess when, in the autumn of 1707, she remonstrated against the appointment of two high-churchmen to vacant benefices, employed the following extraordinary language: "I hope your majesty will not be so much offended with me as you have lately been, if I believe those things for your good that are thought so by those that have served you with so much success—men that have a view of all things and all sorts of people, whereas your majesty has had the misfortune to be misinformed in general things. Even from twelve years old you have heard in your father's court strange names given to men by flatterers in these former reigns, for no reason in the world but that they would not continue to carry on popery. That, and many other things too long to repeat in a letter, has given your majesty very wrong notions, and you are like people that never read but one sort of books—you can't possibly judge unless you heard all things stated fairly."† The ascendency of Mrs. Masham was, under the tuition of Harley, rapidly driving Mrs. Morley to cast off her dear friend, Mrs. Freeman, who used such plain speaking. Upon such slight things do the fates of nations depend. Marlborough had a fever fit: but he roused himself, and, three days after, won the great victory of Oudenarde.

Those letters to the ministry at home in which Marlborough relates the results of a battle rarely contain any precise military details. In the instance of his victory at Oudenarde, he sends a note of a few lines to the secretary of state, referring him to the aide-de-camp he has sent "to give the queen an account of his great success." But five days after this battle of the 11th of July he writes a letter of very minute information to Count Piper, the minister of Charles XII. of Sweden, in which he describes his operations, for the information of that king, to whom fighting was the great object of existence. We translate a few passages of this letter, written in French, which may still be read with interest. Having described the occupation of Ghent by the enemy, after they had remained some weeks in their camp of Braine-la-Leude, he says, "Their army marched at the same time to make assurance of their new conquest, believing that by that they would become masters of all Flanders. They first desired to besiege Oudenarde, which they had invested on the 9th, and to cover the siege their army marched on the 10th to seize on the camp of Lessines. They were only two leagues from it, when they found that we had anticipated them by forced marches. Seeing that we had already begun to pass the Dender at Lessines, they recalled their forces from before Oudenarde, to fall back upon Gavre, upon the Escaut [Scheldt], previous to passing that river. This passage they commenced at four o'clock on the morning of the 11th; and the same day we continued our march toward Oudenarde, five leagues distant from our camp."‡ It was this march of unexampled rapidity that gave Marlborough his triumph. The French were quite unprepared for the sudden presence of his army, ready to give immediate battle, after a fatiguing march through a close country, with a great river to cross at the end of that march. Saint Simon relates that when it was reported to the French commander, the Duke de Vendôme, that all the army of the allies was in sight, having crossed the Scheldt, he maintained that it could not be true. An officer arrived to confirm the news; but Vendôme still continued obstinate in his opinion. A third messenger, and then he mounted his horse, saying "that all this was the work of the devil, and that such diligence was impossible." He soon was relieved of his incredulity. We turn again to Marlborough's own narrative. Bridges had been constructed by an advanced detachment. The main body of the army reached these bridges at noon. "The enemy moved forward, and took their ground, which obliged our detachment, about three or four o'clock in the afternoon, to attack their advance, which was executed with success. A brigade, having defeated and killed or taken seven battalions, had thus given time to a part of our army to join them, while the enemy formed in lines. Although many of our troops were not yet come up, between five and six o'clock the battle commenced, principally between the infantry; and it lasted till night, when the enemy retreated toward Ghent in great confusion." In this battle scarcely any use was made of artillery. Marlborough's march had been too rapid to allow him to bring more than a few pieces of cannon into the field; and the French appear to have been equally short of this great arm of war. In a dispatch to M. de Thungen, Marlborough says, "If we had had two more hours of day, it is probable that the enemy would have been entirely defeated. We have, however, about seven thousand prisoners, besides more than seven hundred officers, many of distinction, with a great number of colors and standards."* The great general was very far from considering the battle of Oudenarde a total victory. He wrote, indeed, to Godolphin, "I hope I have given such a blow to their foot, that they will not be able to fight any more this year."† But Marlborough had work still to do before that campaign was finished. On the 26th of July he wrote to Godolphin, that although the success at Oudenarde had lessened the French army by at least twenty thousand men, he was uneasy. He had difficulty in getting cannon; he was in a country where the people had been commanded to abandon their dwellings and retire to the strong towns. He had a notion, it is related, of penetrating into France by the northern frontier, having masked Lille. Even Prince Eugene, with his fiery courage, regarded the attempt as too dangerous. The siege of Lille was therefore to be undertaken. That siege lasted till the winter. Meanwhile the fortified lines of the French near Ypres were destroyed, and Ghent again fell into the power of the allies. There were successes of importance in other quarters. The island of Sardinia was taken by the English admiral, Sir John Leake; and the same enterprising commander, in conjunction with General Stanhope, who had retrieved the fortunes of the allies in Catalonia, carried Port Mahon by storm; and thus the island of Minorca came into the possession of the English, who retained it for half a century. Other triumphs, in the Mediterranean and in South America, again established the naval superiority of England.

At the end of October died the husband of Queen Anne, Prince George of Denmark. For some time previous to his decease there had been a struggle on the part of some of the great Whig leaders to remove him from his office of lord high admiral, for which he was certainly incompetent. His death settled the dispute, and opened the way to the completion of a more decided Whig ministry. Upon the pedestal of a statue of Prince George, in a niche at one end of the town-hall of Windsor, it is recorded, in flattering falsehood, such as many another Latin inscription has recorded of the living and the dead, that he was "a hero in every age to be venerated." The sarcasm of Charles II., that he "had tried him drunk and sober, and could find nothing in him," would probably outlive the incense of Sir Christopher Wren, who erected the statue in 1713. The great architect could certainly do no less than make Prince George "a hero," when in the inscription under the statue of the queen at the opposite end of the same hall, the sculptor is told that his art is vain, for if he would exhibit the likeness of Anne, he must carve "a goddess." In the eyes of the Duchess of Marlborough, whose ascendency over the queen was gone, the goddess was now something less than Mrs. Morley; for the spiteful Mrs. Freeman says, "Her love to the prince seemed, in the eyes of the world, to be prodigiously great; and great as was the passion of her grief, her stomach was greater, for that very day he died she ate three very large and hearty meals." Dire had been the offence which the queen had given to the haughty duchess during this summer and autumn. Harley had been dismissed, but in the small house at Windsor which she had purchased Anne "stayed all the sultry season, . . . because, from the park, such persons as Mrs. Masham had a mind to bring to her majesty could be let in privately by the garden." After the death of the prince the queen spent many hours every day in the closet where he had been wont to sit. "The true reason of her majesty's having this closet to sit in was, that the back-stairs belonging to it came from Mrs. Masham's lodgings, who by that means could secretly bring to her whom she pleased. And that a correspondence was thus carried on with Mr. Harley became every day more and more manifest, by the difficulties and objections which her majesty had learned to raise against almost everything proposed by her ministers." Such is the testimony, no doubt in great part true, which the Duchess of Marlborough has handed down, of the commencement of that system of political intrigue which is so difficult to unravel, for the remainder of this reign. There is only one clew to this labyrinth, which must be steadily kept in view if we would wish to escape from its mazes. Queen Anne was secretly hostile, with all the zeal of which her cold nature was capable, to the settlement of the crown upon the Electress Sophia of Hanover and her descendants. She is believed to have cherished a natural, although dangerous, wish that her brother should be her successor, in spite of solemn acts of parliament. Whoever would adroitly foster this humor would have her real favor; and Harley was precisely the man to carry his Jacobitism to the point where it might be safe and profitable. The duplicity of too many of the statesmen of England and Scotland was of the same character; and with those of more ambition than honesty, it was merely a matter of calculation whether the Elector of Hanover should come to the throne upon revolution principles, or the Chevalier St. George by divine right, when that queen, who was something like a compromise of the two principles, should be no more—an event not generally regarded as very distant.

The temper of the queen, during the summer and autumn of 1708, nearly drove Marlborough to a resolution which certainly must have been the most ungenial to his nature, whether we regard his love of power or his avarice. He resolves, about six weeks after his victory of Oudenarde, to "take the first occasion that can be practicable to retire from business." Yes: his homely phrase is "to retire from business." He writes to the duchess in much the same way as a junior partner in a commercial house would write to his wife, complaining of the obstinacy of the head of the firm: "I can't with patience think of continuing much longer in business, having it not in my power to persuade that to be done which I think is right."* It was worth while to pause before the dissolution of partnership was announced—for to him, at least, the business was a very profitable one. Exclusive of Blenheim, the duke's fixed yearly income, from offices and emoluments, was very nearly fifty-five thousand pounds; and the income of the duchess, from her offices at court, was nine thousand five hundred pounds. The vast income of the duke principally depended upon the continuance of the war. The income of the duchess depended upon her possession of the favor of the queen.† We shall have to note how, in a very short period, the eminent services of the victor at Blenheim and Ramilies were forgotten, and the people became persuaded—to use the somewhat prejudiced language of Johnson, in noticing the most successful of the bitter pamphlets of Swift—"that the war was unnecessarily protracted to fill the pockets of Marlborough; and that it would have been continued without end if he could have continued his annual plunder."‡

The siege of Lille was one of the most sanguinary operations of the war in the Netherlands. It was an enterprise of great difficulty, not only from the extreme strength of the place, which had been fortified with all the skill of Vauban, but from the difficulty of the allied armies in obtaining supplies of provisions and military stores.

Prince Eugene directed, and Marlborough covered, the siege. The defence was intrusted to Marshal Boufflers. The covering forces of the besiegers had to contend with the constant determination of the French to intercept their supplies. One of the most gallant actions of the campaign was that of General Webb. He was conducting a large convoy from Ostend, with a detachment of six thousand men, when he was attacked at Wynendale, by a French force of more than twenty thousand. For two hours Webb fought with admirable skill and resolution; compelled the French to retreat, with immense loss; and brought his convoy in safety to the camp before Lille. The speaker of the Commons, in conveying the thanks of the house to the general, said, "We are all sensible how much the reducing the fortress of Lille is owing to your courage and conduct." This must have been painful enough to Marlborough, who, with almost incredible meanness, had attributed Webb's victory to General Cadogan, who had a very small share of the responsibility of the action. Webb left the army in just indignation; published an account of the matter; and received the thanks of the Commons in his place in the house. Lille finally capitulated on the 29th of December. Its loss to France was considered almost irreparable. A real desire for peace was now manifest in the court of Versailles. During the protracted siege of nearly five months the allies lost at least twelve thousand men. The sufferings of the troops were very great. The veteran Auverquerque closed the last of fifty campaigns in the camp before Lille, worn out by age and sickness. In the besieged citadel the brave Boufflers and his garrison were, at the last extremity, subsisting upon horse-flesh.

The first session of the second parliament of Great Britain was opened by commission on the 16th of November. The Whig interest preponderated, and Sir Richard Onslow was chosen speaker. The session was continued till the 24th of April, 1709. In the proceedings of this session there was one public act passed, which is still of effect. The ambassador of the Czar of Russia having been arrested for a debt to a London tradesman, the czar resented the offence against the privileges of the representatives of sovereignty; and the statute was passed by which all process against an ambassador, or any of his domestic servants, is declared null and void.* Another statute presents a curious illustration of the habits of the people. The "Act to prevent the laying of wagers relating to the public" declares that "all wagers to be laid upon any contingency relating to the present war, and all policies of assurance, etc., payable upon any such contingency, shall be utterly void;" and that all persons making such wagers, etc., or their notaries or agents, shall forfeit double the sum for which the wager is laid.† Whether for the issue of a battle or a horse-race, we have been ever a betting people, since we passed out of barbarism into the civilization of which gambling is a feature.

The practice of laying wagers about matters of war and government, according to the preamble of the act, "hath been found inconvenient to the public." This allegation is not very precise. When the frequenters of Will's Coffee-house, or White's Chocolate-house, were staking their guineas or their crowns upon the doubtful fortunes of Godolphin or Harley, of the Elector of Hanover or the king over the water, their brawlings might have disturbed the wits and courtiers, but they could very slightly affect the general convenience of the public. Nevertheless, the betting was a form in which the opinions of Englishmen displayed themselves; and the odds given might indicate sentiments not very agreeable to the official mind. The war was beginning to be unpopular; the French were making advances for peace. A treaty, or another campaign, was a question of chance rather than of calculation at the beginning of 1709; for if France was suffering and exhausted, Marlborough was flourishing. Let us turn from the betting politicians of London to the suffering population of Paris. Let us, while we behold at home public credit so high that the Bank of England obtained subscriptions in four hours of more than two millions for the purpose of doubling their stock and of circulating two millions and a half of exchequer-bills for the aid of the government—let us look upon a picture of misery in France, and learn the price which a people has to pay for the mistaken ambition of its rulers; and for that absolute authority upon which some Englishmen looked with envy and admiration.

The winter of 1709 was unusually severe in France. There was an intense frost of long duration; then a sudden thaw; and then again a frost. By this second frost the grain in the earth, the vines and olive-trees, were destroyed. The price of bread rose enormously. But the natural price of corn was further raised by the interference of the government. Royal commissioners bought up the corn, and the official monopolists sold it at a great advance. The sums which this scheme produced, says Saint Simon, "were innumerable, and innumerable were the people who died literally of hunger." The depopulation of Paris in this terrible year offers sufficient evidence of the condition of the kingdom. The average annual number of deaths in the capital was sixteen thousand; in 1709 they were above twenty-nine thousand. The number of marriages decreased one fourth.* Dividends upon public loans were unpaid; taxes were exacted with extreme rigor; the coin was depreciated; everything rose in price. "The king," says Saint Simon, "had no resources except in terror and in his unlimited power, which, boundless as it was, failed also for want of having something to take and to exercise itself upon." In this state, when the realm was nearly exhausted, envoys were sent into Holland to negotiate for peace.

If the rulers of nations were ordinarily moved with pity for suffering humanity, the ministers of the allied powers might have held out the hand of friendship to France, without any compromise of their just pretensions. If Marlborough had taken a generous and lofty view of public affairs, instead of urging upon Godolphin the necessity for another campaign, a far better peace might have been accomplished than their political enemies at last effected. "Marlborough," says his biographer, "was apprehensive that the King of France was not yet sufficiently humbled to agree to the terms which the allies were entitled to demand; and consequently represented the expediency of obtaining such an augmentation of force as might enable him to dictate the conditions of peace."† The advice of Marlborough resulted in the most sanguinary and most useless of his battles; with the conditions of peace less under his dictation than before he had lost eighteen thousand killed and wounded in the slaughter of Malplaquet. And yet so complicated were the interests of the States-General, of the emperor, of the Duke of Savoy, of Great Britain—in some cases those interests were so conflicting—that it would be unjust to represent Marlborough as the adviser of the harsh and humiliating terms which the allies thought it politic to demand from France. It is difficult, however, to believe that if he had counselled the ministry at home to treat with Louis in a magnanimous spirit, they would have stood out against the advice of their own negotiator. Marlborough had the grace to refuse enormous bribes from France; but he had also the want of decency to sanction the demand, that if Louis gave up Spain and the Indies to the house of Austria, which he stipulated to do, he should join the allies in dethroning his own grandson, if Philip should be obstinate in holding a throne in the possession of which he was supported by the Spanish people. The pride of the magnificent despot was roused by this demand. He condescended to recollect that he had subjects, who were interested in the national honor. He appealed to their patriotism, in a circular letter addressed to all local authorities. It was no longer a war for courtly interests. The country was threatened with dismemberment; and the king and the people roused their drooping courage, even in the midst of their domestic miseries, and a harder campaign had to be fought, with loftier resolution on the side of France, than had ever been called forth by the proud delusions of the world-grasping Bourbon. Voluntary contributions for the support of the war had been freely bestowed upon the court. Louis sent his silver plate to the mint to be coined. The rich, whether nobles or traders, followed his example. There was specie to pay the forces; and recruits flocked to the army, glad to obtain that subsistence which the visitation of providence had denied to their peaceful labors.

On the 21st of June a hundred thousand men, under the command of Marlborough and Eugene, were encamped in the plain before Lille. Marshal Villars had thrown up intrenchments between Douay and the Lys, which probably interrupted a design of penetrating into France. The allies then commenced the siege of Tournay. The city surrendered in three weeks. The citadel held out during July and August. During this siege four thousand of the allies were killed and wounded. Immense slaughter was occasioned by the system of mining and countermining—a mode of warfare which was then rarely practised to the same extent as in this siege. Service in the trenches was always faced by the English soldier with alacrity; but to burrow like a mole, while the sound of the enemy's pickaxe was close to his ear—to believe he was treading upon firm earth, and then in a moment to be blown into the air—these were strange dangers which required an unaccustomed exercise of courage and fortitude.

The allied army, after the fall of Tournay, was proceeding to the siege of Mons, when Marshal Villars followed them, and took up a strong position at Malplaquet. His wings were protected by two thick woods. His centre was placed on rising ground between the woods, with intrenchments thrown up in front of the camp. The allies had about eighty thousand men; the French ten thousand less. Marlborough was encamped in the plain, fronting the opening between the woods. His determination to attack the enemy in so commanding a position has been considered rash; but he had only the alternative of a battle or the abandonment of the siege of Mons. At eight o'clock on the morning of the 11th of September that attack was made. The right of the French was covered by a morass; but this obstacle was rapidly overcome by Marlborough's left wing; and that portion of the enemy was driven back. Villars was himself commanding the left wing of the French, and was to a great extent successful, when he was wounded; and according to the French accounts, that accident was the main cause of the retreat from their position. The French were dislodged from their wooded height after a most sanguinary struggle of four hours, when the conflict was renewed in the plain. At three o'clock they retreated; and the allies encamped on the field of battle, amid thirty thousand of their fellow-men dead or wounded. When the British parliament met two months afterward, the queen was congratulated "upon the continued successes of the last campaign, particularly the victory obtained near Mons."

but never was war among civilized nations more general or more destructive. There is desperate fighting in the Netherlands; a smouldering flame of battle in Spain and Portugal; and a northern war as terrible and more decisive than the War of the Succession. It is the year of the fatal death-struggle of Pultowa, when the old dominion of Sweden in the north was struck down by one great blow, and the czar, whose rule over hordes of half-savage tribes was little heeded in the struggle for the balance of power, first planted his foot upon the Baltic, and bequeathed to the world a new balance to settle from generation to generation. In April, 1707, Marlborough was propitiating the victorious Charles the Twelfth with the most transparent flattery; but the wily negotiator of the allies has seen the map of Muscovy on the young Swede's table, and he guesses to what point his ambition is directed. In 1698 Peter of Muscovy was learning the trade of a shipbuilder in England. He had gone home to build ships; to discipline barbarians into soldiers; to pant for an outlet from his shut-up wastes into the great highways of the world; and so he went to war with the King of Sweden, a lad of eighteen, from whom he and other northern powers hoped to win possessions which had been wrested from them by the Sweden of Gustavus and Christina. The czar was left to fight single-handed for the provinces which had been lost. In 1700 he was signally defeated by Charles at the battle of Narva; but in 1702 he had won territory in Livonia, and in 1703 had founded St. Petersburg on the banks of the Neva. There were five or six years of very doubtful warfare, during which time Peter was forming armies and teaching them how to fight. Charles would no longer endure this teasing and obstinate rival. He had dethroned Augustus of Poland; he would march to Moscow, and treat with the czar in his capital. Five months after Marlborough's visit to the camp at Alt Ranstadt, Charles set out with his army for the invasion of Russia. He traversed Poland, and he wintered at Grodno. In June he defeated the Russians upon the Beresina, and in September he was again victorious at Smolensko. Peter was alarmed, and made proposals of peace. The Swede rejected them, and marched into the Ukraine, to effect a junction with the Cossack chief, Mazeppa. In the Ukraine the Swedish army sustained the severest privations. But the resolution of Charles was unshaken:

> "He comes, nor want nor cold his course delay—> Hide blushing glory, hide Pultowa's day." *

In the spring the Swedish army invested the strong town of Pultowa, on the Vorskla. The fortifications protected the military stores of Peter. The place commanded the passes to Moscow. In June the czar advanced to the relief of Pultowa, with an army of about sixty thousand men. Charles had only twenty-four thousand, not half of whom were Swedes. He despised the security of his intrenched lines, and on the 8th of July he marched out to attack the Russian redoubts. He thought that nothing had changed since he had won the battle of Narva with a similar disparity of numbers. The two kings were in the battle; and the troops on both sides fought with desperation. In two hours ten thousand Swedes lay dead or wounded in the field; hundreds perished in the Vorskla and Borysthenes; the Swedish army was annihilated; and Charles, having swam over the Borysthenes with a few hundred followers, at length reached the Turkish frontier, and for five years was a troublesome fugitive in the dominions of the sultan.

CHAPTER CXL.

Impeachment of Dr. Sacheverel—Proceedings in Westminster Hall—Articles of the impeachment—Passages from the speeches of the managers—Popular manifestations—Sentence upon Sacheverel—Sentence regarded as a triumph of the High Church—Prosecutions of rioters for high treason—Trials of rioters—Progress of Sacheverel—His character.

The well-known hypothesis that a deaf man, looking for the first time upon a ball-room, and hearing no note of the music which inspired the quadrille or the waltz, would think the company mad, may be paralleled by him who, reading of some mighty national ferment, and vainly endeavoring to trace the latent causes of senatorial declamation and popular fury, concludes that a general lunacy can only account for the frantic gallopade. Nevertheless, there is always the piper to direct this sort of dance—sometimes to lead it to a tragical end, as the Pied-piper of Hamelin piped the town rats into the Weser. Such a piper was Henry Sacheverel, Doctor of Divinity, who, on the 5th of November, 1709, having to preach at St. Paul's before the lord mayor and aldermen of London, laid his magic pipe to his lips, and speedily had half the nation dancing like drunken satyrs to the tune of "The king shall enjoy his own again," and breaking heads and burning conventicles amid their pious cry of "God save the Church."

The famous impeachment of Dr. Sacheverel, which for a time absorbed all other public questions, may be regarded as an inexplicable demonstration of party madness, or a grand assertion of party principle. Lord Campbell tells us that the Whigs "probably would have continued undisturbed in their offices till their tenure had been confirmed by the accession of the house of Hanover, had it not been for their most preposterous prosecution of the contemptible sermon preached before the lord mayor of London." † In another place the chief justice delivers his judgment that the Whigs "seem to have been deprived of their understanding, and they were given as a prey into the hands of their enemies." ‡ Against this authority may be cited that of one to whom the historian is bound to listen with profound respect—Edmund Burke. The greatest of philosophical politicians says, "It rarely happens to a party to have the opportunity of a clear, authentic, recorded declaration of their political tenets upon the subject of a great constitutional event like that of the revolution. The Whigs had that opportunity, or, to speak more properly, they made it. The impeachment of Dr. Sacheverel was undertaken by a Whig ministry and a Whig House of Commons and carried on before a prevalent and steady majority of Whig peers. It was carried on for the express purpose of stating the true grounds and principles of the Revolution; what the Commons emphatically called their foundation. It was carried on for the purpose of condemning the principles on which the revolution was first opposed, and afterward calumniated, in order by a juridical sentence of the highest authority to confirm and fix Whig principles, as they had operated both in the resistance to King James and in the subsequent settlement; and to fix them in the extent and with the limitations with which it was meant they should be understood by posterity." * If this view of the matter be correct, the impeachment of Sacheverel was not the act of a party "deprived of their understanding;" although, looking at it as a mere question of expediency, it might have led to the party being "given as a prey into the hands of their enemies." The temporary removal of a ministry from power is a small question compared with the question of the principles which were brought into conflict on this occasion. It is the business of the historical inquirer to endeavor to trace what may have a real and abiding interest in this extraordinary proceeding. One great and permanent lesson may be derived from the contemplation of this battle of opinions—a lesson which has been briefly but emphatically proclaimed by him who, "thinking the ecclesiastical history of our country might advantageously be presented to view in verse," has touched on the great controversial points in a truly Christian spirit:

"High and Low,
Watchwords of party, on all tongues are rife:
As if a church, though sprung from Heaven, must owe
To opposites and fierce extremes her life—
Not to the golden mean and quiet flow
Of truths that soften hatred, temper strife."†

About a month after the session of parliament had been opened, without any very manifest signs of a party conflict, Mr. Dolben, the member for Liskeard, son to the late Archbishop of York, complained that two sermons preached by Dr. Sacheverel, one at Derby and one at St. Paul's, contained dangerous matter. Printed copies having been laid upon the table of the Commons, the house voted that "the two sermons were malicious, scandalous, and seditious libels, highly reflecting on the queen and her government, the late happy revolution, and the Protestant Succession." The preacher was ordered to attend at the bar the next day, when it was resolved that he should be impeached of high crimes and misdemeanors. The puppets are in action; but who is pulling the strings? It is told of Harley, that he, being one of those who spirited Sacheverel to undertake an enterprise so suited to his vain and turbulent nature, "having an entertainment one day at his house in Herefordshire, there came in after dinner a packet of expresses from London; which having read, he looked with an air of joy upon his friends, and snapping his fingers, cried out in exultation, 'The game is up! get the horses ready immediately.'"‡ No lover of "woodcraft" in the Shakesperean age, singing "Hunt's up to the day," could show more eagerness for a run than Harley, one of the most famous professors of statecraft. If Swift is to be believed, the impeachment of Sacheverel "arose from a foolish passionate pique of the Earl of Godolphin, whom this divine was supposed, in a sermon, to have reflected on, under the name of Volpone, as my Lord Somers, a few months after, confessed to me; and, at the same time, that he had earnestly, and in vain, endeavored to dissuade the earl from that attempt. . . . Mr. Harley, who came up to town, during the time of the impeachment, was, by the intervention of Mrs. Masham, privately brought to the queen; and in some meetings easily convinced her majesty of the dispositions of her people, as they appeared in the course of that trial, in favor of the Church, and against the measures of those in her service."§ Here, then, we have the two great rivals face to face to fight the battle for office. Neither Godolphin nor Harley cared very much for the great principles that were called forth in the proceedings against Sacheverel. A keen observer of English politics, Baron von Steinghens, Minister at London from the Elector Palatine, thus describes the factions of the latter years of Anne: "Give them whatever name you will, they will at all times be reducible under two principal heads, namely, those who are in office, and those who want to be. In short, it may be asserted that office is the source of the animosities of the most envenomed divisions of this nation." * Unquestionably there was a higher class of politicians at this time than the meroe office-seekers. But the title of the reigning sovereign was so peculiar, and the principle of the succession so open to controversy, that the holders of office and the strugglers for office had to deal with party questions of more than ordinary vitality; and hence "the most envenomed divisions of this nation" were represented in their strongest force by the great men in place and the great men out of place. The controlling power of public opinion over public men was as yet imperfectly formed. The multitude might be stirred to fury by party leaders; but political knowledge was too little diffused to give the people, properly so called, any effectual influence over those who claimed to be the guardians of the national interests. People and mob were synonymous terms with the oligarchs of the eighteenth century.

The preliminary debates, meetings of committees, preparations of articles of impeachment, answers of the accused, messages between the two houses, and other formal proceedings, occupied ten weeks, before the day of trial came. The metropolis and the country were now in a ferment. On the 27th of February Westminster Hall was filled with as gorgeous an assembly as when Strafford stood at the bar. The queen was there in a private box. The peers were seated in the centre of the hall. The Commons were ranged on one side. A galaxy of ladies filled the other side. The commonalty, described as "the populace," were also accommodated with seats in galleries. The crowd without the doors was unusually large and noisy. The articles of impeachment, Dr. Sacheverel's answer, and the replication of the House of Commons, being then read, Mr. Lechmere opened the charges of the managers. The sermon on the 5th of November was next read. It was described by Harley as "a circumgyration of incoherent words without any regular order."† Of real eloquence the pulpit demagogue had no conception. But he had the power of stringing sentences together which appeared to have some logical sequence, but which were meant to stand alone as axioms of a party. The sermon defies analysis. Its separate dogmas were taken as texts by the managers of the impeachment to refute the principles thus proclaimed as the bases of the constitution.

The reading of the doctor's sermon closed the proceedings of the first day. Wearisome must these proceedings have been, especially to "the noble ladies who attended the trial." We are told that these ladies who came "to see or be seen," were troubled by a matter even more serious than their apprehension "that the Church of England would be ruined by the punishment which was to be inflicted upon this one priest." They "were very much afraid lest somewhat in their dress or behavior there should give occasion to the 'Tatler' or 'Observater' to turn them into ridicule in their papers."‡ The great masters of humor had found a fit vehicle for their good-natured pictures of social follies. Bickerstaff was in his chair, and fashion, usually so bold, was afraid of his laugh. But Steele and Addison wisely kept their charming little paper clear of the prevailing madness of this time, and we have few traces of the great trial in their lucubrations. Defoe says that Sacheverel stopped all lighter matters of social interest: "The women lay aside their tea and chocolate, leave off visiting after dinner, and, forming themselves into cabals, turn privy-councillors, and settle the affairs of state. . . . Nay, the 'Tatler,' the immortal 'Tatler,' the great Bickerstaff himself, was fain to leave off talking to the ladies, during the doctor's trial, and turn his sagacious pen to the dark subject of death and the next world."§ This is exaggeration. Steele did talk to the ladies, and very agreeably, after the 27th of February, "although the attention of the town is drawn aside from reading us writers of news."‖ He laughs to think "how many cold chickens the fair ones have eaten since this day sevennight for the good of their country;" for Westminster Hall, while the court adjourned, had become "a dining-room."¶ Addison did not "turn his sagacious pen" to Homer's description of a future state till the trial of Sacheverel was over, and his sermon was burned by the common hangman.

The managers of the impeachment divided themselves into groups, each group to take charge of one of the four articles into which the charge was divided. The first article set forth that Doctor Sacheverel in his sermon maintained, "That the necessary means to bring about the revolution were unjustifiable; that his late majesty, in his declaration, disclaimed the least imputation of resistance; and that to impute resistance to the said revolution is to cast black and odious colors upon his late majesty and the said revolution." * Sacheverel, with a cunning that was evidently prompted by professional statesmen, pretended to vindicate the revolution—for to hold it altogether odious was to compromise the title under which Queen Anne reigned. But, on the other hand, to say it was founded upon resistance was to shake the doctrine of absolute non-resistance, the belief of which he asserted to be the pillar upon which the government of England stands. He therefore pretended that when the Prince of Orange disclaimed that he came for conquest, he disclaimed the principle of resistance. "The managers of the impeachment," says Mr. Hallam, "had not only to prove that there was resistance in the revolution, which could not, of course, be sincerely disputed, but to assert the lawfulness, in great emergencies, or what is called in politics necessity, of taking arms against the law—a delicate matter to treat of at any time, and not least so by ministers of state and law officers of the crown, in the very presence, as they knew, of their sovereign."† They asserted that all the opposition to the measures of King William, and during the reign of the queen, had come "from those who had questioned the lawfulness of the resistance made use of in the revolution; that the principle of unlimited non-resistance had been revived by the professed and undisguised friends of the pretender." ‡ The great doctrine of constitutional government is then set forth by the same speaker. "To make out the justice of the revolution, it may be laid down, that as the law is the only measure of the prince's authority, and the people's subjection, so the law derives its being and efficacy from common consent: And to place it on any other foundation than common consent is to take away the obligation this notion of common consent puts both prince and people under to observe the laws. And upon this solid and rational foundation the lawyers in all ages have placed that obligation, as appears by all our law-books. But instead of this, of later times, patriarchical and other fantastical schemes have been framed to rest the authority of the law upon; and so questions of divinity have been blended with questions of law; when it is plain that religion hath nothing to do to extend the authority of the prince, or the submission of the subject, but only to secure the legal authority of the one, and enforce the due submission of the other, from the consideration of higher rewards and heavier punishments."

The principle of resistance, as justified by the revolution, was necessarily held to be an exceptional case to the general doctrine of the subject's obedience. Robert Walpole put this as forcibly as any other of his fellow-managers; and we may quote his argument, especially as it lies in a short compass: "Resistance is nowhere enacted to be legal, but subjected, by all the laws now in being, to the greatest penalties; it is what is not, cannot, nor ought ever to be described or affirmed, in any positive law, to be excusable: when, and upon what never-to-be-expected occasions, it may be exercised, no man can foresee, and ought never to be thought of, but when an utter subversion of the laws of the realm threatens the whole frame of a constitution, and no redress can otherwise be hoped for: it therefore does, and ought forever to stand, in the eye and letter of the law, as the highest offence. But because any man, or party of men, may not, out of folly or wantonness, commit treason, or make their own discontents, ill principles, or disguised affections to another interest, a pretence to resist the supreme power, will it follow from thence that the utmost necessity ought not to engage a nation in its own defence for the preservation of the whole?" § Walpole then adds, with the sagacity of a practical statesman dealing with an abstract question, "The doctrine of unlimited, unconditional, passive obedience was first invented to support arbitrary and despotic power, and was never promoted or countenanced by any government that had not designs some time or other of making use of it: what then can be the design of preaching this doctrine now, unasked, unsought for, in her majesty's reign, where the law is the only rule and measure of the power of the crown, and of the obedience of the people?"

Major-General Stanhope was even more practical than Walpole in his application of the question of Sacheverel's impeachment to the High Church doctrines which had so long been the cause of national disgust, and which continued to prevail for half a century, till the common-sense of the people had become too strong for their reception: "There is such an affinity, my lords, between this sermon and the doctrines which are preached and propagated by a certain set of men that I cannot but observe to your lordships on this occasion, how industrious they have been, ever since the revolution, to prepare a way for another. They are the pure and undefiled Church of England! The only men of loyal and steady principles! They never took the oaths to the government; never bent their knee to Baal! They have their own archbishops, bishops, and pastors, and constitute the only true and pure Church of England! We are all schismatics, that is, all the rest of England are schismatics, heretics, and rebels! Now, pray, my lords, what are the peculiar and distinguishing characteristics, the favorite and darling tenets of these men? What else but passive obedience, Jus Divinum, an hereditary, indefeasible right of succession, which no necessity, no act of parliament, no prescription of time, no natural or legal incapacity, can ever invalidate or set aside? If they are in the right, my lords, what are the consequences? The queen is not queen; your lordships are not a House of Lords, for you are not duly summoned by a legal writ; we are no House of Commons, for the same reason; all the taxes which have been raised for this twenty years have been arbitrary and illegal extortions; all the blood of so many brave men, who have died (as they thought) in the service of their country, has been spilt in defence of an usurpation; and they were only so many rebels and traitors."*

If the egregious doctor felt that he was on dangerous ground when he was opposing the principle of the revolution, he had no hesitation when he had to deal with one of the best consequences of the revolution, the toleration of dissenters. The second article of the impeachment imputed to Sacheverel that he maintained that the toleration granted by law was unwarrantable, and that he was a false brother, with relation to God, religion, or the Church, who defends toleration or liberty of conscience. This view of dissent was set forth in a spirit quite worthy of the darkest ages of persecution: "Whoever presumes to innovate, alter, or misrepresent any point in the articles of the faith of our church ought to be arraigned as a traitor to our state; heterodoxy in the doctrines of the one naturally producing, and almost necessarily inferring, rebellion and high treason on the other, and consequently a crime that concerns the civil magistrate as much to punish and restrain, as the ecclesiastical." The charitable man denounced Bishop Grindall as "a false son of the Church,"—"a perfidious prelate," who had advised Queen Elizabeth to tolerate the "Genevan discipline," the professors of which she was afterward obliged utterly to suppress "by wholesome severities." It is unnecessary to follow out the arguments by which the second article of the impeachment was supported, or to detail the equivocations of those who had the charge of Sacheverel's defence. The tendency of these extreme high church principles was sufficiently exhibited in the events which followed the third day of the proceedings in Westminster Hall.

"Sacheverel," says Burnet, "was lodged in the Temple, and came every day, with great solemnity, in a coach to the hall. Great crowds ran about his coach, with many shouts, expressing their concern for him in a very rude and tumultuous manner." † On the third day the manifestation of the populace was more remarkable. "Money was thrown among them; and they were animated to such a pitch of fury that they went to pull down some meeting-houses, which was executed on five of them, as far as burning all the pews in them. This was directed by some of better fashion, who followed the mob in hackney-coaches, and were seen sending messages to them. The word upon which all shouted was the Church and Sacheverel." ‡ These outrages were made the subject of several trials for high treason, of which we shall have presently to give some account, especially as the law upon which the rioters were indicted has been very justly called in question. These trials have also a more popular interest, as the evidence furnishes a vivid picture of what one of the witnesses terms a "mobbish night."

The third article of impeachment against Sacheverel was that he had asserted, contrary to a resolution of parliament, that the Church was in a condition of great peril and adversity under her majesty's administration. In the fourth article he was charged with keeping up factions, instilling groundless jealousies, and exciting the queen's subjects to arms and violence. It is unnecessary that we should enter upon any details connected with these points. They have ceased to have a permanent interest. Nor is it essential that we should attempt any analysis of the defence of Sacheverel, which was conducted with great ability by Sir Simon Harcourt and four other counsel. Burnet has fairly stated their course of argument. "They very truly acknowledged the lawfulness of resistance in extreme cases, and plainly justified the revolution, and our deliverance by King William. But they said it was not fit in a sermon to name such an exception; that the duties of morality ought to be delivered in their full extent, without supposing an extraordinary case; and therefore Sacherevel had followed precedents, set by our greatest divines, ever since the reformation, and ever since the revolution."* In his reply to Sir Simon Harcourt, the concessions made by the counsel for Sacheverel were received by Sir Joseph Jekyll as the triumph of free principles: "My lords, the concessions are these, that necessity creates an exception to the general rule of submission to the prince; that such exception is understood or implied in the laws that require such submission; and that the case of the revolution was a case of necessity. These are concessions so ample, and do so fully answer the drift of the Commons in this article, and are to the utmost extent of their meaning in it, that I cannot forbear congratulating them upon this success of their impeachment; that in full parliament this erroneous doctrine of non-resistance is given up and disclaimed. And may it not, in after ages, be an addition to the glories of this bright reign, that so many of those who are honored with being in her majesty's service have been, at your lordships' bar, thus successfully contending for the national rights of her people, and proving they are not precarious or remediless."

After very animated debates in the House of Lords, sixty-nine peers voted Dr. Sacheverel guilty of the high crimes and misdemeanors charged on him by the impeachment of the House of Commons, and fifty-two found him not guilty. His sentence was, that he was enjoined not to preach during the term of three years, and that his two sermons should be burned by the common hangman. On the 21st of March Godolphin wrote to Marlborough: "Our sentence against Dr. Sacheverel is at last dwindled to a suspending him for three years from preaching, which question we carried but by six; and the second, which was for incapacitating him during that time to take any dignity or preferment in the Church, was lost by one; the numbers were sixty to fifty-nine. So all this bustle and fatigue ends in no more but a suspension of three years from the pulpit, and burning his sermons at the Royal Exchange."† Not altogether so, my lord treasurer. The Whigs will be driven from power; the queen will bestow her smiles upon those who would rest her title upon hereditary right; the managers of the impeachment have scorned to adopt the falsehood that the birth of the queen's brother was supposititious, and have therefore cut away the popular argument against his claim to the throne. But they have asserted the principles upon which the Act of Settlement rests. When the sober-thinking people of England shall have read in the report of this trial, circulated among them in numbers unparalleled, the manly arguments by which the rights of a nation to civil and religious freedom are upheld, they will turn from the exile of St. Germains who claims to rule upon the doctrine of passive obedience and non-resistance, and will think it fortunate that another house, with a parliamentary title, may continue the security which they have enjoyed under the revolution of 1689. We of the present time, when no one disputes the principles which the managers of the impeachment of Sacheverel upheld, have still to cherish their assertion, and to be grateful to their assertors. These principles have an enduring interest for us beyond their historical importance. They live and reign in our constitution. The great orator and temperate reformer, who has lived to see the full value of these principles, thus maintained them when the best victories of the people had been won—many of them by his own exertions. "The national resistance was not only, in point of historical fact, the cause of the revolutionary settlement, it was the main foundation of that settlement; the structure of the government was made to rest upon the people's right of resistance as upon its corner-stone; and it is of incalculable importance that this never should be lost sight of. But it is of equal importance that we should ever bear in mind how essential to the preservation of the constitution, thus established and secured, this principle of resistance is; how necessary both for the governors and the governed it ever must be to regard the recourse to that extremity as always possible—an extremity, no doubt, and to be cautiously embraced as such, but still a remedy within the people's reach; a protection to which they can and will resort as often as their rulers make such a recourse necessary for self-defence." *

The lenient sentence upon Sacheverel was received by his passionate adherents as a matter of national rejoicing. When the impeachment of the high-church doctor was resolved upon by the Commons, they also carried a resolution to address the queen "to bestow some dignity in the Church upon Mr. Benjamin Hoadley, rector of St. Peter's Poor, London, for having often justified the principles upon which her majesty and the nation proceeded in the late happy revolution." Her majesty never found the opportunity to comply with the desires of her faithful Commons. The reverend author of "The Measure of Obedience to the Civil Magistrate" was the type of low-church politics; and as the sermons of Sacheverel were burned by the hangman at the Royal Exchange, the treatises of Hoadley were burned by the mob at Exeter and Oxford. Bonfires and bell-ringing were universal. In some towns the health of Sacheverel was drunk with bended knees. At Cirencester an effigy of King William was carried upon a horse; the rider of straw was jerked off the steed's back, and then committed to the flames. Mr. Burgess, the dissenting preacher, was also burned with great solemnity by enthusiastic churchmen, who imitated, as much as was in their power, the patriots who had gutted his chapel in Lincoln's Inn-fields. But to the honor of the English rabble, in town or country, they had no taste for bloodshed, and a very national sense of fun. The Cirencester folk, who appear to have been most conspicuous in the demonstrations, had a cock-match, in which one cock was called Sacheverel, and the other Burgess. Unhappily, as is recorded, "the cock-match issued in their confusion; for, after a long and hard battle, Cock Burgess killed Cock Sacheverel."†

On the 18th of April there stood three men at the bar of the sessions-house, in the Old Bailey—Daniel Dammaree, a waterman; Francis Willis, a footman; and George Purchase, a sheriff's officer—against whom a bill of indictment had been found for high treason, in levying open war against her majesty. They were charged that they, with a great multitude of men, armed and arrayed in a warlike manner, with colors flying, swords, clubs, and other weapons, did, on the 1st of March, make war against our lady the queen. The evidence upon the trials of these men shows that they were principals in a riotous destruction, or attempted destruction, of meeting-houses. The Riot Act, by which such offences may be met as felony, without resorting to the law of constructive treason, was not in existence in 1710. It was passed in the first year of George I. Nevertheless, Blackstone holds that an insurrection, with an avowed design to pull down all inclosures, all brothels, and the like, is a levying of war, "the universality of the design making it a rebellion against the state, usurpation of the powers of government, and an insolent invasion of the king's authority." ‡ The attorney-general upon these trials averred that it was a general design to pull down all the meeting-houses. Lord Campbell severely blames these prosecutions for high treason, and very justly says, "No government would now direct such a prosecution to be instituted." In these trials all the judges agreed that the intention of the prisoners to pull down meeting-houses, and their partial destruction of several, was an overt act of levying war. This construction of the law, as we see, is still regarded as authority, and it has been cited in later cases. Lord

Campbell, who has the happiness to live in times when law and common-sense have more affinity, holds that in these prosecutions for high treason, "the Whigs showed the infatuation or dementation under which they were laboring." The dementation appears rather to have been in the Whig lawyers than in the Whig statesmen, if we may judge from the marvellous case which they got up, for a jury to try the most solemn issue known to English law. Two of the silly rioters were convicted, and were sentenced to the horrible penalties of high treason. But neither of them was executed; which, says Mr. Hallam, "might probably be owing to an opinion, which every one but a lawyer must have entertained, that their offence did not amount to treason." We are glad thus to premise that Dammaree and Purchase were reprieved, and afterward pardoned; for, in giving a sketch of these riots as a picture of society presenting some ludicrous aspects, it is well to know that no blood was shed by the fanatic multitude, and that no life was sacrificed to offended justice.

It is Wednesday, the 1st of March, when one Captain Edward Orrel, who seems to have been gifted with an almost preternatural curiosity to behold all that is going forward, first gazes upon the queen returning through the park from Westminster Hall, and is then attracted by a man dispersing bills about a prize-fighting. "I thought," says he, "they had been the common papers that are dispersed about such prizes, but I found it was about a prize between Sacheverel and Hoadley."* At Oliver's coffee-house he hears that the mob are gone from the Temple to Mr. Burgess's meeting near Lincoln's Inn-fields. "I will go up," cries the captain, "and see what is doing." There he saw pews pulled down, and a little man in the pulpit very busy in its destruction. In and out Orrel runs to watch how the work goes on; and the destructives take him, very naturally, for a spy. He flits about between Holborn and Lincoln's Inn-fields; for in both places fires are lighted, and pews and pulpits are burning. In Lincoln's Inn-fields the fun is fast and furious. Dammaree is there—the waterman, "in the queen's livery, and with his badge." The soldier immortalized by Goldsmith, who exclaims with a fervor of blasphemy that our religion would be utterly undone if the French should come over, is but a feeble copy of the queen's pious waterman. The mob are in council. The cheers of Dammaree are heard above every other voice. "I'll lead you on, boys; huzza! High Church and Sacheverel! G—— damn them all; we will have them all down." He pulls off his wig, and shouts, and superintends the burning of a bedstead, and is "mightily rejoiced." It would have been more than cruel to have hanged Dammaree; for he had capital witnesses in his defence, especially two young ladies, who had been at the fire in Lincoln's Inn-fields. The fire was burned to a coal when they were going home, and meeting with Dammaree, one of them exclaimed, "Lord bless me! here is one of the queen's watermen." "What have you to say to the queen's waterman?" quoth he. "Nothing, but God bless the queen, and her waterman too." "You are a jolly girl, and I will kiss you," cries honest Dammaree. Queen Anne must certainly have read this evidence, when she very quickly promoted her orthodox servant to be the master of her own barge, after he had escaped the peril of the hurdle to Tyburn.

If drunken Dammaree were not the exact type of a leader who "falsely, unlawfully, devilishly, and traitorously, did compass, imagine, and intend open war, insurrection and rebellion," what shall we say to Francis Willis, the doughty footman, levying war? He lives with a lady in Greville Street, who has a laudable curiosity to know how the bonfires are going on in Holborn and Hatton Garden; and she sends her man Frank to learn all about it. Frank stays out till midnight; and, if the witnesses are to be believed, makes good use of his time. He is the only traitor against whom the terms of the indictment apply, that the rebels were "armed and arrayed in a warlike manner, that is to say, with colors flying." Willis is the one standard-bearer. The attorney-general asks a witness whether any colors were carried before the assembly of five or six hundred people. "Yes, there was a curtain, and he that carried it cried, High Church standard! He stopped many coaches, and got money from them, and made them cry, High Church. He brought the curtain from Mr. Bradbury's meeting in Fetter Lane." The transformation of this rag of dissent into the banner of orthodoxy was a feat of military genius that can scarcely be equalled. It was intuitive in simple Frank, who told his mistress, in excuse for his staying out so long, that "he never saw a mob in London before." The bold footman escaped, for the witnesses were puzzled between one captain of the bonfire-makers in green livery and red buttons, and another captain in blue livery and black buttons.

George Purchase had been a soldier, and had seen service abroad, in the third troop of guards. He is now a sheriff's officer, and he begins his professional day on the first of March by taking a man at nine o'clock in the morning. But Dr. Sacheverel stops all regular occupation; and so, when the bailiff has dined with a follower in Chancery Lane they say, "Here is a sad noise and rout; no business is to be done; let us sit and smoke a pipe." After two hours of repose Purchase adjourns to a brandy-shop in Long Acre, the drawer of which place of resort accounts for the deeds of the ex-guardsman up to a late hour of the night. "My master gave him a business to dun a gentleman; and then they went to the Horseshoe tavern, and staid there till eight; then he came back again, and drank with us, and was very drunk." He is sent for, late as the hour is, to assist a brother officer to execute a writ; but he is too fuddled "to go about business." The mob is up in Drury Lane, and the two friends go forth. The discreet brother-bailiff gets into a chair to go home; for, as he tells the court, "I am not a man that engage myself in mobs, for those of my employment generally suffer in mobs." Purchase has no fear of anything. He has lived with those who "swore terribly in Flanders." The guards have arrived about half past eleven, at the arch in Lincoln's Inn-fields. The mob are pulling down a meeting-house in Drury Lane, and the captain of the guards gives orders to his men to disperse them. The bold bailiff is, "with his sword drawn, hallooing and flourishing his sword in the middle of the street, just by the kennel in Drury Lane, and fronting the guards." Captain Orrel is the ubiquitous witness: "Says I to him, do you know what you do in opposing the guards? You oppose the queen's person. Says he, G—— damn you, are you against Sacheverel? I am for High Church. I will be for High Church and Sacheverel. I will lose my life in the cause." Drunken Purchase then strikes at an officer with his sword, but his sword is beaten down, and he hides behind a bulk. That forbearance which has on most occasions of riot marked the behavior of the British soldier to his fellow-citizens was conspicuous on this occasion. The officer that was struck at merely said, "You are mad—you are distracted; go home to your lodgings." The jury found a special verdict that George Purchase, at the bonfire made by the mob in Drury Lane, of the seats and pulpit of the meeting-house, "came there, and with his sword drawn did then defend the said people, and did greatly encourage them to burn the materials of the said house." They also find him guilty as to his assault upon the captain of the guards. But they return no general verdict of guilty of high treason, leaving that to the determination of the judges. They add "that the general cry of the people aforesaid, while they rifled the meeting-houses and burned the materials of the same, was, universally, High Church and Sacheverel."

This, then, was the expression of that public opinion which Swift says convinced her majesty of the dispositions of her people in favor of the Church, and against the measures of those in her service. Vast exertions were made throughout the country to get up addresses to the queen, "in which the absolute power of our princes was asserted, and all resistance was condemned, under the designation of anti-monarchical and republican principles."* Defoe, in his "Review," asks a question, somewhat difficult of answer: "Would any man that had seen the temper of this people, in the time of the late King James, believe it possible, without a judicial infatuation, that the same people should reassume their blindness, and rise up again for bondage?" The parliament was prorogued on the 5th of April, with the expression of this sentiment by the queen: "I could heartily wish that men would study to be quiet, and do their own business, rather than busy themselves in reviving questions and disputes of a very high nature, and which must be with an ill-intention, since they can only tend to foment, but not to heal, our divisions and animosities." The symptoms of a great change were manifest, whatever was the official tone of the royal speech. Doctor Sacheveral, early in the summer, went upon what is called his progress. This puppet of faction had been rewarded by a presentation of a living in Wales, and his progress was ostensibly to take possession of his benefice. According to one set of authorities, "nobility, gentry, clergy, and people vied in their demonstrations of joy and exultation; cavalcades escorted him from town to town and from village to village; the roads were lined, the hedges covered with spectators; steeples were illuminated, and sumptuous feasts prepared in every quarter for the triumphant guest." * There is another mode of viewing the same circumstances: "Wherever he went, his emissaries were sent before with his pictures; pompous entertainments were made for him, and a mixed multitude of country singers, fiddlers, priests and sextons, and a mob of all conditions, male and female, crowded together to meet and congratulate him; among whom drunkenness, darkness, and a furious zeal for religion extinguished all regard to modesty." † So, even in the medals issued in commemoration of the great trial, there were two sets of opinion to be propitiated. The medal for the Tories had the head of the doctor, with the inscription "H. Sach., D.D.," with the reverse a mitre, and the legend "Is firm to thee." The medal for the Whigs had the same head of Sacheverel, with the same legend on the reverse, accompanying the head of the pope.

The Duchess of Marlborough has left a characteristic description of Sacheverel, with which we may dismiss the man to the oblivion, as far as his own merits are concerned, which, sooner or later, is the fate of every charlatan: "He had a haughty, insolent air, which his friends found occasion often to complain of; but it made his presence more graceful in public. His person was framed well for the purpose, and he dressed well. A good assurance, clean gloves, a white handkerchief well-managed, with other suitable accomplishments, moved the hearts of many at his appearance; and the solemnity of a trial added much to a pity and concern, which had nothing in reason or justice to support them. The weaker part of the ladies were more like mad or bewitched than like persons in their senses. . . . Everybody knows that he was afterward sent about several counties, where, with his usual grace, he received as his due the homage and adoration of multitudes; never thinking that respect enough was paid to his great merit, using some of his friends insolently, and raising mobs against his enemies, and giving ample proof of how great meanness the bulk of mankind is capable, putting on the air of a saint upon a lewd, drunken, pampered man; dispersing his blessings to all his worshippers, and his kisses to some; taking their good money as fast as it could be brought in; drinking their best wines, eating of their best provisions without reserve and without temperance. And, what completed the farce, complaining in the midst of this scene of luxury and triumph, as the old fat monk did over a hot venison pasty, in his barbarous Latin, 'Heu, quanta patimus pro ecclesiâ!' Oh, what dreadful things do we undergo for the sake of the Church!"

CHAPTER CXLI.

Conferences at Gertruydenberg—Negotiations for peace broken off—Despotism and limited monarchy—The Whigs dismissed from office—New parliament—Duchess of Marlborough dismissed from her offices—Disasters in Spain—Surrender of General Stanhope—Hostility to Marlborough—Party use of the press—Swift, the great party writer—Property qualification for members of parliament—Harley stabbed by Guiscard—Marlborough's last campaign—Parliament—Prospect of peace—The ministry defeated in the House of Lords—Marlborough dismissed from all his offices—New peers created—Negotiations at Utrecht—Note to chapter xxiv.—Table of treaties.

The negotiations for peace which were broken off in 1709 were renewed in 1710. Conferences were opened at Gertruydenberg. Each of the allied powers was endeavoring to gain some peculiar advantage; but all eventually concurred in pressing upon Louis the one humiliating condition which he had rejected in the previous year—namely, that he should assist in dethroning his grandson. Lord Chancellor Cowper seems to have stood alone among the British ministry in having no confidence of a peace, and to have offended his colleagues in doubting whether "France was reduced so low as to accept such conditions." * Marlborough was the representative of England at these conferences; and he took the course which the selfish man ordinarily thinks the safest and most profitable. He was "white paper," he said, upon which the cabinet might write their instructions, but he would not have the responsibility of giving advice. The negotiations were broken off; and the great general has the invariable resource of another season of battles and sieges: "I hope God will be pleased to bless this campaign," he writes to the duchess, "for I see nothing else that can give us peace, either at home or abroad." † He believed that another Oudenarde or another Malplaquet would have quieted the popular ferment about Sacheverel, and have disposed the queen to have confidence in her Whig advisers. "Yet," he says, "I have never, during this war, gone into the war with so heavy a heart as I do at this time. . . . The present humors in England give me a good deal of trouble." Louis le Grand was also troubled at this precise juncture; but his trouble had no relation to the bellowings of the hydra-headed monster. Saint Simon tells us that the exhaustion of the realm and the impossibility of obtaining peace had caused the king severe anguish. He really doubted whether it was right to consummate all the schemes of taxation proposed by his ministers, by taking at once the tenth of every man's substance. He was at last relieved of his scruples, when he had unbosomed himself to the Père Tellier. The considerate ecclesiastic required a few days to reflect upon the reasonableness of the king's hesitation, but finally restored his majesty to his wonted tranquillity by informing him that, having consulted the ablest doctors of the Sorbonne, they had decided that all the wealth of the nation was the king's, and that when the king took it from his subjects he only took what belonged to himself.

The ways of despotism have a fascinating simplicity for some minds, even in our own day. Here is the magnificent Louis, the Jupiter of Versailles, approaching mere mortals in having a slight qualm of conscience, but is quickly the godhead again, when he knows that all of France is his. The edict for the tax was issued; the thought of peace was again postponed; the armies of France again took the field with new strength. The workings of the machine of a limited monarchy are far more complicated and unintelligible than the caprices of absolute power. Marshal Villars, at the end of May, came with a great army to the relief of Douay, which was invested by the allies under Marlborough and Eugene. The general of the absolute king and the general of the limited monarchy are face to face. Villars is commanded to do a certain work—and he has but one course to take—he has one master to serve. Marlborough has the terror of parliamentary critics and of unscrupulous office-seekers, to make him groan under his responsibilities. On the 26th of May he writes to Godolphin, "I am this day threescore; but I thank God I find myself in so good health that I hope to end this campaign without being sensible of the inconveniences of old age." ‡ On the 12th he writes again to the treasurer, "I can't say that I have the same sanguine prophetic spirit I did use to have; for in all the former actions I did never doubt of success, we having had constantly the great blessing of being of one mind. I cannot say it is so now; for I fear some are run so far into villainous faction that it would give them more content to see us beaten." § Douay was surrendered to the allies. But Marlborough now has no pleasure in success. "I must drudge," he writes to the duchess, "for four or five months longer, and venture my life for those who do not deserve it from me." The allusion is evidently to the queen. Mrs. Morley had entirely given up Mrs. Freeman. Their sweet eternal friendship has become the bitterest hate. They parted, with these last words from the haughty duchess to her sovereign: "I am confident you will suffer in this world or the next for so much inhumanity." While Marlborough was before Douay this pleasant information reached him. The next blow was the news that his son-in-law, Lord Sunderland, had been dismissed from his office of secretary of state, the seals being given to Lord Dartmouth. The most influential of the Whigs, still retaining office, wrote an earnest letter to Marlborough, in which they urged him not to let his private mortification interfere with his public duty: "We conjure you by the glory you have already obtained, by the many services you have done your queen and country, by the expectation you have justly raised in all Europe, and by all that is dear and tender to you at home, whose chief dependence is upon your success, that you would not leave this great work unfinished, but continue at the head of the army." Cowper, Godolphin, Somers, Newcastle, Devonshire, Orford, Halifax, and Boyle, who signed this letter, had probably no very strong apprehension that their own fall was so near at hand. The ascendency of Mrs. Masham and the manœuvres of Harley were triumphant. Godolphin was first dismissed, and his office was put in commission. Harley was then made chancellor of the exchequer. The queen announced to the council that it was her pleasure there should be a dissolution of parliament. The Whigs were all thrust from power. There ensued four years of party contests, and of strange measures growing out of them, which must have been perplexing enough to all the honest, industrious, and quiet portion of the community; but which, to those who attempt to trace the secret springs of these political agitations, offer cause for thankfulness as well as wonder that we escaped without a convulsion into comparative safety and tranquillity. Swift says that Queen Anne "did appear, upon all occasions, as desirous of preserving reputation with posterity as might justly become a great prince to be," and that he proposed to accept the offer of historiographer "to write her majesty's reign," and especially desired to be furnished with materials for writing an account of "that great transaction," the change in the ministry. He thought that, in the next reign, incorrect views would be taken of the queen's proceedings: "For instance, what would be more easy to a malicious pen than to charge the queen with inconstancy, weakness, and ingratitude, in removing and disgracing the Duke of Marlborough, who had so many years commanded her armies with victory and success; in displacing so many great officers of her court and kingdom, by whose counsels she had, in all appearance, so prosperously governed; in extending the marks of her severity and displeasure toward the wife and daughters, as well as the relations and allies, of that person she had so long employed and so highly trusted; and all this by the private intrigues of a woman of her bedchamber, in concert with an artful man, who might be supposed to have acted that bold part only from a motive of revenge upon the loss of his employments, or of ambition to come again into power?" * What, indeed, could be easier than to assume all this from the patent facts! What, indeed, could be more difficult than to overturn these assumptions by the subsequent disclosures of a century and a half! The revelations of what is called secret history are not such as materially to change these views. We doubt whether our readers will care to follow the political schemers into all their holes and corners. "The private intrigues of the woman of the bedchamber" have little interest for us now beyond the fact that we have arrived at that happier condition when public opinion has a direct influence upon courts and cabinets, and when the days of back-stairs councils are at an end.

The campaign of Marlborough in 1710 had no effect upon the state of affairs at home. There was no brilliant success to justify the war policy of the Whigs. The parliament was dissolved on the 26th of September. "The practice and violence used in elections," says Burnet, "went far beyond anything I had ever known in England." He attributes the Tory preponderance to the efforts of the clergy: "Besides a course for some months of inflaming sermons, they went about from house to house, pressing their people to show, on this great occasion, their zeal for the Church, and now or never to save it." † Extraordinary efforts were made to prevent the election of the managers of the Sacheverel impeachment; but Jekyll, King, Lechmere, and Walpole were returned. In 1734 Walpole, in his speech upon the Septennial Bill, looks back upon this time of agitation with painful recollections: "That there are ferments often raised among the people without any just cause is what I am surprised to hear controverted, since very late experience may convince us of the contrary. Do not we know what a ferment was raised in the nation toward the latter end of the late queen's reign? And it is well known what a fatal change in the affairs of this nation was introduced, or at least confirmed, by an election coming on while the nation was in this ferment." * The new parliament assembled on the 25th of November. There was as great a change in the language which the queen addressed to the "Lords and gentlemen" as in the composition of the House of Commons. The usual topic of congratulation for the conduct of the war in Flanders was no more to be adverted to, although the campaign had been successful in holding France in check, in spite of the vast efforts that had been made to recover her lost ground. The queen announced her determination "to support and encourage the Church of England as by law established;" but the dissenters had to hear the revival of the term which was so offensive to them—the term which implied that all they held of spiritual freedom was conceded as a favor, and not as a right: "I am resolved to maintain the indulgence by law allowed to scrupulous consciences." Her majesty had adopted the language of Sacheverel in substituting "indulgence" for "toleration." Marlborough returned to London in December. The queen took care to inform him that it was no accidental omission that no vote had been proposed in either house for his services in the campaign. While expressing her desire that the duke should continue to serve her, she also said, "I must request you would not suffer any vote of thanks to you to be moved in parliament this year, because my ministers will certainly oppose it." Harley, and especially St. John, had made up their minds to humiliate him whom they called "the great man." He had to endure indignities from those he had been accustomed to command. St. John writes a private letter to his friend Drummond, in which he exults at the duke's abasement. The queen, he says, and her advisers wished that Marlborough should command the army, and that he should have everything which as a general he could expect; but "he has been told that he must draw a line between all that is passed and all that is to come, and that he must begin entirely upon a new foot; that if he looked back to make complaints, he would have more retorted upon him than it was possible to answer. . . . What is the effect of all this plain dealing? He submits, he yields, he promises to comply." † Swift says of Marlborough, "We are not to take the height of his ambition from his soliciting to be general for life. I am persuaded his chief motive was the pay and perquisites by continuing the war; and he had then no intentions of settling the crown in his family." Marlborough was at the summit of royal favor and of popular applause when he asked to be general for life, and was very properly refused. Could Swift be serious in thus covertly imputing to the duke that he was aiming at the crown at any time, and especially at the time of his declining popularity? And yet St. John insinuates the same thing, in another letter to Drummond, who was in Holland: "I dare say he is convinced by this time that he cannot lead either his mistress or any one else as he used to do. We shall send him over a subject. Take care you do not put royalty into his head." This notion continued to be a real or an affected belief of St. John, when, in 1713, upon the performance of Addison's "Cato," "he called Booth to his box, and gave him fifty guineas for defending the cause of liberty so well against a perpetual dictator;" ‡ or, as the story is told by Spence, "for so well representing the character of a person who rather chose to die than see a general for life." §

There is something still more bitter for the great conqueror to endure than the loss of political influence. "He was told," says St John, "that his true interest consisted of getting rid of his wife, who was grown to be irreconcilable with the queen, as soon as he could, and with the best grace which he could." In the royal closet, on the 17th of January, there is a scene which tells us of something more pitiable even than the "last scene of all," when

"From Marlborough's eyes the tears of dotage flow."

He presented to the queen a humble letter from the duchess, expressing her apprehension that her lord could not live six months, if some end was not put to his sufferings on her account. "I really am very sorry that I ever did anything that was uneasy to your majesty." The duke them implored her majesty not to renounce the duchess; not to discharge her from the great office she held. "I cannot change my resolution," said the queen. Again he entreated. "Let the key be sent me within three days." The victor of Blenheim is now on his knees imploring for a respite of ten days. Monmouth praying for his life to James was not more earnest and more abased. "Send me the key in two days," cried the inexorable queen. The duchess had more spirit than her lord, and the key was sent the next day. "When the duke told her the queen expected the gold key, she took it from her side, and threw it into the middle of the room, and bid him take it up and carry it to whom he pleased."* Her office of lady of the wardrobe was bestowed upon the Duchess of Somerset: that of keeper of the privy purse upon Mrs. Masham. The haughty Sarah was turned out of her apartments in the palace. We almost blush to record the mode in which the duchess is revenged upon the queen. "She ordered the locks, placed on the doors at her expense, to be taken off, and the marble chimney-pieces to be removed."† The counter-revenge of the royal mistress winds up this story of the degradation of greatness: "The queen is so angry that she says she will build no house for the Duke of Marlborough, when the duchess has pulled hers to pieces, taken away the very slabs out of the chimneys, thrown away the keys, and said they might buy more for ten shillings."‡ The "house for the Duke of Marlborough" was to be the reward of his services to the nation.

At the beginning of the new year, 1711, the queen sent a message to parliament, stating that "her majesty having received notice that there has been an action in Spain, very much to the disadvantage of King Charles' affairs, which having fallen particularly on the British forces, the queen immediately gave directions for sending and procuring troops to repair this loss." Never was a victory more opportune to a government than was this defeat to the ministry of Harley and Bolingbroke. The defeated commander of the British forces was General Stanhope, who, having signalized himself by his eloquence in the impeachment of Sacheverel, had returned to his command in Catalonia, with large reinforcements and an ample supply of money. He induced Charles once more to put himself at the head of an army, and to meet his rival Philip in the field. Charles and his general, Staremberg, appear to have been very unwilling to fight, and it required all Stanhope's determination to induce them to hazard an attack. The battle of Almenara, on the 27th of July, was a victory for the allied forces, and it was followed up by other successes. On the 20th of August another battle was fought under the walls of Saragossa. The allies were here signally victorious, and the often repeated wish of Stanhope was realized, that there might come "a day to retrieve Almanza."§ Charles made good use of the victory by announcing to the Saragossans the restoration of the peculiar rights of the people of Arragon—a measure which had upheld his cause in Catalonia under every disaster. Philip, after his defeat, had returned to Madrid, to which capital he was ever welcome, whether a conqueror or a fugitive. But he again quitted his faithful city, for Stanhope had induced Charles to march again into Castile. The vanguard of the allies entered Madrid on the 21st of September, and when Charles made his public entry shortly after he found the streets empty and the houses shut up. He immediately left in deep indignation, exclaiming, "This city is a desert." Stanhope wrote home, "The country is our enemy, and we are masters in Castile of no more ground than we encamp on." The allies lingered at Madrid till the beginning of November, waiting for reinforcements from Portugal, which never came. Meanwhile the Duke of Vendôme had arrived to take the command of the army of King Philip. The Castilians were enthusiastic in furnishing the means of organizing a powerful force, and he soon marched to the Tagus to prevent the possible junction of the Portuguese with the other portions of the allied army. Charles now determined to return himself to Catalonia, with an escort of two thousand horse. The allies, thus weakened in an important arm—their commanders differing in opinion—at last began to retreat to Arragon, at the beginning of December. The country was so destitute of supplies, chiefly through the hostility of the people, that the army was divided into three separate bodies, English, Germans, Spaniards and Portuguese, each taking different lines of march. On the day when the allies were thus compelled to abandon that concentration which was their safety, Philip and Vendôme entered Madrid in triumph. But the energetic Frenchman lost no time in festivities and ceremonials. He, with the king, joined the Spanish army, which had been returning along the Tagus by forced marches; and crossing the bridge at Guadalaxara with his infantry, and swimming the river with his cavalry, came up with the British portion of the allies. Stanhope was posted at Brihuega, a small town on the river Taguna. The English general had been watching the movements of some partisan cavalry on the hills, and was confiding in his belief that the Spanish infantry was not within some days' march of him. As he afterward learned, the army decamped from Talavera on the 1st of December; and they reached Brihuega on the 8th, a distance of "forty-five long leagues;" and such was the disposition of the population that the allies had not the slightest intimation of the approach of the thousands of cavalry and infantry that Stanhope had now to fight single-handed. He did his best. He threw up barricades and intrenchments in the town, and made the old Moorish wall which surrounded it a formidable defence. Through the next day the British fought with desperation against forces of four times their number. At seven in the evening their ammunition was nearly exhausted, and Stanhope then asked and obtained honorable terms of capitulation. Speaking in the highest terms of his brave men, he wrote to the secretary of state, "Whatever other things I may have failed in through ignorance, I am truly conscious to myself that, in the condition we were reduced to, I could not do a better service to the queen than endeavor to preserve them by the only way that was left."* General Stanhope, his officers, and his men, remained prisoners in Spain till a little time before the peace of Utrecht. The next day, the 10th of December, a great battle was fought at Villa Viciosa by Vendôme with the other portions of the allied army under Staremberg. The fortunes of the combatants were long doubtful; the losses of each were very great. But Staremberg had no resource but a retreat, which he commenced toward Arragon, the next day, before sunrise. He was harassed and followed by partisan cavalry; sustained severe losses; was unable to defend Saragossa, where Philip established his court; and finally reached Barcelona, with forces dwindled to half their number before the battle of the 10th. The cause of King Charles in Spain was henceforth hopeless.

The news of the disasters in Spain was received by the triumphant party in parliament in the way that the baseness of faction, whether Tory or Whig, has too often applied itself, not to the regress of a national calamity, but to derive advantages of party out of the calamity. The Lords, now having a majority of the partisans of the ministry, told the queen, in answer to her message, "as this misfortune may have been occasioned by some previous mismanagement, we take the liberty to assure your majesty we will use our utmost endeavors to discover it, so as to prevent the like for the future." They entered into an examination of the whole history of the war, going not only back to the battle of Almanza, but to the time of the early exploits of Peterborough. Lord Galway and Lord Tyrawley were placed at the bar to give an account of affairs long since passed. Marlborough said, "It was somewhat strange that generals who had acted to the best of their understandings, and had lost their limbs in the service, should be examined like offenders, about insignificant things." The Lords carried a vote that "the late ministers were justly to be blamed, for contributing to all our disasters in Spain;" and the thanks of the house were given to the Earl of Peterborough for his great and eminent services. The party object of the just commendation of Peterborough was sufficiently marked by the terms in which the lord chancellor, Harcourt, delivered the thanks of the house: "Such is your lordship's known generosity and truly noble temper, that I assure myself the present I am now offering to your lordship is the more acceptable as it comes pure and unmixed, and is unattended with any other reward, which your lordship might justly think might be an alloy to it." Swift's famous "Examiner" of the previous 23d of November was to be echoed from the woolsack, to give a new sting to the sarcasms of the coffee-houses. There was a general by whom "pure and unmixed" praise, without "any other reward," would have been counted as dust in the balance. The bitter satirist of the "Examiner" says, "the common clamor of tongues and pens for some months past has run against the baseness, the inconstancy, and ingratitude of the whole kingdom to the Duke of Marlborough;" and he then states an account, "to convince the world that we are not quite so ungrateful either as the Greeks or the Romans; and in order to adjust the matter with all fairness I shall confine myself to the latter, who were much more generous of the two." Here is the account; and we may easily believe the effect it would produce among grumbling Englishmen:

The ministers of state who, from the time when the influence of opinion was thought of importance to the one object of gaining or holding power, have directly associated themselves with public writers, have generally made mistakes in the choice of their literary allies. The authors of real knowledge and ability have been too proud to become the tools of a government, when the association has been considered to be that of the superior with the inferior. The hacks only would take the great man's pay; and, doing his work as hirelings, would earn for themselves and their employers a fitting measure of general contempt. Not so was the connection of Harley and St. John with the great apostate, the Reverend Jonathan Swift—of all party writers that ever really influenced public opinion the most unscrupulous, the most unjust, the most uncharitable; but incomparably the most able. He is not the mere rhetorician who desires to manifest his own cleverness. Apparently he is the simplest of advocates, speaking nothing but his own earnest convictions, and employing no weapon but the severest logic. He has no tricks of fence to exhibit the skill that can disarm an adversary when he pleases. He does disarm him at once; beats him down; strikes the poisoned dagger into his heart, without the slightest compunction. Against such a combatant the genial frankness of Steele, the amiable decorum of Addison, had no chance. The Tories secured the Vicar of Laracor, when he came up to London, at the beginning of September, 1710, deputed by the Irish primate and clergy to obtain a remission of the first-fruits of livings, as in the case of the English Church. He cherished bitter resentment against the Whigs for not having given him any valuable preferment. "The Whigs were ravished to see me, and would lay hold of me as a twig while they are drowning, and the great men making me their clumsy apologies."* He has not yet quite separated himself from his old friends. He dines in company with Addison and Steele. He writes a paper for the "Tatler." He is entertained by Halifax, but refuses to drink a toast proposed by him, "The Resurrection of the Whigs," unless he would add "their reformation." On the 7th of October he dines with Harley, drinking good wine for two hours, and for two hours they were alone; and the great minister charged the great satirist to come to him often, for his levee was not a place for friends to come to. Still he keeps up his old intimacy with Steele and Addison for a week or two; but at length he finds party had so possessed Mr. Addison "that he talked as if he suspected me." Swift professed a desire to use his new Tory intimacies to retain Steele in one of his employments, he having been turned out of his place of gazetteer for writing a "Tatler" against Mr. Harley some months ago. Mr. Harley does not approve of satire when it is directed against himself. We turn to the "Tatler," No. 191, which lost Steele his place when the Tories came in, and we find it a very mild satire indeed, describing "a cunning man" under the name of Polypragmon, who "fears the imputation of want of understanding much more than the abuse of it;" having "the monstrous affectation of being thought artful." The description of Polypragmon is evidently copied from the life, and most persons probably knew the portraiture: "It is certain Polypragmon does all the ill he possibly can, but pretends to much more than he performs. He is contented in his own thoughts, and hugs himself in his closet, that though he is locked up there and doing nothing, the world does not know but that he is doing mischief. To favor this suspicion he gives half-looks and shrugs in his general behavior, to give you to understand that you don't know what he means. He is also wonderfully adverbial in his expressions, and breaks off with a perhaps and a nod of the head upon matters of the most indifferent nature." A wise man would have laughed at the satire, and not have taken a miserable revenge. Swift was not one who would be content to wound in this delicate way. Nor would he be won over by small bribes. The treasurer and the secretary have found out his weak side: "It is hard to see these great men use me like one who was their betters, and the puppies with you in Ireland hardly regarding me."* Harley, a man of second-rate capacity; St. John, a man of high talent, but one who possessed his faculties chiefly as the instruments of his ambition, made Swift their tool by deference to his intellectual greatness. The pride of intellect is a higher thing than the pride of birth, far higher than the pride of wealth; but it is a pride that, ill-regulated, degenerates into tyranny and uncharitableness. It did not prevent Swift from going all lengths in doing what was really dirty work, that any of the pamphleteers at whom he sneers as Grub Street would have done for a lower price than he set on his services. A bishopric in prospect was a grander thing than an immediate fee of secret-service money. To be so paid was degrading. Another sort of price was a just reward of merit. Harley, in spite of his blandishments and his dinners, mortally offended Swift by offering him fifty pounds; and then Swift said, "If we let these great ministers pretend too much, there will be no governing them."† Swift had sold himself in spite of his pride. In a few weeks after his first coquetting with "these great ministers," the "Examiner," the literary organ of St. John and Harley, is handed over to his conduct; and one of the first uses of his new weapon is the savage attack upon Marlborough. Of real principle in his junction with the Tory ministers there was as little as there was any real love for religion in their exuberant zeal for the Church.

The session of 1711 was remarkable for the passing of a statute which, having continued as law for a hundred and fifty-seven years, was swept away by a brief act of repeal in 1858. The Tory ministry desired to propitiate what was called the country party by bringing in a bill by which every knight of the shire was to have the property qualification of a real estate of six hundred a year, and every member for a borough a similar qualification of half the value. The wealth and influence of that large portion of the community employed in liberal professions and in commerce were rapidly increasing. The landowners and agriculturists had not yet discovered that capital applied to improvements in cultivation might yield as large a profit as capital applied to the extension of trade. The landed interest would not bestir itself for its own advantage, and it opened its half-shut eyes to gaze with envy and dislike upon the mercantile interest that was up and doing. Burnet says of the Qualification Bill, "Our gentry was become so ignorant and so corrupt that many apprehended the ill effects of this, and that the interest of trade, which indeed supports that of the land, would neither be understood nor regarded. But the new minister resolved to be popular with those who promoted it, so it passed." Like all other expedients for setting the interests of one class above those of another class, this measure for making the land paramount was defeated in practice by fabricated qualifications at which all parties connived; and it was finally repealed as utterly useless for good or evil, beyond the encouragement of a debasing system of chicanery.

Harley labored hard to please "the country gentlemen of his party ;"* but, as the case has ever been, an English minister has more difficulty with his violent supporters than with those who are thoroughly adverse to him. "In the House of Commons there appeared a new combination of Tories of the highest form, who thought the court was yet in some management with the Whigs, and did not come up to their height, which they imputed to Mr. Harley ; so they began to form themselves in opposition to him."† Lord Nottingham, at a conference with the ministers, which is recorded by Lord Dartmouth, the secretary of state, urged them to prosecute the Whigs, so as "to make it impracticable for them ever to rise again." They said "the queen would never be brought into such measures," and from that day Nottingham "was most indefatigable in persecuting the queen and all her servants with all the art that he was master of."‡ Swift saw the storm coming : "The ministry is upon a very narrow bottom, and stands like an isthmus between the Whigs on one side and violent Tories on the other. They are able seamen, but the tempest is too great, the ship too rotten, and the crew all against them." This keen looker-on upon the game in which he had sometimes to fag for the upper boys, wrote, on the 14th of March, the above dolorous comment upon the low spirits which Harley displayed. Four days after an event occurred which changed the face of affairs as regarded Harley. "An odd accident, that had been almost fatal, proved happy to him."§ On the 8th of March he was stabbed at a sitting of the privy council. The assassin, whom Swift calls "a desperate French popish villain," conferred such a benefit upon Harley that the partisans of his rival St. John insisted that the blow was meant for the secretary and not for the chancellor of the exchequer. The minister who had to bear the pain had a fair right to whatever compensations were to follow. But it seems somewhat unreasonable that the random stroke of a suspected traitor should have made Mr. Harley Earl of Oxford and lord high treasurer ; and, to use the words of a historian of these times, should have "blasted the hopes of his ministerial rivals, fixed his presidency in the cabinet, and have given firmness to an administration which had been tottering from inherent jealousies and dissensions."‖ The accident which produced such results may be briefly related. The Marquis de Guiscard, who had been an abbé séculier in France, and who is represented as having committed enormous crimes which compelled him to fly his country, came to England, and appears to have had a command in an expedition, in 1707, connected with the discontents of the Huguenots in the Cévennes. In a book which he then published he calls himself "lieutenant-general of the forces gone upon the present descent." Burnet says, "He had a pension assigned him for some years, but it did not answer his expense ; so when he was out of hope of getting it increased he wrote to one at the court of France, to offer his services there."¶ His services consisted in his acting as a French spy. Dartmouth relates that Guiscard had been with the queen on the evening of the 7th, "and nobody in the outer room but Mrs. Fielding, or within call but Mrs. Kirk, who was commonly asleep." He says, "If Guiscard had any design upon the queen his heart failed him." Very mysterious it seems that such a person should have had access to the queen, although he was one of St. John's boon companions. Her majesty told Dartmouth that "he was very pressing for an augmentation of his pension, and complained that he was ill paid." He was arrested in St. James's Park on the morning of the 8th ; for a letter which he had written having been opened at the post-office, his communications with the French court were discovered. He was taken to the office where the council were sitting ; and having given up his sword he contrived to secrete a penknife which was upon the table of an outer room. Dartmouth, who was present, says, "He behaved himself with great confidence before the council, and denied everything, till he was shown one of his own letters, which he endeavored to snatch out of Lord Harcourt's hand." He asked to speak in private with St. John, who very wisely refused. "When," says Dartmouth, "Mr. St. John refused to speak with him, he bent down, as if he would have whispered with Mr. Harley, and gave him two or three violent blows upon the breast before anybody could stop him." Harley, bleeding, rose up, and St. John and the other counsellors drew their swords, and inflicted many wounds upon the assassin. Swift, in his Journal of the 17th, writes, "Guiscard died this morning at two, and the coroner's inquest have found that he was killed by bruises received from a messenger, so to clear the cabinet counsellors, from whom he received his wounds." What a sight was there now to be seen in London, where, of old, "not a holiday fool there but would give a piece of silver" to gaze upon any strange beast. "When they will not give a doit to relieve a lame beggar, they will lay out ten to see a dead Indian."* How much more exciting to see a dead French papist, who was killed by noble English Protestants ! "We have let Guiscard be buried at last, after showing him pickled in a trough this fortnight for twopence apiece ; and the fellow that showed would point to his body, and 'See gentlemen, this is the wound that was given him by his grace the Duke of Ormond ; and this is the wound, etc.,' and then the show was over, and another set of rabble came in."† Both houses went up with an address to the queen, to express how deeply they were affected "to find such an instance of inveterate malice against one employed in your majesty's council, and so near your royal person ; and we have reason to believe that his fidelity to your majesty and zeal for your service have drawn upon him the hatred of all the abettors of popery and faction." Harley slowly recovered. When he attended in his place on the 11th of March the speaker congratulated him upon his escape and restoration to health. His attempted assassination was an undeniable evidence of his extraordinary merits. This was party logic, very agreeable to Harley, but not equally gratifying to one who had a lurking contempt for his fortunate brother in office. "Mr. St. John affected to say in several companies that Guiscard intended the blow against him." Swift adds, "I am apt to think Mr. St. John was either mistaken or misinformed. However, the matter was thus represented in the weekly paper called 'The Examiner,' which Mr. St. John perused before it was printed, but made no alteration in the passage. This management was looked upon at least as a piece of youthful indiscretion in Mr. St. John ; and perhaps was represented in a worse view to Mr. Harley."‡ Strange, that two great statesmen should have their "first misunderstanding" about the honor which was proposed to be conferred upon one of them by a stab from a French spy ! Singular, that the man of the greatest intellect in that period of political dishonesty should grudge the white staff and a peerage, to him who had the lucky misfortune to have a penknife blade broken upon the rib beneath his embroidered waistcoat, and should envy the fulsome addresses of parliament about papists and factions, of the utter falsehood of which he was perfectly conscious. Was it thus ? Swift says, "I remember very well that, upon visiting Mr. Harley as soon as he was in a condition to be seen, I found several of his nearest relatives talk very freely of some proceedings of Mr. St. John." Was he intriguing to be first minister—at which Swift hints—during the time when Harley's recovery was somewhat doubtful ? St. John's great power and influence in the House of Commons as its best orator might have commanded this, without seeking to assume what Swift terms "the merit" of Guiscard's attempt. "This accident," says Burnet, "was of great use to Harley ; for the party formed against him was ashamed to push a man who was thus assassinated by one that was studying to recommend himself to the court of France." It averted suspicion from the secret correspondence that Harley was himself carrying on with that court, if not directly with the court of St. Germains. St. John would be equally desirous to have the same cover for his own designs, and to smother the fact mentioned by Dartmouth, that the correspondence of Guiscard, which was read at the council, contained "intelligence which few of the cabinet had any knowledge of before they read his letters ; and he was never asked who he had it from, the answer being evident." St. John was doubtless the discloser of secrets thus pointed at. A clandestine negotiation for peace was at that time going forward with the French minister, Torcy, under the immediate direction of St. John, through the Abbé Gautier, while the queen was made to pledge herself to the Dutch government that no step toward a pacification should be taken but in concert with them. How far St. John was at that time concerned in the schemes which the Jacobite party had for setting aside the Act of Settlement, and for bringing back the pretender, in connection with these advances for peace, is a matter of inference from his subsequent conduct. "It is remarked by Sir James Mackintosh in one of his note-books (we know not on what authority) that the first introduction of Bolingbroke into the secret negotiation was during the illness of Harley after he had been stabbed by Guiscard." * It was for the interest of both these unscrupulous ministers that their undoubted duplicity to the allies and their possible treason to the constitution should be covered by the pretence that each was meant to be assassinated by a French agent, for their zeal and fidelity to their sovereign and their country. They became rivals even for the honor of this miserable delusion.

The attempt of Guiscard upon the life of Harley led to the passing of the statute, by which it was enacted that if any person or persons "shall unlawfully attempt to kill, or shall unlawfully assault, or strike or wound, any person, being one of the most honorable privy council of her majesty, her heirs or successors, when in the execution of his office of a privy councillor in council, or on any committee of council, that then the person or persons so offending, being thereof convicted in due form of law, shall be and are hereby declared to be felons, and shall suffer death as in cases of felony, without benefit of clergy." †

On the 4th of March Marlborough left England, to resume his command of the allied forces in the Netherlands, but without a remnant of the political power which had once been intrusted to him. Yet the weakness of the ministry had induced Harley and Bolingbroke to relax somewhat in their hostility to the great general, and Swift evidently had his cue, when he wrote thus on the 15th of February: "Nobody that I know of did ever dispute the Duke of Marlborough's courage, conduct, or success; they have been always unquestionable, and will continue to be so, in spite of the malice of his enemies, or, which is yet more, the weakness of his advocates. The nation only wishes to see him taken out of ill hands and put in better." ‡ Three weeks after the attempt upon Harley's life St. John wrote a letter to Marlborough, full of professions of respect: "Your grace may be assured of my sincere endeavors to serve you; and I hope never again to see the time when I shall be obliged to embark in a separate interest from you." § Marlborough was too experienced in the value of such professions not to be on his guard. He wrote to beg the duchess not to name any of the ministers in her letters to him, all of which he had certain assurance that they opened. "The concern you have for me must in kindness oblige you never to say anything of them which may give offence; since while I am in the service I am in their power, especially by the villainous way of printing, which stabs me to the heart." ‖ This moral cowardice is a curious revelation of human inconsistency. "The villainous way of printing" was ever a terror to the man who would charge a redoubt with the utmost coolness. "Paper-bullets of the brain" were far more terrible to him than a volley of grape-shot. But Marlborough very speedily had far more serious embarrassments than the discomfort produced by his dreaded enemies, the London pamphleteers. The Emperor Joseph was attacked by small-pox, and died on the 17th of April, in his thirty-fourth year. His brother Charles would succeed to the hereditary dominions of Austria, and all the political interests of Germany would be concentrated upon the election to the empire. The British cabinet instantly sent orders to Marlborough to co-operate with the States of Holland and with Eugene, in forwarding the election of the Austrian prince, in preference to that of the King of Bavaria. Louis secretly promoted the same object. The governments of England and France saw that the great obstacle to a separate peace would be removed if Charles were elected emperor; for the danger to the balance of power from the emperor being King of Spain was really greater than the danger of the crowns of France and Spain being in the family of the Bourbons. Peace would assuredly arise out of these complications, however unwilling the Austrian family might be to withdraw their pretensions to the Spanish monarchy. But the uncertainty of the future was too great to cause any essential difference in the conduct of the war in the Netherlands. Marlborough never stood in a loftier attitude than in the campaign of 1711. The expected co-operation of Prince Eugene in the command of the allied troops was interrupted by the necessity of his presence on the Upper Rhine. A portion of the British force was withdrawn from the Netherlands, to take part in a hopeless renewal of the war in Spain, or to be sent upon an ill-concerted expedition against Quebec. Marlborough, having lost the favor of the queen, distrusted and hated by the ministry, grown odious in the eyes of the people as the supposed obstacle to peace and relief from taxation, went about the performance of his military duties with a vigor and sagacity truly admirable. Marshal Villars, during the preceding autumn and winter, had constructed a series of fortified lines, which appeared well calculated to defy any irruption of the allies upon the French frontier. They were boastfully asserted to be the ne plus ultra of Marlborough. The French army was also declared to be far stronger than that of the allies. "The Marshal de Villars was pleased to tell my trumpet yesterday that the death of the emperor would occasion great disorders among the allies, and that he should be thirty thousand stronger than we." Thus Marlborough writes to Godolphin on the 4th of May, and adds, "If their superiority be as great as he says it will be, I should not apprehend much from them, but that of their being able to hinder us from acting, which, to my own particular, would be mortification enough; for since constant success has not met with approbation, what may I not expect when nothing is done!" * Marlborough was not hindered from acting by the French superiority of numbers, or by their impregnable lines. He had determined to invest Bouchain; but to do this it was necessary that he should pass those lines. By rapid changes of position; by taking an important post in one day, and suffering the enemy to concentrate their attention by its recapture, while he carried forward his ultimate design; by inducing Villars to fancy that the allies were about to give him battle, and then suddenly marching away at nightfall—this wonderful strategy produced a result as great as if Marlborough had added one more to his roll of victories. On the 6th of August he wrote to Secretary St. John that the whole army had passed the lines on the previous day, and were drawn up in order of battle. The reply of St. John offers the highest tribute to the strategy of the general: "My Lord Stair had indeed opened to us the several steps which your grace intended to take in order to pass the enemy's lines in one part or other; it was, however, hard to imagine, and too much to hope, that a plan which consisted of so many parts, wherein so many different corps were to co-operate punctually together, should entirely succeed, and no one article fail of what your grace had projected. I most heartily congratulate with your grace on this great event, of which no more needs, I think, be said than that you have obtained, without losing a man, such an advantage as we should have bought with the expense of several thousand lives, and have reckoned ourselves gainers." † On the 24th of August Marlborough writes to St. John to apprise him of his proceedings in the siege of Bouchain. The answer of the secretary is again a tribute to the genius of Marlborough: "I shall be very glad to have the plan of the situation of both armies, which your grace has promised to send me. I expect indeed that it should be very extraordinary, since I believe there is hardly one instance of an inferior army posting themselves so as to be able to form a siege and keep the communication open with their own country, in sight of an enemy so much superior." ‡ On the 14th of September the successful general announces to the sceptical secretary that the difficulties had been overcome—that Bouchain had surrendered: "Thus you see a place, which is of such consequence to either party, has, by the blessing of God, been reduced even in the sight of a superior army, that has left nothing unattempted toward relieving it, and who, being apprehensive of our success, have for some days past been burning and destroying all the forage about Quesnoy and Valenciennes to hinder our further progress, by endeavoring to make it impossible for us to subsist." §

On the 8th of October Charles of Austria was elected Emperor of Germany. He had previously left Spain, where, although troops were sent by the British government, nothing was done to retrieve the disasters of the previous year. In England the conduct of the campaign by Marlborough was systematically disparaged. He was assailed for not having taken occasion to hazard battle with Villars; his passage of the French lines was termed crossing the kennel; and the capture of Bouchain was called the taking of a dove-cot, with the loss of sixteen thousand men. Marlborough was writhing under these attacks, and had the weakness to write to Harley, now Lord Oxford, complaining that he "should be reviled in such a manner." Oxford replied that he was himself every day the subject of some libel or other, and says, "I would willingly compound that all the ill-natured scribblers should have license to write ten times more against me, on condition that they would write against nobody else." * St. John informs the queen in a note that Marlborough's chaplain, Dr. Hare, had "published libels against your majesty's government," and is particularly angry against a sermon preached before the duke, and afterward printed. He calls it "seditious." It merely deprecated the conclusion of a precipitate and dishonorable peace. This was the sore point. Oxford and St. John had for some time been carrying on their secret negotiation with France for a peace, as if England were the sole party; and had been writing to Marlborough as if there could only be one policy—that of vigorously conducting the war till a general peace could be accomplished, in concert with the allies. They knew that the notion which Marlborough and the allies had of a general peace was, that it should contain a provision that no Bourbon prince should ever wear the crown of Spain. The ministry had signed a preliminary treaty with France, in which it was agreed that the crowns of France and Spain should not be worn by the same prince. It would be easier to destroy Marlborough than to convert him; and the ministers vigorously set about his destruction.

The army went into winter quarters, and Marlborough came home, landing at Greenwich on the 17th of November. He heard that London was in some confusion. The usual procession on the birth-day of Queen Elizabeth, when it was customary to burn the effigies of the pope, the devil, and other illustrious personages, was conceived by the ministry to be as dangerous to the public peace as the similar procession in the time of Titus Oates. † A quantity of puppets was seized in a house in Drury Lane, on the night of the 16th, one of which, representing the lord treasurer, was a fearful libel. "I am assured," says Swift, "that the figure of the devil is made as like lord treasurer as they could." It was a capital occasion to get up a squib against the Whigs, and the reverend counsellor of the Tories says, "I have put an understrapper upon writing a twopenny pamphlet, to give an account of the whole design." ‡ The "understrapper" was the great ally of the lord treasurer and the secretary; and one object of the twopenny pamphlet is clear enough from this passage: "The Duke of Marlborough was to make his entry through Aldgate, where he was to be met with the cry of 'Victory! Bouchain! the lines, the lines!'" Marlborough had as little to promise himself from mob favor as from court favor. The lines and Bouchain were worthless to his immediate fame, and did not save him from ungenerous reproach in the highest place. The parliament was opened by the queen on the 7th of December, and the application of the opening words of her speech could not be mistaken: "I have called you together as soon as the public affairs would permit; and I am glad that I can now tell you that, notwithstanding the arts of those who delight in war, both place and time are appointed for opening the treaty of a general peace." In the debate which ensued Marlborough spoke with an animation and solemnity which rarely marked his course in parliamentary proceedings. The queen was in the house: "He could declare with a safe conscience, in the presence of her majesty, of that illustrious assembly, and of that Supreme Being who is infinitely above all the powers upon earth, and before whom, according to the ordinary course of nature, he must soon appear, to give an account of his actions, that he ever was desirous of a safe, honorable, and lasting peace; and that he was always very far from any design of prolonging the war for his own private advantage, as his enemies had most falsely insinuated. That his advanced age and the many fatigues he had undergone made him earnestly wish for retirement and repose, to think of eternity the remainder of his days; the rather because he had not the least motive to desire the continuance of the war, having been so generously rewarded, and had honors and riches heaped upon him, far beyond his desert and expectation, both by her majesty and her parliaments. That he thought himself bound to this public acknowledgment to her majesty and his country, that he should always be ready to serve them, if he could but crawl along, to obtain an honorable and lasting peace: but that, at the same time, he must take the liberty to declare that he could, by no means, give in to the measures that had lately been taken to enter into a negotiation of peace with France, upon the foot of the seven preliminary articles; for he was of the same opinion with the rest of the allies, that the safety and liberties of Europe would be in imminent danger if Spain and the West Indies were left to the house of Bourbon; which, with all humility, and as he thought himself in duty bound, he had declared to her majesty, whom he had the honor to wait on after his return from Holland; and, therefore, he was for inserting in the address the clause offered by the Earl of Nottingham." * The amendment of Nottingham was to the effect "that no peace could be safe or honorable to Great Britain, or Europe, if Spain and the West Indies were allotted to the house of Bourbon." The amendment was carried by a majority of 62 against 54. A similar amendment in the Commons was rejected by a majority of 232 against 106. In the address of the lower house to the queen the feeling against Marlborough was kept up by an especial reference to "the arts and devices of those who, for private views, may delight in war."

The ministers of Queen Anne put a falsehood into her mouth in her answer to the address of the Lords: "I should be sorry any one could think I would not do my utmost to recover Spain and the West Indies from the house of Bourbon." The ministerial duplicity was a result of the terror which they felt at their probable ejection from power, and at the prospect of Whig revenge upon the discovery of their clandestine dealings with France. Swift has related that the most bitter of their opponents, the Earl of Wharton, "was observed in the house to smile, and put his hands to his neck when any of the ministry was speaking, by which he would have it understood that some heads were in danger." † Swift begged St. John to send him abroad "before a change." He says, "I took him aside after dinner, told him how I had served them, and had asked no reward, but thought I might ask security." ‡ We doubt if he was altogether in a jocular mood, when he thus manifested his fears to Oxford: "I told lord treasurer I should have the advantage of him; for he would lose his head, and I should only be hanged, and so carry my body entire to the grave." § Party hatreds were becoming so intense that heading and hanging were not altogether out of the question. But lord treasurer and secretary kept their places, and with their majority in the Commons, and their better management of the queen—who had been somewhat impatient of their attempts to govern her—they turned their thoughts to the mode in which they could best damage and destroy their adversaries. Marlborough was the first victim. The "falcon" Churchill, was "hawk'd at and killed" by "the mousing owl," Harley. On the 31st of December the following entry was made in the minutes of the cabinet council: "Being informed that an information against the Duke of Marlborough was laid before the House of Commons by the commissioners of the public accounts, her majesty thought fit to dismiss him from all his employments, that the matter might undergo an impartial investigation." The prelude to "an impartial investigation" was to load the object of it with disgrace. On the 1st of January Swift enters in his Journal, "Marlborough is turned out of all. . . . If the ministry be not sure of a peace, I shall wonder at this step, and do not approve it at best. The queen and lord treasurer mortally hate the Duke of Marlborough, and to that he owes his fall, more than to his other faults. . . . Opinion is a mighty matter in war, and I doubt the French think it impossible to conquer an army that he leads, and our soldiers think the same; and how far even this step may encourage the French to play tricks with us no one knows." The one-sided pamphleteer could think impartially in the private record of his feelings and opinions.

The information against the Duke of Marlborough would, in another generation, have properly consigned a great public servant to the lowest depth of ignominy, and have called for exemplary punishment. He was an avaricious man; he clutched at all the gold he could safely touch, and he kept it tightly buttoned up, to his own undisguised satisfaction. Peterborough measured his character pretty accurately when, being mistaken by a truculent mob for Marlborough in the wane of his popularity, he exclaimed, "I am not the duke, and I will prove it. I have only five guineas in my pocket, and you shall have them." But Marlborough was too cautious to seize upon perquisites and appropriate funds for which he had not strict precedent. The charges against him were under two heads, and were declared established by large majorities in the House of Commons: 1. "That the taking several sums of money, annually, by the Duke of Marlborough from the contractors for furnishing the bread and wagons in the Low Countries, was unwarrantable and illegal." This charge against him came to the knowledge of the duke before he returned to England in November, and he at once wrote to the commissioners of public accounts, not denying the information which Sir Solomon de Medina had given them, that he had made such payments, but saying, "this is no more but what has been allowed as a perquisite to the general, or commander-in-chief, of the army in the Low Countries, even before the revolution, and since." He added his assurance that whatever had been so received had been "constantly employed for the service of the public, in keeping secret correspondence, and getting intelligence of the enemy's motions and designs." * The second resolution of the Commons was, "that the deduction of 2½ per cent from the pay of the foreign troops in her majesty's service is public money, and ought to be accounted for." Marlborough, in his letter to the commissioners, had anticipated this second charge by informing them that, as the plenipotentiary of William III., he had negotiated with the foreign states that 2½ per cent should be deducted from the pay of their troops, to cover all charges for secret service; and that when he succeeded to the command, the queen, by warrant, authorized his receipt of the same percentage, which he had strictly applied "for procuring timely and good advices." The question of Marlborough's criminality may long remain an open one. But we cannot have a stronger proof of the growth of good government than the certainty that no such temptation to dishonesty could now be presented to any high public servant, and that no one who has now the conduct of civil or military affairs would incur the fearful responsibility of disbursing large sums of money without being accountable for them. Marlborough's defence was certainly very incomplete, as judged by the opinions of our own times; but it seems to have satisfied all but the furious partisans of the ministry, to whom his high influence, especially in foreign courts, was a serious obstacle to their policy. When the queen dismissed him by an insulting letter, he boldly replied he would not "join in the counsel of a man who, in my opinion, puts your majesty upon all manner of extremities. And it is not my opinion only, but the opinion of all mankind, that the friendship of France must needs be destructive to your majesty, there being in that court a root of enmity, irreconcilable to your majesty's government and the religion of these kingdoms." †

The discomfiture of the ministry in the House of Lords was stopped from going farther by a bold but dangerous manœuvre. They created twelve new peers. Lord Dartmouth has given an interesting account of what came to his knowledge with regard to this measure: "I was never so much surprised as when the queen drew a list of twelve lords out of her pocket, and ordered me to bring warrants for them; there not having been the least intimation before it was to be put in execution. I asked her if she designed to have them all made at once. She asked me if I had any exceptions to the legality of it. I said no, but doubted very much of the expediency, for I feared it would have a very ill effect in the House of Lords, and no good one in the kingdom. She said she had made fewer lords than any of her predecessors, and I saw the Duke of Marlborough and the Whigs were resolved to distress her as much as they could, and she must do what she could to help herself. I told her I wished it proved a remedy to what she so justly complained of, but I thought it my duty to tell her my apprehensions, as well as execute her commands. She thanked me, and said she liked it as little as I did, but did not find that anybody could propose a better expedient. I asked Lord Oxford afterward what was the real inducement for taking so odious a couse, when there were less shocking means to have acquired the same end. He said the Scotch lords were grown so extravagant in their demands that it was high time to let them see they were not so much wanted as they imagined; for they were now come to expect a reward for every vote they gave." * There was no decided notice taken of this proceeding in the House of Lords. Lord Wharton took occasion to say one of the humorous things recorded of an age of humorists. He asked one of the twelve new peers whether they voted by their foreman.

The opposition of the peers being in some degree disarmed by this new creation, and the Commons being decidedly with the ministry, the queen sent a message to parliament on the 17th of January, which contained the important announcement that "her majesty's plenipotentiaries are arrived at Utrecht, and have begun, in pursuance of their instructions, to concert the most proper ways of procuring a just satisfaction to all in alliance with her, according to their several treaties, and particularly with relation to Spain and the West Indies."

CHAPTER CXLII.

Prince Eugene in London—Opening of the campaign under Ormond and Eugene—Ormond's secret instructions—The allied army deserted by the British forces—Subsequent disasters of the allies—The Lords' protest published—Laws proposed against the press—The first stamp duty on periodical works—Terms of peace announced to parliament—Bolingbroke's embassy to Paris—Treaty of Utrecht completed—Treaty of commerce with France rejected by parliament—Dissolution of parliament—Jacobite intrigues—The new parliament—Libels—Swift—Steele—Death of the Princess Sophia of Hanover—The Schism Act—Oxford dismissed from office—Death of the queen.

THE dismissal of Marlborough from all his offices, the hostile vote of parliament, and a prosecution threatened by the ministry to compel him to refund nearly half a million of that money which he said he had employed in the public service—these adversities in the closing years of a life signally prosperous appear to have been borne by him with a philosophical calmness. He wrote, on the 22d of February, to M. Schuylembourg, who had served under him as a general of cavalry, "Provided that my destiny does not involve any prejudice to the public, I shall be very content with it ; and shall account myself happy in a retreat in which I may be able wisely to reflect on the vicissitudes of this world."* There are several other letters, breathing the same sentiment of resignation—a sentiment which was perhaps as real as in any other case of fallen greatness. But Marlborough's public virtue must have been more exalted than that of most great ones of the earth in the day of humiliation, if he did not inwardly rejoice at the degradation of England when he was thrust out of her service. His constant friend, Prince Eugene, had arrived in London at the beginning of January. He witnessed the fall of Marlborough, and testified in the most public manner his sense of the injustice and impolicy of palace intrigues and parliamentary hatreds. Oxford invited Eugene to dinner, and thus complimented him : "I consider this day as the happiest of my life, since I have the honor to see in my house the greatest captain of the age." Eugene replied, "If it be so, I owe it to your lordship." The "greatest captain of the age" was put aside ; and the future associate with Eugene in the approaching campaign was to be the Duke of Ormond. Conferences were opened at Utrecht ; but the real negotiations for peace between Great Britain and France were being secretly carried on at Paris. The mission of Eugene to the court of St. James's was to prevent any such separate negotiation, by offering a guarantee that the emperor would double his contingents, if necessary, to carry the war, in concert with all the members of the alliance, to a successful conclusion. A few months of vigorous exertion might accomplish that object, and complete the series of triumphs which the allies had won under English generalship. The propositions of the emperor were coldly listened to, mentioned to parliament, and then laid aside. Eugene went back to conduct the campaign as the commander of the allied armies ; for the States would not intrust those powers to Ormond which they had intrusted to Marlborough. Eugene could expect no hearty co-operation from the ministry of Queen Anne ; but he could scarcely expect an amount of duplicity and treachery, happily unparalleled in the future conduct of our country in her foreign affairs. On 26th of May Eugene and Ormond, with a far larger force than had been brought into the field under Marlborough in the previous year, passed the Scheldt below Bouchain. A French army of inferior force, under Villars and Montesquiou, was nearer the French frontier. The position of the allies indicated an intention to make a forward movement, and a probable advance into the French territory. But Ormond had a letter in his pocket from Secretary St. John, dated the 10th of May, containing these instructions : "Her majesty, my lord, has reason to believe, that we shall come to an agreement upon the great article of the union of the two monarchies, as soon as a courier, sent from Versailles to Madrid, can return. It is, therefore, the queen's positive command to your grace that you avoid engaging in any siege, or hazarding a battle, till you have further orders from her majesty. I am, at the same time, directed to let your grace know that the queen would have you disguise the receipt of this order ; and her majesty thinks that you cannot want pretences for conducting yourself, so as to answer her ends, without owning that which might at present have an ill effect, if it was publicly known. The queen cannot think with patience of sacrificing men when there is a fair prospect of obtaining her purpose another way ; and, besides, she will not suffer herself to be exposed to the reproach of having retarded by the events of the campaign a negotiation which might otherwise have been as good as concluded in a few days."† On the 28th of May Eugene proposed to attack the French camp, which was open and exposed. Ormond equivocated and requested delay. Eugene was indignant; but at length brought the English general to agree to co-operate in the siege of Quesnoy. The trenches were opened in the night of the 18th of June, and on the 4th of July the garrison surrendered as prisoners of war. This was the last military operation in which the British forces were engaged. In the middle of July, there having been for some time a secret correspondence between Ormond and Villars, Ormond proclaimed an armistice for four months between England and France. He withdrew his British troops from those of the allied army; and called upon the foreign contingents in the pay of England to follow the example. With a trifling exception they all refused, and became a part of the army of the empire, and of the States, under the command of Eugene. This infamous abandonment of the alliance—this base desertion of the common cause without notice or explanation—left the field open for France to recover all the ground she had lost. Eugene, weakened in his force, the plans of the campaign altogether paralyzed, was beaten at Denain by Villars on the 24th of July. One by one the fortified posts and towns which had been won by the allies were retaken by the French. There may be differences of opinion as to the policy of the English ministry in relinquishing the original object of the war, and ultimately separating the interests of their country from those of the house of Austria; but there can be no difference in viewing their duplicity to their allies as one of the disgraces of party-government. The ministry of Anne "were afraid of some brilliant success in Flanders that might derange their plans; and to prevent such a calamity they gave secret information to the enemy of the military projects of the allies, and at the most critical moment of the campaign they withdrew their troops from the contest."* The cold-blooded scoundrelism of St. John goes beyond most recorded examples of the extent to which "low ambition"—even more than "the pride of kings"—will degrade a man of lofty intellect into the basest political profligacy. When the secretary sent to Ormond the order to avoid engaging in any siege or battle, he communicated this private direction to Gautier, his agent in the correspondence with Torcy, the French minister. "When I asked him," says Gautier in his dispatch, "what Marshal Villars was to do, in case Prince Eugene and the Dutch attacked him, he replied, there was only one thing to do—to fall upon him and cut him in pieces, him and his whole army."†

It could scarcely be expected that, even for mere party purposes, such flagrant violations of national faith should pass unnoticed. Halifax in the House of Lords, and Pulteney in the House of Commons, made impressive speeches against the dishonor of the refusal of Ormond to co-operate with Eugene. But they were defeated by large majorities. A very effective protest was signed by many peers, and it was printed and circulated in several languages. The ministry endeavored to repress it, and would have prosecuted the printer, could they have discovered him. The practice of secret printing was one of the means in those days by which prosecutions against libel were evaded. Very shortly after the publication of this protest, a report was presented from a committee of the whole house, upon "the great license taken in publishing false and scandalous libels." In this report it was proposed that printing-presses should be registered, with the names of their owners, and their places of abode; that the name of the printer and of the publisher should be attached to every book, pamphlet, or paper; and that no bookseller should sell or disperse any printed paper without the name of the author, printer, and publisher. The Commons ordered a bill to be brought in accordingly. The bill dropped through. To suppress anonymous writing would have deprived the government of one of its strongest allies. Swift, in his posthumous work, "The Four Last Years of Queen Anne," looks back with horror upon the provision that would have made him utterly useless to lord treasurer and secretary. "In this bill there was a clause inserted (whether industriously with design to overthrow it) that the author's name and place of abode should be set to every printed book, pamphlet, or paper; to which I believe no man who has the least regard to learning would have given his consent." Pious men, he says, conceal their names, out of a humble Christian spirit; "persons of true genius have an invincible modesty and suspicion of themselves upon their first sending their thoughts into the world." There was something besides the "humble Christian spirit," and "the invincible modesty," that made Swift always an anonymous writer. Under that form of publication alone could he defame and misrepresent; and, what is of more importance to us, could he leave to the world the most remarkable examples of the power of influencing public opinion by fearless argument and withering sarcasm, expressed in the simplest language. The benefits of anonymous writing have far outweighed its evils. The scheme for restricting the press in this mode broke down. The other scheme of the ministry for taxing it was successful. In 1711 one of the longest acts in the statute-book was passed, which imposed duties upon soap, paper, silks, linen, and many other articles, and upon "certain printed papers, pamphlets, and advertisements."* Those taxes which came under the denomination of "new stamp duties," were to be in force for thirty-two years, commencing on the 1st of August, 1712. They endured, with various large additions and modifications, for more than a century and a half; till the public opinion, which they were meant to hold in check, swept them away. The well-known passage in Swift's "Journal to Stella" tells how the stamp duty operated: "Do you know that Grub Street is dead and gone last week? No more ghosts or murders now for love or money. I plied it pretty close the last fortnight, and published at least seven penny papers of my own, besides some of other people's; but now every single half-sheet pays a halfpenny to the queen. The 'Observator' is fallen; the 'Medleys' are jumbled together with the 'Flying Post;' the 'Examiner' is deadly sick; the 'Spectator' keeps up, and doubles its price; I know not how long it will hold. Have you seen the red stamp the papers are marked with? Methinks it is worth a halfpenny the stamping." We shall have to return to the subject of the beginnings of journalism and of periodical literature in a subsequent chapter.

On the 17th of June the queen informed the parliament, in a speech from the throne, of the terms upon which "a general peace may be made." Her majesty had no authority from her allies to announce their consent to such terms; and this statement was only a continuance of the duplicity that had attended the secret negotiations with France. The Protestant succession as by law established in the house of Hanover was to be acknowledged. There was to be "an additional security, by the removal of that person out of the dominions of France who has pretended to disturb this settlement." As "the apprehension that Spain and the West Indies might be united to France was the chief inducement to begin this war," that union was to be effectually prevented by the Duke of Anjou and his descendants renouncing all claim to the crown of France, and a similar renunciation was to be made by the King of France, his heirs and successors, of all claim to the crown of Spain. Certain cessions of territory in America were to be made to Great Britain. Gibraltar, Port Mahon, and Minorca were to be secured to her; and Dunkirk was to be demolished. Various announcements of territorial arrangements connected with the allied powers were also made. An amendment was moved to the complimentary address of the Lords, in reply to this communication, recommending a general guarantee of the allies to the conditions of peace. This was rejected by a large majority; but a protest was signed by many peers, in which the objections to the proposed treaty, and to the separate negotiations, were very forcibly put. The chief objection, which long continued to be a source of alarm to Europe, was in these terms: "A perfect union among the allies seems to us to be more necessary in the present case, because the foundation upon which all the offers of France, relating to Great Britain, as well as to the allies, are built, viz., a renunciation of the Duke of Anjou to that kingdom, is, in our opinion, so fallacious that no reasonable man, much less whole nations, can ever look upon it as any security. Experience may sufficiently convince us how little we ought to rely upon the renunciation of the house of Bourbon, and though the present Duke of Anjou should happen to think himself bound by his own act, which his grandfather did not, yet will his descendants be at liberty to say, that no act of his could deprive them of their birthright, and especially when it is such a right as, in the opinion of all Frenchmen, ought inviolably to be maintained, by the fundamental constitution of the kingdom of France."†

* 10 Annæ, c. 18. † "Parliamentary History," vol. vi. col. 1149.

The lapse of time has produced some changes of opinion as to those terms of pacification which were finally concluded by the Peace of Utrecht; but there can be little doubt that the dangers set forth in this protest were present to the minds of all that portion of the nation who were not clamorous for peace upon any terms, and who were not infected with that political insanity which hailed the friendship of France as the preliminary condition to the re-establishment of the throne upon the sole principle of hereditary right. Nevertheless, the people were not in a temper to make any very strenuous opposition to any negotiation for peace which would bring them an immediate reduction of taxation. Moreover, a peace would put an end to those advantages which the moneyed interest derived from the necessities of the government—advantages which made the landowners believe that "power, which, according to the old maxim, was used to follow land, is now gone over to money, so that if the war continue some years longer, a landed man will be little better than a farmer of a rack-rent to the army and to the public funds."* The landed interest was still paramount in parliament; but it saw with dread that the new power was making some inroad upon its supposed exclusive right to legislate for the whole community—"to force the election of boroughs out of the hands of those who had been the old proprietors and inhabitants."†

The withdrawal of the British troops, under Ormond, from that co-operation with Eugene upon which the plan of the campaign had been arranged, was preceded by the announcement to parliament of the terms upon which peace might be made. But the congress at Utrecht had been no party to these terms; and therefore the surprise and indignation of the allies was as great as if the British abandonment of their cause had taken place without any announcement that a separate negotiation had been proceeding between the courts of Versailles and St. James's. An old soldier, Sergeant Milner, has described the separation from their companions in arms of the twelve thousand brave fellows that were compelled to obey the orders of Ormond, on the 16th of July: "As they marched off that day, both sides looked very dejectfully on each other, neither being permitted to speak to the other, to prevent reflections that might thereby arise; being there was then made a strange revolution between us and our allies, by our cessation of arms, or entrance on an odd peace with France." Ormond, amid the contempt of his men as "a stupid tool and a general of straw," made his inglorious way to Ghent and Bruges, the Dutch governors refusing to let him pass through the fortified towns which Marlborough had won. St. John, who had now been created Viscount Bolingbroke—to his great indignation at not receiving an earldom—was dispatched to Paris, to settle some points that were still in dispute. He was accompanied by Matthew Prior, who had previously been an agent in the clandestine correspondence between the two courts. Although the wily secretary remained only about a fortnight in Paris and the neighborhood—amply engaged with his negotiations and his pleasures—it is asserted that he had two private interviews with the Chevalier St. George. In discussing with Torcy the absolute necessity of the removal of the pretender from the French territory, he said the time might come when the well-disposed [les bien intentionnés] would be sorry if the chevalier were at a distance from the British Isles. The plenipotentiaries of the emperor at Utrecht had not hesitated to say that the great end of the English management was to bring in the pretender; and the Dutch had expressed the same belief. The abilities of Bolingbroke were sufficiently tasked to keep Louis firm to his engagements. Torcy says that if the success of Villars at Denain had occurred earlier, the king would not have consented to the renunciation which separated the French and Spanish crowns. When the allies were afterward discomfited, Louis rose in his demands as regarded the fortresses to be retained as a barrier by the Dutch. Bolingbroke accomplished one special object of his embassy—to secure the interests of the Duke of Savoy. How far he may have yielded some points to the personal address of Louis XIV., who had the kingly faculty of winning men by politeness, is not evident. He was not directly won after the old French fashion of bestowing "gratifications" upon English ministers. But the present of a ring of the value of four thousand pounds from the magnificent king was not a compliment which a statesman of later and better times would have accepted. Before Bolingbroke left Paris a suspension of arms was proclaimed between Great Britain and France. The States refused to accede to this armistice; and their first inclination was to continue the war, in conjunction with the emperor and the smaller German powers. But they saw themselves deserted; they saw that Eugene could not stand up against the military resources of France and the genius of her commanders. They finally in December accepted the propositions made in concert between France and England. But in the proportion that concessions were made to France her plenipotentiaries became more captious and evasive. The treaty would probably have fallen through, and have left its English negotiators exposed to the vengeance of their political rivals, had not the ministers issued peremptory orders to their plenipotentiaries to sign it at all hazards.

On the 11th of April, 1713, the Treaty of Utrecht was signed by the representatives of Great Britain, France, Savoy, Portugal, Prussia, and the States-General. The emperor refused to be a party to it. Those points which affected Great Britain have been already mentioned in general terms. Those which affected the other powers were accomplished by this Treaty of Utrecht, and by subsequent treaties of 1714.* We subjoin a very brief view of the entire arrangement. Spain and the Indies were given to Philip; the French king recognized the Protestant succession, and engaged to make the pretender withdraw from the French dominions; he renounced for himself, his heirs, and his successors, the succession to the throne of Spain, while Philip renounced in like manner the succession to the throne of France; the fortifications of Dunkirk were to be demolished, and the harbor filled up, an equivalent being first given to France by Great Britain; Hudson's Bay and Straits were to remain to Great Britain, and satisfaction was to be made by France to the Hudson's Bay Company for all damages sustained; St. Christopher's, Nova Scotia, and Newfoundland were given to Great Britain, with certain rights of fishing off Newfoundland reserved to France, and, by a separate treaty with Philip, as King of Spain, Minorca and Gibraltar were retained by Great Britain; the Emperor of Austria received the kingdom of Naples, the duchy of Milan, and the Spanish Netherlands; Sicily was separated from Naples and given to the Duke of Savoy, with the title of king, and the succession to the throne of Spain, in default of descendants from Philip, was settled in the house of Savoy; Luxembourg, Namur, Charleroy, Ypres, and Nieuport were assigned to the Dutch, in addition to the places already possessed by them.

Upon the assembling of parliament the queen announced in general terms the conclusion of the treaty of peace. On the 9th of May her majesty sent a message to the effect that as it is the undoubted prerogative of the crown to make peace and war, she had ratified the treaties of peace and commerce with France, and had concluded a treaty with Spain. The treaties were then laid before the houses. The treaty of commerce contained two articles which had been agreed to by the British plenipotentiaries, upon the condition that they should be binding if they received the sanction of parliament. They were conceived in a spirit of liberality which was far before the age in which they were propounded. The negotiators proposed that reciprocal advantages should be enjoyed by the subjects of Great Britain and France, by putting the trade of each upon the footing of that of the most favored nations; and that the laws made since 1664 for the prohibition of French imports should be repealed. The mercantile public clamored against the proposal as destructive of British commerce. The balance of trade would be annually a million and a half against Great Britain; which was held to be equivalent to the actual loss, according to the absurd delusion of those days, of a million and a half. The manufactures of silk, linen, and paper would be destroyed. France would not buy our wool or woollen stuffs. We should drink her wines, to the injury of Portugal, who had become our best customer under the Methuen treaty, actually paying us half a million in good, hard, unconsumable dollars. Burnet expresses the popular philosophy when he says, "We were engaged by our treaty with Portugal that their wines should be charged a third part lower than the French wines; but if the duties were, according to the treaties of commerce, to be made equal, then, considering the difference of freight, which is more than double from Portugal, the French wines would be cheaper, and the nation liking them better, by this means we should break our treaties with Portugal," and lose that wonderful balance in our favor.* It never entered into the reasonings of the advocates of prohibition and forced consumption that a supply at the cheapest rate of what a nation liked and wanted was preferable to a supply at a dearer rate of what a nation did not like and did not want. The treaty of commerce with France was rejected by a small majority of the Commons; and though much has been since done for the removal of prohibitory duties, there still remains much to be accomplished before the two nations, each producing what the other would willingly take in exchange, shall have wholly cast aside the prejudices of 1713.

On the 7th of July there was a public thanksgiving for the peace, and both houses of parliament went in procession to St. Paul's. The Commons had sufficiently manifested their adhesion to the principles which placed Harley and St. John in power, by appointing Sacheverel to preach before them on the 29th of May. Yet this uncompromising body of so-called representatives of the people, who would gladly have annihilated all that the revolution bestowed upon the people, was happily limited in its term of existence by the Triennial Bill. The parliament was prorogued on the 16th of July, and very shortly afterward was dissolved. The elections were conducted with more than usual party-violence. The Tory wore a green bough in honor of the restoration of the Stuarts; the Whig placed a lock of wool in his hat to mark how he had supported the good old principles of exclusive trade. But the Jacobites were working steadily at their great object of preparing the way for their legitimate shadow of a king, who had, according to the letter of the treaty with France, been removed out of the dominions of Louis, to be seated in Lorraine, which was equally convenient for any enterprise, either before or after the decease of the queen. The Jacobites had great encouragement in their schemes through the ascendency of Bolingbroke. Oxford had become comparatively powerless; and the bold secretary, in conjunction with the Duke of Ormond, reduced the army, particularly the regiments which had been raised by William III.; and they placed their own instruments in the command of various strongholds. The Chevalier St. George was in his own person the greatest obstacle to the success of the plans of his adherents. Bolingbroke and other Jacobites who knew how firmly the people clung to the principle of Protestantism, had repeatedly urged him to change his religion, or at least to make a pretended renunciation of his faith. His determination was honorable to himself and a severe rebuke to his unscrupulous friends. He wrote a letter in 1711, which was shown to many persons, containing this honest sentence: "Plain dealing is best in all things, especially in matters of religion; and as I am resolved never to dissemble in religion, so I shall never tempt others to do it; and as well as I am satisfied of the truth of my own religion, yet I shall never look worse upon any persons because in this they chance to differ from me; nor shall I refuse, in due time and place, to hear what they have to say upon this subject. But they must not take it ill if I use the same liberty I allow to others, to adhere to the religion which I, in my conscience, think the best; and I may reasonably expect that liberty of conscience for myself which I deny to none." † The son of James inherited the inflexibility of his father in his adherence to the Church of Rome, also inheriting the family likeness. Horace Walpole says, "Without the particular features of any Stuart, the chevalier has the strong lines and fatality of air peculiar to them all. From the first moment I saw him, I never doubted the legitimacy of his birth." ‡

The new parliament met in February, 1714. The queen in her speech said, "There are some who are arrived to that height of malice as to insinuate that the Protestant succession in the house of Hanover is in danger under my government." Her majesty called upon parliament to suppress "seditious papers and factious rumors." Both houses went to work in this congenial duty, according to their respective party tendencies. The Lords had the printer and publisher of "The Public Spirit of the Whigs" called to their bar. They were committed to the custody of the Black Rod. Swift was the author of this libel against the Scotch nation, but Oxford professed indignation against such libels. Oxford had caused a hundred pounds to be presented to the anonymous writer. Steele had written a pamphlet called "The Crisis," to which he had affixed his name. He was expelled the house by a large majority of his fellow-representatives. Steele made an able defence, in which he was assisted by Addison; and Walpole, in a speech of unanswerable truth, showed the atrocious tyranny of this proceeding. "In former reigns the audacity of corruption extended itself only to judges and juries. The attempt so to degrade parliament was, till the present period, unheard of. The liberty of the press is unrestrained. How then shall a part of the legislature dare to punish that as a crime which is not declared to be so by any law framed by the whole." *

On the 28th of May an event occurred which, although highly probable, and therefore likely to be familiar to men's thoughts, gave more distinctness to the question of the Protestant succession. The Princess Sophia fell dead in an apoplectic fit while walking in the garden of the palace of Herrenhausen. She was in her eighty-fourth year. Her son was therefore, under the Act of Settlement, the heir-apparent to the British crown. George, Elector of Hanover—or more properly Elector of Brunswick and Lunenburg—was born on the 28th of May, 1660. He had therefore reached his fifty-fourth year on the day of his mother's death. There could be no enthusiasm in England for the succession of an elderly foreign gentleman, who spoke no English, had the reputation of being reserved and morose, and was singularly unhappy in his domestic relations. But he was also known to be a man of courage and honesty; and he was the rallying-point for that great principle of freedom, civil and religious, which was endangered under the Stuart dynasty, and could never be secure if one of that race were carried to the throne upon the shoulders of those who shouted for divine right and non-resistance. Bolingbroke, with a daring which formed a part of his mysterious character, took the occasion, while the public mind was necessarily directed to the question of the succession, to bring forward his Schism Bill, the object of which was to trample on the dissenters, by enacting that no person should keep a public or private school, or act as a tutor, who had not subscribed the Declaration of Conformity, and received a license from the diocesan. This detestable measure was passed by a majority of a hundred in the Commons, and by a majority of fourteen in the Lords. Bolingbroke moved the second reading. Wharton flung a telling sarcasm at the secretary: "He was agreeably surprised to see that some men of pleasure were, on a sudden, become so religious, as to set up for patrons of the Church." The keen old debater hit both lord treasurer and secretary very hard when he said, "He could not but wonder that persons who had been educated in dissenting academies, whom he could point at, and whose tutors he could name, should appear the most forward in suppressing them." †

On the 9th of July the parliament was prorogued by the queen in person. A violent rupture had taken place between Oxford and Bolingbroke. On the 27th of July there was a protracted dispute in council between the two rivals, at which Anne was present till a late hour of the night. It ended in the dismissal of Oxford. Bolingbroke was now supreme. The agitation of the queen brought on a sudden illness. On the 30th she had a seizure of apoplexy. Bolingbroke had no time to carry through his schemes for the house of Stuart; and when the queen, in an interval of consciousness, delivered the staff of the highest office to the Duke of Shrewsbury—who had been in concert with the Dukes of Somerset and Argyle—her death, on the morning of the 1st of August, gave the power of the government to the friends of the house of Brunswick.

Addison has shadowed out an "imaginary historian, describing the reign of Anne I.," some two or three hundred years after his time, "who will make mention of the men of genius and learning who have now any figure in the British nation." He fancies a paragraph which he has drawn up "will not be altogether unlike what will be found in some page or other of this imaginary historian." It runs thus: "It was under this reign that the 'Spectator' published those little diurnal essays which are still extant. We know very little of the name or person of this author, except only that he was a man of a very short face, extremely addicted to silence, and so great a lover of knowledge that he made a voyage to Grand Cairo for no other reason but to take the measure of a pyramid. His chief friend was one Sir Roger de Coverley, a whimsical country knight, and a templar, whose name he has not transmitted to us. He lived as a lodger at the house of a widow woman, and was a great humorist in all parts of his life. This is all we can affirm with any certainty of his person and character. As for his speculations, notwithstanding the several obsolete words and obscure phrases of the age in which he lived, we still understand enough of them to see the diversions and characters of the English nation in his time." * It was a bold effort of imagination to believe that any historian would turn from Marlborough and the Pretender, from Mrs. Masham and Dr. Sacheverel, to "little diurnal essays;" or bestow any attention upon "the diversions and characters of the English nation." Tindal wholly leaves such frivolous matters to their own perishableness. Smollett merely notices the expulsion of Mr. Steele from the House of Commons, and only mentions Mr. Addison as secretary of state. Our readers will pardon us in going farther than the "imaginary historian"—in turning aside from battles and sieges, from lord treasurers and ladies of the bedchamber, to linger with some of "the men of genius and learning" who illustrated this period, in companionship with the short-faced man "who was a great humorist in all parts of his life," and with his brother humorist who rejoiced in the name of Bickerstaff. We cannot look at one of these agreeable moralists as separated by superiority of intellect or refinement from the other. Never were two men more fitted than Addison and Steele to be fellow-laborers in the works which have associated their names for all time. These works form a broad and safe foundation for a general outline of the minuter characteristics of the national mind and manners, in the three, and partially in the four, first decades of the eighteenth century. We offer this outline as supplementary to the graver views of England's industrial and social condition, which we have given at the beginning of this volume.

On Tuesday, the 12th of April, 1709, appeared a small folio half-sheet, of four columns, which professed to teach "politick persons what to think," and "moreover, to have something which may be of entertainment to the fair sex," in honor of whom the title of "Tatler" was chosen. Further it was said, "Forasmuch as this globe is not trodden upon by mere drudges of business only, but that men of spirit and genius are justly to be esteemed as considerable agents in it, we shall not upon a dearth of news present you with musty foreign edicts, or dull proclamations, but shall divide our relation of the passages which occur in action or discourse throughout this town, as well as elsewhere, under such dates of places as may prepare you for the matter you are to expect, in the following manner: All accounts of gallantry, pleasure, and entertainment shall be under the article of White's Chocolate-house; poetry, under that of Will's Coffee-house; learning under the title of Grecian; foreign and domestic news you will have from St. James's Coffee-house; and what else I shall on any other subject offer, shall be dated from my own apartment." This is a comprehensive scheme, and withal a very complex one. But the reason of these devices is obvious. The ingenious editor desired to avail himself of the advantages of his official appointment as gazetteer, to produce something like a newspaper; but the man of wit would also aim at something better than the conductors of newspapers proper aimed at, of which one of their fraternity said, "We read more of our affairs in the Dutch papers than in any of our own." * This complaint of newspapers was written in the year 1709—the year in which Isaac Bickerstaff was making provision against "a dearth of news;" the year of negotiations for peace, which ended in the carnage of Malplaquet; the year in which the adverse camps of High Church and Low Church, of Tory and Whig, were alive with the keenest excitement of preparation for a great coming struggle. "A dearth of news" at such a period! Yet if we consider of what materials the newspaper of the beginning of the eighteenth century was constructed, we shall cease to be surprised at the machinery which Steele devised to make his quasi-newspaper entertaining. Cumbrous as that machinery may now appear to us, it was contrived with considerable skill. The real news-writer was surrounded with a hundred difficulties and perils. The "Tatler" pretended that he was obliged to keep "an ingenious man" to go daily to the coffee-houses to pick up his intelligence; and no doubt such was the mode in which the greater part of the news of the "Observator," of the "Postboy," of the "Flying Post," of the "News Letter," was concocted. The news-writer was shut out of the House of Lords and out of the House of Commons; he never went into the law courts, for, except on great occasions, the people took no interest in their proceedings; he ran extreme risk in giving any political news, for the "publisher of false news" was a person for whom the pillory was an especial terror; he had no correspondents in distant parts of England; at the beginning of the century, Stamford and Norwich were the only towns that had their especial papers, from which he could transfer their meagre paragraphs about a murder or an execution; Scotland and Ireland had as little intelligence to furnish the London journalist as had the American colonies: and so the coffee-house, with its rumors about public events, became the "Staple of Newes," and the discreet reporter always prefaced his information with "We hear," "It is said," "There is a talk," "They continue to say." The cheap tract-writer tasked his imagination to produce much more exciting narratives than the dull paragraph-monger. The pamphleteer was the "penny-a-liner" of the time of the "Tatler." He had the same inexhaustible materials to work upon as the "penny-a-liner" of our own time; although the mode in which this form of genius is now developed is somewhat changed. He of the earlier day is thus described: "His brain, which was his estate, had as regular and different produce as other men's land. From the beginning of November until the opening of the campaign he writ pamphlets and letters to members of parliament or friends in the country. But sometimes he would relieve his ordinary readers with a murder, and lived comfortably a week or two upon strange and lamentable accidents. A little before the armies took the field, his way was to open your attention with a prodigy; and a monster, well writ, was two guineas the lowest price. This prepared his readers for his great and bloody news from Flanders in June and July." † Steele tried to interest the town in a different way. The worthy quidnunc, attracted by the name of Bickerstaff, to which name Swift had given popularity, gladly received the first number of the "Tatler," which was delivered without charge, or he expended a penny when the "gratis stock" of the first number was exhausted. But he must have been wonderfully surprised when reading the opening "relation of the passages which occur in action or discourse throughout this town," he found a brief narrative of "the deplorable condition of a very pretty gentleman," which article "may be of great instruction to all who actually are, or who ever shall be, in love."

The "Athenian Gazette" of the eccentric bookseller, John Dunton, had given the public of the time of William III. some notion of a weekly paper without politics. It professed to resolve "all the most nice and curious questions proposed by the ingenious;" but it fell far short of the magnificent intention of its projector, "to raise the soul, as 'twere, into daylight, and restore the knowledge of truth and happiness." ‡ It commenced in 1691, and was continued till 1696—a jumble of quaint nonsense with occasional gleams of meaning. The "Review" of Defoe appeared, in penny weekly numbers, five years before the "Tatler." It was subsequently issued twice a week. The "Review" was principally occupied by Defoe's earnest speculations on political affairs. It also contained lighter matters, in describing the proceedings of a "Scandal Club." Some of these papers on manners are valuable, chiefly because their writer looked upon the town from another point of view than that of the wits and gossipers of the coffee-houses. But he saw only the broader aspects of society; felt little interest in its amusements; despised its frivolities; and confined his observation to the green pastures of virtue and wisdom, and the sands and morasses of vice and folly, without caring much for that great border-land which supplied "human nature's daily food." Defoe was no model for Steele, although the honor of being the leader in the march of the essayists has been assigned to him. Defoe was indeed the only writer of high talent who first saw the power of the periodical mode of publication. Dunton had preceded Defoe in this discovery, which ultimately revolutionized the entire system of our lighter literature, and turned an age of pamphlets into an age of magazines and miscellanies. The mode of continuous publication, under one title, converted the political tracts into Reviews and Examiners. Defoe saw the advantage of furnishing small quantities of printed thought to a nation not greatly advanced in the mere ability to read—to say nothing of the general indisposition of the gentry and the mercantile class to read anything which did not thoroughly address itself to their religious and political sympathies. Defoe would find his readers in the dissenting congregations, however some might differ from him. He found them, too, in those honest thinkers who took no lead in politics, with whom England has ever abounded. While there were too many tricksters in high places conducting the affairs of the nation, there were many who were taking that common-sense view of public measures which the opinion of a people habitually free very commonly takes — that the prosperity and happiness of communities is not wholly dependent upon which party is in or which party is out of office. Defoe addressed his "Review" to men who clung to the great principles of civil liberty and religious toleration, and were therefore essentially Whigs. But he offended Dissenters and Whigs by his differences with them upon many points; and he was, therefore, a better representative of the few who thought for themselves. Steele, on the other hand, addressed himself in the "Tatler," to the far larger class who had not very strong political or religious convictions, and who were glad to find a new kind of literature set on foot that, on the face of it, promised amusement rather than instruction. In a very short time the articles of foreign intelligence from "St. James's coffee-house" became rarer and rarer. With Tournay, and Malplaquet, and Mons, the news department of the "Tatler" seems to have been closed. The approaching return of the Duke of Marlborough to England is announced in its news on the 1st of November. There is an arrival of more importance to his interests which Mr. Bickerstaff does not announce. Addison has come to town from Ireland. He has made a few contributions to Steele's penny paper. He has discovered his true powers as a writer; and he will unite henceforward with honest Dick in making that half-sheet, which is dispatched from London three times a week, on every post day of Tuesday, Thursday, and Saturday, a vehicle for instructing the people without setting-up for instructors, and for amusing the people without condescending to be ribalds. We have it on record that the "Tatler" found its way into the fens of Lincolnshire, under the auspices of Maurice Johnson, a native of Spalding, who had some literary and antiquarian tastes. He labored to form a reading society in that very uncongenial district. "Taking care not to alarm the country gentlemen by any premature mention of antiquities, he endeavored at first to allure them into the more flowery paths of literature. In 1709 a few of them were brought together every post day, at the coffee-house in the abbey-yard; and after one of the party had read aloud the last published number of the 'Tatler,' they proceeded to talk over the subject among themselves." *

The "Spectator" was read in a similar manner by the gentlemen of Spalding. This successor of the "Tatler" commenced March 1st, 1711, and was published daily—a circumstance which at once exhibits the confidence of the writers in their power to interest a very miscellaneous class of readers, and the fertility of the soil, hitherto so barren, which they proposed to cultivate. The "Guardian" succeeded the "Spectator," and was also published daily. It was fortunate for the circulation of these works that the better regulation of the post had not been neglected by the government, amid their party conflicts. The statute of 1710 made the delivery of letters to Edinburgh and Dublin more regular, by establishing chief letter-offices in those cities, and having a more equal charge for England. Thus, with a blank leaf for adding private correspondence to the printed matter, the "Tatler" was circulated in English provincial towns. In Perthshire even, when "the gentlemen met after church on Sunday to discuss the news of the week, the 'Spectators' were read as regularly as the 'Journal.'" *

At the opening of the last parliament of the reign of Anne, when the member for Stockbridge rose to second the nomination of Sir Thomas Hanmer as speaker, he was saluted by some of the Tory squires with cries of "Tatler! Tatler!" It was not with the intent to honor the new Whig member that these knights of the shire, and patrons of decayed boroughs, uttered the one word which has associated his name with the memory of the pleasantest, the most influential, and on many accounts the most original, branch of the literature of what is called our Augustan age. By the side of Richard Steele sat, on the same opposition benches, his friend and fellow-laborer, Joseph Addison. He must have smiled to hear the race of fox-hunters yelping out in their ignorant pride such a reproach as this against one who, under the name of Bickerstaff, never designed to give any man any secret wound by his concealment; and who, at the close of his work, published his name to his writings, and gave himself up to the mercy of the town, with all his imperfections on his head.† Addison himself, Swift tells us, was so popular, that when he was elected to a parliament in which the Tories carried it six to one, his election passed "easy and undisputed; and I believe, if he had a mind to be king, he would hardly be refused."‡ What gave Addison to a great extent this popularity? That which the squires thought a reproach. He and his coadjutor Steele had opened for the people such fountains of playful humor, of gentle satire, of familiar criticism, of tolerant morality, that they had become to their readers as personal friends. The "Tatler," and "Spectator," and "Guardian," had appeared at a time when the High Churchmen were urging to religious hatred, and the right-divine parliament men were trying to back the old state coach into the sloughs from which the revolution had dragged it. Under their periodical companionship, many a fiery Templar was calmed by the pleasant lessons that he read as he sipped his morning chocolate; and many a court beauty was taught that there were more graceful and enduring charms than those of the female politician. Steele and Addison produced a permanent influence upon their age, because, in this new journalism, they mingled as little as possible with the temporary animosities of the age. They kept their politics for the "Whig Examiner" and the "Englishman." The Tory squires, who despise the penny literature which was the delight of old and young, of the London coffee-house and the provincial club, have passed to their natural obscurity. Steele has "Tatler" written upon his tomb as his greatest glory.

Johnson has said, and his opinion may be taken with very slight qualification, "Before the 'Tatler' and 'Spectator,' if the writers for the theatre are excepted, England had no masters of common life." He adds, "We had many books to teach us more important duties, and to settle opinions in philosophy and politics." Addison himself, in his "Freeholder," a series of "political essays," while maintaining that "papers of entertainment" might be advantageously mixed with graver speculations upon state topics, has recorded his own view of what he and his coadjutors accomplished in the "'Tatlers' and 'Spectators,'" which, he says, "were so generally dispersed in single sheets and have since been printed in so great numbers. . . . They diverted raillery from improper objects, and gave a new turn to ridicule, which for many years had been exerted on persons and things of a sacred and serious nature. . . . Our nation are such lovers of mirth and humor, that it is impossible for detached papers, which come out on stated days, either to have a general run, or long continuance, if they are not diversified, and enlivened from time to time, with subjects and thoughts accommodated to this taste, which so prevails among our countrymen. No periodical author, who always maintains his gravity, and does not sometimes sacrifice to the graces, must expect to keep in vogue for any considerable time." * Nothing but the remarkable talents of Steele and Addison, their knowledge of human nature, and their kindly dispositions, could have made their ridicule of transient follies of any permanent value. In avoiding the bitter exaggerations of the professed satirist, they give us real pictures of the every-day life of their time. In presenting what the old dramatists called humors, they offer us something of higher art than caricatures of individuals who have no features in common with their fellow-men. They exhibit to us the representatives of classes. But these first and greatest of the essayists have a further especial value in our eyes. They reflect the general character of the education of the people in the first quarter of the eighteenth century. "Papers of entertainment," said Addison, "are necessary to increase the number of readers, especially among those of different notions and principles." The "Tatler" and "Spectator," and "Guardian," addressed themselves to the largest number of those who had the ability and the leisure to read. The whole tone of these books shows how limited the number was, and how necessary it became to deal with the higher parts of knowledge in the most familiar manner, and to advocate the noblest interests of religion and morals in the pleasantest spirit. Johnson has truly said, speaking of the time when Addison and Steele hit upon their vocation as popular instructors, "Men, not professing learning, were not ashamed of ignorance; and in the female world any acquaintance with books was distinguished only to be censured." The cheap periodical literature of our own day, taken as a whole, does not address a less-educated class than those addressed in the same manner during the last four years of Anne. The difference is that with us the readers have been multiplied a hundredfold.

"It is a great pity," writes Addison in 1713, "there should be no knowledge in a family. For my own part, I am concerned, when I go into a great house where perhaps there is not a single person that can spell, unless it be by chance the butler or one of the footmen. What a figure is the young heir likely to make, who is a dunce both by father's and mother's side?" † There was a system of education for the humble then in progress, which gave the butler and the footman this advantage over the other inmates of the great house. The institution of charity-schools appeared to the essayist the most proper means to recover the age "out of its present degeneracy and depravation of manners;" and to promise that "there will be few in the next generation who will not at least be able to write and read, and have not had an early tincture of religion." ‡ How imperfectly this promise was realized during the eighteenth century, under the charity-school system, we had melancholy proofs. But we cannot look without admiration upon the judicious mode in which the first essayists endeavored to diffuse some desire for knowledge, and some taste for the higher efforts of genius, throughout a nation with whom superior rank and riches did not necessarily infer a more liberal cultivation of the mind than among those who labored for their bread. They pursued the only wise and safe course. They made no attempts to deal with the abstruse parts of learning, by addressing themselves to the few; nor to lower themelves to what the pedants would deem the popular capacity, in writing for the many. In an essay attributed to Gay we find how entirely the writings of the "Tatler" "have convinced our fops and young fellows of the value and advantages of learning;" and in a poem of 1712 we are told that the ladies, under the influence of Steele, "aspire to write correct, and spell;" and that in their familiar letters we no longer find "Wurthee Surr." §

Nothing would more surprise us in the contents of a periodical paper of our own time, not addressed exclusively to children, than to find the most familiar passages from the great poets presented to its readers as novelties. In the conduct of the early numbers of the "Tatler," Steele evidently assumed that the literary acquirements of his subscribers had not extended to Shakespeare or Milton; and that it was desirable to approach these obscure writers by a tentative process. As a help to a right judgment of actors for "the less learned part of the audience," we have Hamlet's instructions to the players given at length. * The description of Dover Cliff, in "Lear," "drawn with such proper incidents," is duly set forth. † Passages of "Henry IV.," of "Richard III.," of "Othello," are given as if they had all the charm of freshness for the greater number. And they really had this charm for most readers. The fourth folio edition of Shakespeare was published in 1685; the next edition, that of Rowe, appeared in the same year as the "Tatler." In very sensible and genial morsels of criticism upon "Macbeth" and "Julius Cæsar," Steele quotes from his stage memory, as if no printed copy of the tragedies was accessible to him. His enthusiastic commendation of Betterton, as the great interpreter of Shakespeare's characters, points to the sources of his criticism. Steele preceded Addison in calling attention to Milton. He frequently quotes from "Paradise Lost;" and he transcribes "a passage in a mask writ by Milton," which, he says, "made me forget my age, and renewed in me the warm desires after virtue, so natural to uncorrupted youth." ‡ But the first strenuous attempt to make the people of the reign of Anne fully impressed with the value of the great poet who had scarcely been heard in his own day, amid "the barbarous dissonance of Bacchus and his revellers," was reserved for Addison. Yet in his famous series of papers on the "Paradise Lost," he had approached his subject with evident disinclination to hazard any heterodox opinion of the comparative merits of the ancients and the moderns. If the "Paradise Lost" falls short of the "Æneid" or the "Iliad" in the power of working on the imagination, "it proceeds rather from the fault of the language in which it is written than from any defect of genius in the author." § Addison, however, did admirably what he undertook to do; and he very wisely avoided what the learned Doctor Hurd complained that he did not do. He avoided metaphysical criticism; he did not attempt "to lay open the more secret and hidden springs of that pleasure which results from poetical composition." What Addison did, this grand philosophical critic thinks to be a very poor thing: "For what concerns his criticism on Milton in particular, there was this accidental benefit arising from it, that it occasioned an admirable poet to be read, and his excellences to be observed." All honor be to him who left the pedants to their own proper labors, and set manfully about his great duty of elevating the tastes and refining the manners of the people. Addison had very early professed a contempt for "all men of deep learning without common-sense"—the "editors, commentators, interpreters, scholiasts, and critics"—such as "set a greater value on themselves for having found out the meaning of a passage in Greek, than upon the author for having written it; nay, will allow the passage itself not to have any beauty in it, at the same time that they would be considered as the greatest men of the age for having interpreted it." ‖ These were the natural haters of literature for the people. While they would "write volumes upon an idle sonnet that is originally in Greek or Latin, give editions of the most immoral authors, and spin out whole pages upon the various readings of a lewd expression," they sneered at Addison for pointing out the beauties of "The Children in the Wood" and of "Chevy Chase." The pedants were joined by "the little conceited wits of the age," in ridiculing discourses upon old ballads that had only been "the delight of the common people."

Taking a broad view of the objects and tendency of these works, so especially characteristic of their age, we believe that they produced a far greater effect upon the intellectual and moral progress of the community by their cultivation of a taste for agreeable and healthful literature, than by their direct attacks upon vice and folly. Not the least of their services was to meet, in however limited a degree, that craving for fiction, which is even stronger among the imperfectly educated than among those of higher refinement. It has been said that "no novel, giving a lively and powerful picture of the common life and manners of England, had appeared" before the time of the "Spectator;" that the narrative which connects together these essays "gave to our ancestors their first taste of an exquisite and untried pleasure;" and that, in this point of view, Addison is entitled "to be considered as the forerunner of the great English novelists." ¶ The famous Club of the "Spectator" thus referred to, was, in its original features, the creation of Steele. It was for Addison to work out many of its most refined delineations of character; but Steele, who had a wider range of observation, first produced to the admiring world Sir Roger de Coverley. Addison mitigated some of the coarser features of this favorite of mankind; and in his picture we recognize few traces of the fine gentleman who "had often supped with my Lord Rochester and Sir George Etherege, fought a duel upon his first coming to town, and kicked Bully Dawson in a public coffee-house." Steele gave the outline of the member of the Inner Temple, "who was placed there to study the laws of the land, and is the most learned of any of the house in those of the stage." Steele created Sir Andrew Freeport, who "calls the sea the British common," and can prove "that diligence makes more lasting acquisitions than valor." It is to Steele we owe the brave and modest Captain Sentry, who "is never overbearing, though accustomed to command men in the utmost degree below him; nor ever too obsequious from a habit of obeying men highly above him." Steele called up Will Honeycomb, who has all his life dressed well, knows the history of every mode, and is proud to have "received a kind glance or blow of the fan from some celebrated beauty, mother of the present Lord Such-a-one." Lastly, it was Steele who conceived that beautiful sketch of the clergyman, who seldom comes to the club; "but when he does he adds to every one else a new enjoyment of himself;" who is of too weak health to accept preferment; but who, without obtruding serious reflections, excites in his associates "an earnestness to have him fall on some divine topic." The essayist exultingly says, "These are my ordinary companions."

Sir Roger de Coverley is by far the most renowned member of the Spectator's Club, but he is rarely produced in the club. It is in the country that the baronet is exhibited in his native glory. We are all familiar with his domestic establishment; with his description of his ancestors; with his deportment at church; with his adventure with the gypsies; with his field sports; with his importance at the assizes. We have ventured to suggest that the portrait of Sir Roger may be taken for as just a representation of the country gentleman of the reign of Anne and of William III. as some eloquent descriptions which exhibit his class as wholly steeped in ignorance and debauchery.* If Sir Roger had been a Whig we might have somewhat suspected the truth of the likeness. His Toryism, painted with the most delicate art, is not even made ridiculous. His prejudices are so natural that they almost command our respect. He is a much stronger Tory in the country than in town. He is brought into a gentle conflict of principles with Sir Andrew Freeport, who is naturally inclined to the moneyed interest, while Sir Roger as naturally leans to the landed interest. "This humor is so moderate in each of them, that it proceeds no farther than to an agreeable raillery, which very often diverts the rest of the club."† Sir Roger is a thorough patriot. He exults in the glorious names of Henry V. and Queen Elizabeth, when he sees their tombs in Westminster Abbey. When he is rowed to Vauxhall by the waterman who had lost a leg in the battle of La Hogue, "the knight, in the triumph of his heart, made several reflections on the greatness of the British nation: as, that one Englishman could beat three Frenchmen; that we could never be in danger of popery so long as we took care of our fleet; that the Thames was the noblest river in Europe; that London Bridge was a greater piece of work than any of the seven wonders of the world; with many other honest prejudices which naturally cleave to the heart of a true Englishman." There is not a more charming incident in the traits of character and manners which are evolved out of the Spectator's Club, than the description of the mode in which the members receive the news of Sir Roger de Coverley's death. He had, some weeks before he died, sent a book by the carrier, to be given to Sir Andrew Freeport in his name. "Sir Andrew, opening the book, found it to be a collection of Acts of Parliament. There was in particular the Act of Uniformity, with some passages in it marked by Sir Roger's own hand. Sir Andrew found that they related to two or three points which he had disputed with Sir Roger, the last time he appeared at the club. Sir Andrew, who would have been merry at such an incident on another occasion, at the sight of the old man's handwriting burst into tears, and put the book into his pocket."‡ Addison, speaking of the political and religious prejudices of his time, as exhibited in the country districts especially, says, "I am sometimes afraid that I discover the seeds of a civil war in these divisions." Gradually the extended intercourse of Whig and Tory, of churchman and dissenter, made the Sir Rogers and the Sir Andrews wiser than their ancestors; and it is not without reason that we may believe that such lay preachers as Addison and Steele had no inconsiderable influence in making their countrymen ashamed of "such a spirit of dissension" as rendered them "in a manner barbarous toward one another." Other animosities, other passions and prejudices, succeeded those of the generation in which these kindly moralists flourished. But their humanizing lessons have always been capable of a general application; and to the gradual spread of that education of high and humble, which they began by popularizing literature, we may attribute the fact that, although Englishmen differ as keenly upon public subjects, they have long ceased to hate, as their forefathers hated.

The little tales of Steele in the "Tatler" also gave "the first taste of an exquisite and untried pleasure." There is material in every one of these simple and touching stories capable of expansion into several chapters of the modern writers of fiction; and yet they are so perfect, according to their own theory of art, that they must have set many a young imagination shaping forth scenes and dialogues to fill up the well-defined outline. In Steele's six or seven tragical sketches, the absence of elaboration, the directness with which we reach the catastrophe, give an impression of reality, such as we receive from the best passages of Defoe. The oriental tales and the allegories of Addison have their own charm, and exhibit the elegance of his taste and the beauty of his style. But we must honestly confess that we would rather have been the writer of "Inkle and Yarico" than of the "Vision of Mirza."

Looking at the united labors of Steele and Addison as a whole, we are astonished not only at the variety of their productions, but at the continuity of their periodical contributions from the spring of 1709 to the autumn of 1713, with very slight cessation. Of the "Tatler," "Spectator," and "Guardian," Steele wrote five hundred and ten papers; Addison wrote three hundred and sixty-nine. What a void did these two associates fill up, when they opened the fountains of their learning, of their experience, of their humor, of their imagination, to delight a people who had almost forgotten the noble literature of a century earlier, and had very little to attract them, and less to improve, in the literature of their own time. For women, especially, studies "for delight, for ornament, and for use" were almost unknown. The "Tatler" proposed to take into serious consideration the means of forming "a Female Library"—to recommend "a collection of books that shall consist of such authors as do not corrupt while they divert."* Steele never carried out his notion. Addison took up the idea, designing "to recommend such particular books as may be proper for the improvement of the sex." His intention equally failed. But Addison gave a catalogue of books which he found in the library of a lady of more than common education. Some few she had bought for her own use, but most had been got together "either because she had heard them praised, or because she had seen the authors of them." This may account for "Sir Isaac Newton's works" being there; and "Locke on the Human Understanding, with a paper of patches in it." "The lady's own reading has lain very much among romances;" and accordingly we find in this curious library, "Cassandra," "Cleopatra," "Astræa," "The Grand Cyrus." These were the famous translations, each in enormous folios, or in a dozen duodecimo volumes, from the French of Monsieur Calprenede, or of Mademoiselle Scudery. Their interminable stupidity was scarcely driven out till Richardson and Fielding appeared. But common-sense dawned upon the readers for amusement when the essayists came; and from the publication of the "Tatler," "Spectator," and "Guardian," we may date the general taste for reading which has gradually spread throughout our land.

The "men of genius and learning" who were contemporaries of Addison and Steele rendered no considerable assistance to their admirable design of affording instruction and entertainment to a larger class of readers than "men of genius and learning" had previously thought worthy of their care. Swift only contributed two entire papers to the "Tatler" and "Spectator," with some dozen fragments. Congreve wrote one article in the "Tatler." Parnell furnished two essays to the "Spectator" and two to the "Guardian." Berkeley was a more diligent friend, having in the "Guardian" fourteen excellent papers on the sceptical opinions of the time. Of Pope's writing we find two articles in the "Spectator" and eight in the 'Guardian." Of men of inferior note there are here and there an essay. The organization of periodical literature was at that time very imperfect. Ephemeral verse-makers could obtain a guinea from a bookseller for an occasional ode, or a political satire. Two guineas for a "Letter to a Noble Lord" was the reward which Grub Street bestowed upon its patriots. Addison, in the "Tatler" already quoted, has a pleasant account of "a general dealer"—intended, we may guess, for Tom D'Urfey. "The merry rogue said, when he wanted a dinner, he sent a paragraph of Table Talk, and his bookseller, upon sight, paid the reckoning." The humble gains of these caterers for public taste were rendered more uncertain by the roguerie of piratical publishers, who were as unscrupulous toward authors using the same tongue as if the breadth of the Atlantic had legalized their frauds. The famous "Act for the encouragement of learning," under which the term and other conditions of copyright subsisted for a century, was passed in that session of the parliament of Anne which began on the 13th of November, 1709. On the 1st of December Addison, with the evident desire to promote this enactment for the benefit of literature, wrote a paper in the "Tatler," which thus commences: "The progress of my intended account of what happened when justice visited mortals, is at present interrupted by the observation and sense of an injustice against which there is no remedy, even in a kingdom more happy in the care taken of the liberty and property of the subject than any other nation upon earth." That injustice was perpetrated by "men who are rogues within the law, . . . a set of wretches we authors call pirates, who print any book, poem, or sermon, as soon as it appears in the world, in a smaller volume, and sell it, as all other thieves do stolen goods, at a cheaper rate." The statute which was passed a few months afterward sets forth the same fraudulent practice, and gives to authors a limited enjoyment of their own property, which, under the common law, was held to endure forever. But the common law did not give a prompt remedy against piracy, which was attained by the statute of Anne. It is from the passing of this act that we may date the slow but certain establishment of literature as a profession, deriving its support, like every other branch of industry, under the general laws of demand and supply. Addison, whose writings had procured for him lucrative offices, not only thinks that authors ought to have "the benefit that may arise from their writings, but that it has happened, and may often happen, that men of learning and virtue cannot qualify themselves for public employment or preferment." He therefore comes to this sound conclusion: "I have brought myself to consider things in so unprejudiced a manner that I esteem more a man who can live by the products of his understanding than one who does it by the favor of great men." * During the reign of Anne "the favor of great men" was the ruling idea of those who devoted their lives to authorship. Next to the service that was rendered to literature by passing the Copyright Act was the real elevation of the literary character by the contempt for letters of George I. and Sir Robert Walpole. The writer who attempted to "live by the products of his understanding" alone, had a terrible state of transition to pass through before he was equally free from "the patron and the gaol." But he finally rose above the condition of "the hirelings in garrets, at hard meat," described by Roger North; we even think far above the "artificial encouragement of a vast system of bounties and premiums," which supplied "the deficiency of the natural demand for literature." † We cannot conceive any more practical humiliation of genius and learning than the vaunted modes of their patronage in what is complacently called the Augustan age. Prior is sent abroad as an ambassador; Addison becomes an under-secretary of state; Swift obtains the deanery of St. Patrick. Congreve, Rowe, Hughes, Philips, Stepney, had lucrative appointments. How great the deserts! How munificent the rewards! The notion is that these eminent gainers of high prizes met their patrons upon thoroughly independent terms. Was it so? Swift, indeed, always affects to be greater than the men to whom he was paying court. He fancies he is standing up for the dignity of letters, when he takes Parnell to Oxford's levee, and the great lord treasurer is civil to him. "I value myself upon making the ministry desire to be acquainted with Parnell, and not Parnell with the ministry." * Yet what real meanness is there under all this show of independence! In 1709, before the fall of the Whigs, Swift assails Halifax for preferment in a style that would be ludicrous if it were not contemptible. He congratulates himself upon having "such a solicitor as your lordship." He has no timid reservations. He boldly asks his noble solicitor, "that if you think this gentle winter will not carry off Dr. South, or that his reversion is not to be compassed, your lordship would please to use your credit that, as my Lord Somers thought of me last year for the bishopric of Waterford, so my Lord President may now think on me for that of Cork, if the incumbent dies of the spotted fever he is now under." † There is far more independence in Steele's request to the same patron of letters, that he would be liberal in subscribing to the new edition of the "Tatler:" "If any that your lordship recommends shall think fit to subscribe more than the sum proposed for a book, it may be said that it is for so many more books. This will make the favor more grateful by being conferred in an oblique way, and at the same time save the confusion of the Squire [Bickerstaff], whom I know to be naturally proud." ‡ More honest than the impudent seeker of a prebend or a bishopric, or than the poor and proud essayist who desires a gift "in an oblique way," is Defoe, who tells Halifax that he "scorned to come out of Newgate at the price of betraying a dead master," but thanks him in a straightforward style for "the exceeding bounty I have now received;" and says, "I am a plain and unpolished man, and perfectly unqualified to make formal acknowledgments; and a temper soured by a series of afflictions renders me still the more awkward in the received method of common gratitude. I mean the ceremony of thanks." § The fate of Defoe was that of the great body of the men of letters. They sometimes had a purse tossed to them for a dedication; they had small pay from the booksellers; they starved; and their poverty, more than their dulness, consigned them to the tender mercies of "The Dunciad."

The poets of the reign of Anne, and of the reign of the first George, occupy the most considerable space in the literary history of those times. One half of Johnson's "Lives" is devoted to criticism upon the works of those who flourished in this period. Of that "body of English poetry" which the booksellers had determined to publish, and for which Johnson wrote these "Lives" as a series of prefaces, how much that belongs to this Augustan age is worth looking at, except for the gratification of a literary curiosity to know what was be praised and be-pensioned in those halcyon days? Of these thirty "heirs of fame," who occupy about seven hundred pages of Johnson's biographies, ‖ there are only about seven whom the world has not very "willingly let die." Rowe, Prior, Congreve, Gay, are still talked about. Addison and Swift are read for their prose. Pope is almost the sole name in poetry that is not partially or hermetically sealed up in "the monument of banished minds." Many of those who are rarely now "from the dust of old oblivion raked," were the lucky ones of the earth whom Halifax and Oxford were transforming from ill-paid verse-makers into flourishing commissioners, envoys, and secretaries. The ministers believed that patronage had made the poets—and it was still easier to make the rhymers into sinecurists. These have left few abiding memorials of their age in their odes and epigrams, their songs and love verses, even in their tales, at which court ladies smiled and blushed behind the fan. We may glean from the one great poet of the time some illustrations of the national mind and manners, that are not the less real on account of the coloring which consummate art has bestowed upon them.

The circumstances of Pope's early life were eminently favorable to the attainment of his future excellence. His father, a Roman Catholic, had retired from business with a moderate competence. The precocious boy, after the age of twelve, had to form his own mind, and work out his own aspirations, in his "paternal cell" at Binfield. In this modest dwelling the young poet wrote his "Pastorals," his "Windsor Forest," his "Temple of Fame," his "Essay on Criticism," his "Rape of the Lock." Here his mind was saturated with a love of nature and natural things, held in subjection, indeed, by the powerful acuteness of his reasoning faculties, but running over with imagery, and often with tenderness and passion. We are told, "He set to learning Latin and Greek by himself, about twelve; and when he was about fifteen he resolved that he would go up to London and learn French and Italian."* He received the first encouragement to cultivate his poetical talents from his neighbor Sir William Trumbull, who had been an ambassador and a secretary of state. At sixteen he formed an acquaintance with Wycherley, a man of seventy. He was known at that time to Congreve. At an earlier age he had been taken to a coffee-house to see Dryden. The wonderful lad was not a moping recluse in Windsor Forest, but went into the world, and talked with famous men, who were not mere authors, leaders in high life, qualified by their own experience to display to his eager curiosity some of the best and many of the worst aspects of that region of luxury and wit and profligacy in which they had lived. Pope had a very early training to afford him a far deeper insight into the realities of life than he could have attained in the seclusion of a college or the bustle of a profession. His religious disqualification for place, and his ardent thirst for distinction, sent him to authorship as his proper work for profit and for fame; but his refined tastes and his feeble health saved him from the social perils that attended upon the professional writer. His small patrimony kept him from the shifts and humiliations that then, and long after, were the hard destiny of those who wrote for their daily bread. His resolute application won him higher rewards than literature had ever before won in its own open market. At the beginning of George I.'s reign Halifax offered him a pension, saying that nothing should be demanded of him for it. The young poet had not then earned an independence by his Homer. "I wrote," he says, "to Lord Halifax to thank him for his most obliging offer, saying that I had considered the matter over fully, and that all the difference I could find in having and not having a pension, was, that if I had one I might live more at large in town, and that if I had not, I might live happily enough in the country. . . . So the thing dropped, and I had my liberty without a coach."†

THE "Tatler" and "Spectator" were issued at a time when the ladies of England were among the keenest and noisiest of politicians. One object of the essayists was to lead the fair ones into calmer and pleasanter regions; and we therefore find little notice in their non-political writings of the vagaries which the female mind exhibited about the Church and the Protestant Succession. In the "Freeholder" Addison has several pleasant papers, in which we see the temper that filled many a household with the strifes of unreasoning Tories in hooped petticoats. "Women of this turn," he says, "are so earnest in contending for hereditary right that they wholly neglect the education of their own sons and heirs, and are so taken up with their zeal for the Church that they cannot find time to teach their children the Catechism. . . . Such is our misfortune that we sometimes see a pair of stays ready to burst with sedition, and hear the most masculine passions expressed in the sweetest voices."‡ In another paper he says, "As our English ladies are at present the greatest stateswomen in Europe, they will be in danger of making themselves the most unamiable part of their sex, if they continue to give a loose to intemperate language, and to a low kind of ribaldry, which is not used among the women of fashion in any other country."* We must ascribe a great deal of this disposition to engage in party conflicts to the absence of occupations of an intellectual character, which might engage the women of the beginning of the eighteenth century. In condemning their political extravagances, the "Freeholder" does not attempt to address them as persons qualified to estimate the relative merits of opposite opinions. When he points out to the fair enemies of the Protestant Succession what they sacrifice by their disloyalty to the house of Brunswick, he tells them that they cannot go to court; that they forego the advantage of birthday suits; that they are forced to live in the country, and feed their chickens. "The women of England should be on the side of the Freeholder, and enemies to the person who would bring in arbitrary government and popery," because, "as there are several of our ladies who amuse themselves in the reading of travels, they cannot but take notice what uncomfortable lives those of their own sex lead where passive obedience is professed and practised in the utmost perfection." Arbitrary power spoils the shape of the foot in China; hurries the Indian widow to her husband's funeral pile; makes the daughters of Eve in Persia mere chattels; gives a woman the twelfth share of a husband in the dominions of the Grand Turk; and renders them the slaves of duennas and gouvernantes in Spain and Italy. The ladies of England ought not to encourage the Roman Catholic religion, because a fish diet spoils the complexion; and a "whole Lent would give such a sallowness to the celebrated beauties of this island as would scarce make them distinguishable from those of France."† Much of this, no doubt, is the banter of the great humorist; but the ladies deserved it, who set a mark upon their faces to proclaim their politics, the fair Tories being "obliged by their principles to stick a patch on the most unbecoming side of their foreheads."‡ They could scarcely be addressed in any other style, when the whole time of the greater number was engrossed by idle visiting and ridiculous amusements. "I think," says Steele, "most of the misfortunes in families arise from the trifling way the women have in spending their time, and gratifying only their eyes and ears, instead of their reason and understanding." It must be remembered that the domestic accomplishments of the English lady were then almost unknown. Not one house in ten thousand contained a harpsichord, while in our days a pianoforte is as common as a sofa. Pope had borrowed, or hired, a harpsichord; and during a temporary absence from his house at Twickenham, his fashionable neighbor, Lady Mary Wortley Montagu, desired a loan from him of the same cumbrous box of wires, which request the poet was unable to grant. Of the arts of design the best educated female had no conception. The greater number of fashionable women "spend their hours in an indolent state of body and mind, without either recreations or reflections." Stimulants, if we may believe the censor, were sometimes restored to: "Palestris, in her drawing-room, is supported by spirits, to keep off the return of spleen and melancholy, before she can get over half of the day, for want of something to do; while the wench in the kitchen sings and scours from morning to night."§ We can scarcely impute the extravagances of female dress in Anne's reign to the defects of education; for in our age, when reading is universal, and every woman, not wholly condemned to be a domestic drudge, has other salutary modes of occupation always at hand, the absurdities at which the satirists unceasingly laughed a hundred and fifty years ago have again come round. Is it Mr. Bickerstaff, or is it Mr. Punch, who published "The humble petition of William Jingle, coachmaker," showing that the petticoats of ladies being too wide to enter into any coach in use before their invention, he has contrived "a coach for the reception of one lady only, who is to be let in at the top"? Is it in 1709, or in 1859, that the prevailing fashion is thus described? "The design of our great-grandmothers in this petticoat was to appear much bigger than the life, for which reason they had false shoulder-blades, like wings, and the ruff, to make the upper and lower parts of their bodies appear proportionable; whereas the figure of a woman in the present dress bears the figure of a cone, which is the same with that of an extinguisher.

with a little knob at the upper end, and widening downward till it ends in a basis of most enormous circumference." * There must be something of innate virtue in the hooped petticoat, now called by the pretty name of crinoline. It lasted in various forms through the reigns of the first and second Georges; kept its place, to the amusement of the profane vulgar, on court days, till a very recent period; and has now started up, to the terror of all those of the male creation who cannot afford "a coach for the reception of one lady only."

In the period from the restoration to the middle of the eighteenth century there was unquestionably a very low estimate of the female character. In theatrical representations of life there was scarcely an attempt to exhibit a woman of sense and modesty. The high ideal of female excellence which we find in Shakespeare, and which to a certain extent he must have derived from the realities of the age of Elizabeth, could scarcely be expected from the Drydens and Farquhars and Wycherleys and Congreves of the age of the revolution. We can scarcely look to the stage of their time for Perditas and Violas, and Imogens. If some of its women had the wit and address of Beatrice and Rosalind, they had the profligacy and cunning which made their cleverness hateful. Congreve, who did as much as any dramatist to render the female character odious, has a somewhat remarkable paper in the "Tatler," in which he says, "It is not to be supposed that it was a poverty of genius in Shakespeare that his women made so small a figure in his dialogues." How diligently must Congreve have studied Shakespeare to have made this discovery! He goes on to say, "But it certainly is, that he drew women as they were then in life; for that sex had not in those days that freedom of conversation; and their characters were only that they were mothers, sisters, daughters, and wives." Was it really true of the age of the author of the "Old Bachelor," "Double Dealer," "Love for Love," and "Way of the World," that, as he and others have shown, the mothers were careless of their children, that the sisters were plotting against each other, that the daughters were undutiful, that the wives were adulteresses? As an essayist he then draws the character of "the divine Aspasia," whose "countenance is the lively image of her mind, which is the seat of honor, truth, compassion, knowledge, and innocence"—a lady who "adds to the severity and privacy of the last age all the freedom and ease of this." It is pleasant to find one exception to the ladies of Congreve's own time—"shining wits and politicians, virtuosæ, freethinkers, and disputants." When Shakespeare "drew women as they were then in life," according to the creator of the Miss Prues and Lady Touchwoods, "vanity had quite another turn, and the most conspicuous woman at that time of day was only the best housewife." † It was some years before the domestic virtues as exhibited on the stage came to be regarded in any other point of view than as tiresome, if not ridiculous. But a sense of decency, denoting something more of respect for the female character, was slowly growing; and this is in some degree an evidence that the female character was itself improving. The great ladies ceased to be painted as profligate intriguers; and the citizens' wives as looking for licentious adventures in their masks. The "Tatler" originally professed to devote particular attention to the stage; and Steele had an especial relish for the theatre, with a keen sense of dramatic excellence. In the first week of the existence of the new journal, we have notices of two plays, whose wit, in the view of those times, redeemed them from the shame of their licentiousness. The "Love for Love" of Congreve and the "Country Wife" of Wycherley were tolerated for a century. We can scarcely, therefore, expect Steele to have condemned them, especially when he records that at the performance of "Love for Love," for Betterton's benefit, "there has not been known so great a concourse of persons of distinction: the stage itself was covered with gentlemen and ladies." ‡ There was a third drama which Mr. Bickerstaff notices in his eighth number in a way which absolves him from the charge of having gone along with his age in all its theatrical improprieties. He tells us that a play, whose name is by us scarcely mentionable, was acted "before a suitable audience, who were extremely well diverted with that heap of vice and absurdity;" and he makes "a gentleman of just taste" express his indignation, "upon occasion of seeing human nature fall so low in their delights." Yet that infamous comedy by Edward Ravenscroft, which was first acted in 1682, kept the stage till 1754, being annually performed at Drury Lane and Covent Garden, on Lord Mayor's Day, in ridicule of the London citizens. Garrick, in 1752, had the good taste to break through this custom of presenting, for the gratification of the ignorant and licentious, a picture of manners which was never other than exceptionally true; and which was originally devised to make the libertines of fashion believe that the households of the industrious and thrifty part of the community were as corrupt as their own exclusive circles.

Swift was not, habitually, a libeller of the female character. He was fond of the society of accomplished women. His "Journal to Stella," with much grossness, and some childish talk assuming her inferiority, is not far below what a man of high intellect would address to an intelligent woman who had his confidence. He wrote a paper on "The Education of Ladies," in which he says, "There is a subject of controversy which I have frequently met with in mixed and select companies of both sexes, and sometimes only of men—whether it be prudent to choose a wife who has good natural sense, some taste of wit and humor, able to read and relish history, books of travels, moral or entertaining discourses, and be a tolerable judge of the beauties in poetry? This question is generally determined in the negative by women themselves, but almost universally by we men." It is not banter when he observes "that in this debate, those whom we call men and women of fashion are only to be understood; not merchants, tradesmen, or others of such occupations, who are not supposed to have shared in a liberal education." The essay is incomplete; but Swift evidently inclines to the opinion that a better education of women would be preferable to "the modern way of training up both sexes in ignorance, idleness, and vice." He was a hard censor, and therefore we must receive what he says with much qualification. His "polite conversation" is a caricature. Like many other caricatures, it presents a coarser reality than an exact copy of persons and manners would give; but it may be nevertheless faithful in the same degree as Hogarth's exaggeration of the squint of Wilkes. Lady Smart, Miss Notable, and Lady Answerall would have lost half their raciness if they had been mere inventions of the humorist, and not highly colored recollections of the days when he feasted in the fashionable world of London. When the great ladies are not coarse they are foolish and insipid:

"Lady Smart. Madam, do you love bohea tea?
"Lady Answerall. Why, madam, I must confess I do love it, but it does not love me.
"Miss Notable. Indeed, madam, your ladyship is very sparing of your tea. I protest, the last I took was no more than water bewitched."

The modern kitchen would be ashamed of the trashy talk of the old drawing-room.

In 1712 Pope published his first sketch of the "Rape of the Lock." Though only in his twenty-fourth year, he had been long familiar with the world of letters and of fashion—with the coffee-houses and the saloons. Whether in town or country, Pope habitually lived among what is termed the best society. He was not humiliated by those occasional glimpses of the interior of her temple to which fashion, in our days, sometimes condescends to invite genius. He was an admirer of women, according to that mode which implies the superiority of the admirer in the exuberance of his flattery. His brilliant conversation made him a welcome companion; and his graceful homage, and perhaps even his freedoms, gave him the reputation of a charming correspondent. Ridiculous we know he must sometimes have been, when he appeared in the character of a gay tempter; but his diminutive figure and infirm health perhaps gave him a readier admission to female confidence than the handsome Congreves and Wycherleys had attained. His intimacy with the fair ones does not appear, on the whole, to have won them his respect. He walked by moonlight in the gardens of Hampton Court with the maid of honor, Mary Lepell; and he sat with duchesses in their barges on the Thames, listening to "music on the water." But he came to the conclusion that in women only two passions "divide the kind"—

"The love of pleasure and the love of sway."

Pope, in the dedication of the "Rape of the Lock" to its heroine, Miss Arabella Fermor, says "it was intended only to divert a few young ladies, who have good sense and good humor enough to laugh not only at their sex's little unguarded follies, but at their own.

. . . The character of Belinda, as it is now managed, resembles you in nothing but in beauty." The guardian-sylph has hovered over Belinda in her morning-dream; and he has whispered in her ear words which are not complimentary to the modesty or sense of women; but they are meant as compliments. Belinda is waked by her lap-dog, and her "eyes first opened on a billet-doux." The toilet is completed with the aid of "Betty" and the sylphs. "Awful beauty puts on all its charms." In the company of "fair nymphs and well-dressed youths" Belinda is launched on the silver Thames. Ariel and his attendant sprites sit on the sails of "the painted vessel." Their province is to tend the fair; to guard their powder, their essences, and their washes; even in dreams to bestow invention—

"To change a flounce, or add a furbelow."

The gay company repair to Hampton Court:

"In various talk th' instructive hours they pass'd,
Who gave the ball, or paid the visit last;
One speaks the glory of the British queen,
And one describes a charming Indian screen;
A third interprets motions, looks, and eyes;
At every word a reputation dies;
Snuff, or the fan, supply each pause of chat,
With singing, laughing, ogling, and all that."

The game of ombre succeeds; and then comes coffee. The tempting lock is cut off Belinda's hair by an adventurous baron,

"As o'er the fragrant steams she bends her head."

She shrieks, as ladies shriek,

"When husbands or when lap-dogs breathe their last."

Rage, resentment, and despair take possession of her soul. The fierce Thalestris "fans the rising fire." Gnomes come from "the cave of spleen" to make her curse the detested day, when the favorite curl was snatched from her head. A wise monitor, the grave Clarissa, counsels forgiveness and a return to good-humor; but she counsels in vain. Good sense and good-humor are to "preserve what beauty gains"—

"That men may say, when we the front-box grace, Behold the first in virtue as in face."

That men may say! This, then, was the reward of virtue. Duty had no charms of its own:

"Oh! if to dance all night, and dress all day,
Charm'd the small-pox, or chased old age away;
Who would not scorn what housewife's cares produce,
Or who would learn one earthly thing of use?"

Exquisite poem! Was it originally read as a gentle satire, or a true picture, of the ladies of the court of Anne? At twenty-four Pope was not a professed satirist. At forty-seven he wrote his "Epistle to a Lady on the Characters of Women," in which, out of his mature experience, he said,

"Men, some to business, some to pleasure take,
But every woman is at heart a rake."

False as this may be, no satirist would now dare to make the assertion, because a total change of manners has deprived him of such materials for the exercise of his art. We apprehend that there was no want in Pope's age of single figures and groups to be drawn at full length, as he has drawn his Rufa, and Silia, and Narcissa, and Flavia, and Chloe—exceptions to his general rule, that

"Most women have no characters at all."

The essayists have two very marked species of the genus mulier—the coquette and the prude. Steele describes the coquette as "a sect among women of all others the most mischievous." He says, "As a rake among men is the man who lives in the constant abuse of his reason, so a coquette among women is one who lives in continual misapplication of her beauty." According to the same authority, "the prude and the coquette, as different as they appear in their behavior, are in reality the same kind of women. The motive in both is the affectation of pleasing men. They are sisters of the same blood and constitution, only one chooses a grave and the other a light dress. The prude appears more virtuous, the coquette more vicious, than she really is." Addison, in his "Vision of Justice," is scarcely less severe upon the beautiful creatures who come to look into "the mirror of truth." When the real character was shown without regard to the external features, "multitudes started at their own form, and would have broke the glass if they could have reached it. . . . I observed that some few were so humble as to be surprised at their own charms." By way of apology, Addison concludes his paper by expressing his belief that his vision had "not done justice to the sex." He attempts, then, to repair "the partiality and extravagance of his vision," not in his own words, or by quotation from poet of his own age, but in a passage written by one who had formed his notions of woman upon the models of a more heroic time—that which produced Lucy Hutchinson and Anne Fanshawe:

"When I approach
Her loveliness, so absolute she seems
And in herself complete, so well to know
Her own, that what she wills to do or say
Seems wisest, virtuousest, discreetest, best;
All higher knowledge in her presence falls
Degraded; wisdom in discourse with her
Loses discountenanced and like folly shows;
Authority and reason on her wait,
As one intended first, not after made
Occasionally; and, to consummate all,
Greatness of mind, and nobleness, their seat
Build in her loveliest, and create an awe
About her, as a guard angelic plac'd." *

Addison has supposed that his "imaginary historian," in looking back upon the "Spectator's" representations of the "diversions and characters of the English nation," would "make allowance for the mirth and humor of the author." If his words (he says) were interpreted in their literal meaning, "we must suppose that women of the first quality used to pass whole mornings at a puppet-show;" and "that a promiscuous assembly of men and women were allowed to meet at midnight in masks within the verge of the court." We can scarcely imagine that the antiquity or the wit of the puppet-show attracted "women of the first quality." In Ben Jonson's time the puppet-show had a different name:

"'Twas a rare motion to be seen in Fleet Street."

Pepys saw the "puppet-plays" in Covent Garden; and the same performance was exhibited at Whitehall before Charles II. † In the days of the "Spectator," "one Powell" placed his show under the piazzas of Covent Garden. The sexton of the adjacent church of St. Paul complains that when he tolls in for week-day prayers, he finds that his congregation take the warning of the bell, morning and evening, to go to the puppet-show. "I have placed my son at the piazzas, to acquaint the ladies that the bell rings for church, and that it stands on the other side of the garden; but they only laugh at the child." Mrs. Rachel Eyebright has left the church for the puppet-show; and the sexton has lost the fees that gentlemen used to pay to be placed "over against" the fair lady. He has now "none but a few ordinary people, who come to church only to say their prayers." ‡ Powell exhibited Whittington and his cat; and he introduced a pig to dance a minuet with Punch. The town was divided between the attractions of the puppet-show and of the Italian opera. The wits of the time of Anne tried to laugh down what they treated as an absurdity—"that an audience would sit out an evening to hear a dramatical performance written in a language which they did not understand." In their view it was a monstrous practice. "But what makes it more astonishing, it is not the taste of the rabble, but of persons of the greatest politeness which has established it." Addison argues that "if the Italians have a genius for music above the English, the English have a genius for other performances of a much higher nature, and capable of giving the mind a much nobler entertainment." He bitterly complains that the tragedy of "Phædra and Hippolitus"—a dull mythological affair on the French model—was scarcely heard a third time, among a people "so stupidly fond of the Italian opera." The tragedy-writers strove in vain against the new attraction. Addison thought to supplant it by his opera of "Rosamond;" which poem had no success. It failed; because though the dialogue was intelligible, the music was heavy and spiritless. Gay wrote his "Beggar's Opera" in ridicule of the opera of fashion. Its object has long since been forgotten. Its popularity mainly rests upon the charming old English airs to which its songs are adapted.

The Italian opera, once planted in England, has survived the assaults of the witty and the prejudices of the vulgar. It is thoroughly acclimated. The interchange of taste has made that popular which was once only genteel. It is fortunate that a promiscuous assembly of men and women in masks is now wholly confined to the disreputable portion of society. What the masquerade was has been told by Addison with such original humor, in that portion of his essays which is little known, that we may give its leading features without much curtailment.* The Tory fox-hunter comes to town in the second year of George II., and, having travelled all night, arrives about daybreak at Charing Cross. There, "to his great surprise, he saw a running footman carried in a chair, followed by a waterman in the same kind of vehicle. He was wondering at the extravagance of their masters, that furnished them with such dresses and accommodations, when on a sudden he beheld a chimney-sweeper, conveyed after the same manner, with three footmen running before him. During his progress through the Strand he met with several other figures no less wonderful and surprising. Seeing a great many in rich morning gowns, he was amazed to find that persons of quality were up so early; and was no less astonished to see many lawyers in their bar-gowns, when he knew by his almanac that term was ended." Four heads are popped out of a hackney-coach, and seeing the fox-hunter, "with his long whip, horse-hair periwig, jockey-belt, and coat without sleeves, fancied him to be one of the masqueraders on horseback, and received him with a loud peal of laughter." He concluded "that all the persons he saw in these strange habits were foreigners, and received a great indignation against them, for pretending to laugh at an English country-gentleman. But he soon recovered out of his error, by hearing the voices of several of them, and particularly of a shepherdess quarrelling with her coachman, and threatening to break his bones in very intelligible English, though with a masculine tone. His astonishment still increased upon him, to see a continued procession of harlequins, scaramouches, punchinellos, and a thousand other merry dresses, by which people of quality distinguished their wit from that of the vulgar." The worthy squire having observed half a dozen nuns, "who filed off one after another up Katherine Street to their respective convents in Drury Lane," asks a porter what religion these people were of. "The porter replied, 'They are of no religion; 'tis a masquerade.' Upon that, says my friend, I began to smoke that they were a parcel of mummers; and being himself one of the quorum in his own county, could not but wonder that none of the Middlesex justices took care to lay some of them by the heels." A drunken bishop gives dire offence to his spirit of magistracy." But his worship, in the midst of his austerity, was mollified at the sight of a very lovely milkmaid, whom he began to regard with an eye of mercy, and conceived a particular affection for her, till he found, to his great amazement, that the standers-by suspected her to be a duchess."

Young, whose genius as a satirist was munificently rewarded in his own day, scarcely attracts notice in our time, while Pope will never be obsolete. Young was not so finished an artist, but he had looked carefully upon the world around him, and in the last years of George I., when he wrote his "Universal Passion," he looked laughingly upon life—a mood very different from that in which the author of the "Night Thoughts" presents himself—perhaps a more natural mood. We may follow up the notice by the essayists of the puppet-show and the masquerade, by some lines of Young, which describe what women were at a time when the cultivation of their own minds, the education of their children, the attainment of what we call accomplishments, were not the employment of the higher class of ladies—certainly not of those who belonged to the middle ranks:

> "Britannia's daughters, much more fair than nice,
> Too fond of admiration, lose their price;
> Worn in the public eye, give cheap delight
> To throngs, and tarnish to the sated sight;
> As unreserved, and beauteous as the sun,
> Through every sign of vanity they run;
> Assemblies, parks, coarse feasts in city halls,
> Lectures, and trials, plays, committees, balls,
> Wells, Bedlams, executions, Smithfield scenes,
> And fortune-tellers' caves, and lions' dens,
> Taverns, exchanges, bridewells, drawing-rooms,
> Instalments, pillories, coronations, tombs,
> Tumblers and funerals, puppet shows, reviews,
> Sales, races, rabbits, and, still stranger, pews." †

The gentle satire of the essayists against coquettes and prudes might have made affectation less conspicuous. Their laugh against female follies in dress might have somewhat abated the rage for patches, or somewhat diminished the rotundity of the petticoat. Fine ladies might have abstained from the masquerade till it was purified from low company. Persons of quality might have been more careful of the sharper with a pack of cards in his pocket, after Steele's denunciation of the tribe. Ladies at the Bath might have been a little more decorous, when their "ease of conscience" was inferred from the circumstance "that they go directly from church to the gaming-table; and so highly reverence play, as to make it a great part of their exercise on Sundays."* Flagrant vices were not likely to yield quickly to a mild censorship. Drunkenness is one of the objects of their reprehension: "A method of spending one's time agreeably is a thing so little studied, that the common amusement of our young gentlemen, especially of such as are at a distance from those of the first breeding, is drinking." Yet we have abundant evidence that "those of the first breeding" were often the most intemperate. The moralists were not exempt from the common vice of our young gentlemen. Hear Swift: "I dined with Mr. Addison and Dick Stuart, Lord Mountjoy's brother, a treat of Addison's. They were half fuddled, but not I; for I mixed water with my wine, and left them together between nine and ten." † An early hour to leave gentlemen half fuddled, according to our modern computation. "In my own memory," writes Steele, "the dinner has crept by degrees from twelve o'clock to three; and where it will fix nobody knows." ‡ After the wine came the cards. "I dined with Lord Montrath, and carried Lord Mountjoy and Sir Andrew Fountaine with me; and was looking over them at ombre till eleven this evening, like a fool." § The moralists, whether in earnest or not, began to complain, as our own moralists do, of extravagant dinners. Steele exhorts his readers to reconcile themselves to beef and mutton—the diet which bred the hardy race who won the fields of Cressy and Agincourt. The common people keep up the taste of their ancestors. "I would desire my readers to consider what work our countrymen would have made at Blenheim and Ramilies, if they had been fed with kickshaws and ragouts." Bickerstaff dines at a sumptuous table, but despises the larded turkey; turns with disgust from creams and sweetmeats; and could not but smile at the company "cooling their mouths with lumps of ice, which they had just before been burning with salts and peppers." He goes home to finish his dinner in his own fashion; and expresses the same rational wish that many a dinner-giver has expressed, too often without effect, a century and a half after him: "Two plain dishes, with two or three good-natured, cheerful, ingenious friends, would make me more pleased and vain, than all their pomp and luxury can bestow." ‖ The famous dish of the great epicure of his age is known to us through Pope—"Darty's ham-pie." Dartineuf, in Lyttleton's "Dialogues of the Dead," laments that he lived in an age before the glories of turtle. He must have despised Swift, who dined in his company, and afterward said, "We had such fine victuals I could not eat it." The travelled nobleman of the "Dunciad"

> "Tried all hors-d'œuvres, all liqueurs defined, > Judicious drank, and greatly daring dined."

There are some evils which only the increasing good sense of society, under a healthful state of public opinion, will ever cure; and the moralist and the divine may preach against the particular enormity, and it is still as rampant. It was thus that Steele wrote, in his strongest tone, in reprobation of duelling. Again and again he denounced and he ridiculed this diversion of gentlemen. In 1712 the Duke of Hamilton and Lord Mohun fought in Hyde Park, and both were killed—without very great loss to the community. The fashion of duelling died out, when it ceased to be a peculiar privilege of the great to murder each other. When Mrs. Peachum, in the "Beggar's Opera," expresses her opinion that it is a great blessing that they have not had a murder among their gang for seven months, the more experienced Mr. Peachum replies, "What a dickens is the woman always whimpering about murder for? No gentleman is ever looked upon the worse for killing a man in his own defence ; and if business cannot be carried on without it, what would you have a gentleman do ?"

The actual club life of London forms one of the most conspicuous features in the delineations of manners by the great essayists. Their fictitious clubs must have had a broad foundation in reality, to have been as welcome to their contemporaries as they unquestionably were, and to have had such an enduring vitality as they have so long enjoyed. We accept them as perfect representations of the mixed social intercourse of a period when the distinctions of classes were far less rigid than in later times. It was thus that in an age of strong political animosities, and of equally strong religious prejudices, a spirit of friendliness and mutual respect was preserved. There was a large class of non-combatants—the busy lawyer, the careful merchant, the idle man about town—who looked upon politics and polemics rather as a game which Whig and Tory statesmen, and high and low churchmen, and moderate and severe dissenters, were playing, than with much of the feeling of partisans. The clubs opened their arms to the gossipers. The clubs were carrying on the general spread of intelligence more effectually, perhaps, than books. They induced a comparison of thought with thought. The meagre facts of the journalist supplied the text upon which the club politicians argued. It was not an age in which men were indifferent to the great events that were passing around them. The poor and shabby upholsterer that Mr. Bickerstaff encounters in St. James's Park, who eagerly inquires about the King of Sweden, and who is anxious about the mysterious hints of the "Postboy," that a certain prince has been taking measures which time will bring to light, is undoubtedly a type of a large class who "deposed princes, settled the bounds of kingdoms, and balanced the powers of Europe." * The haberdasher at the coffee-house, who "has a levee of more undissembled friends and admirers than most of the courtiers and generals of Great Britain," is of the same genus. "Every man about him has, perhaps, a newspaper in his hand ; but none can pretend to guess what step will be taken in any court of Europe till Mr. Beaver has thrown down his pipe, and declares what measures the allies must enter into upon this new posture of affairs." † Such were the club-oracles of the humbler assemblies of the people, who left the nicer mysteries of state to the October club of the Tories and the Kit-cat club of the Whigs. Steele has delineated with exquisite humor the average club of "heavy honest men, with whom (he says) I have passed many hours with much indolence, though not with great pleasure." The conversation of the club at the Trumpet, in Shire Lane, "is a kind of preparation for sleep." Sir Jeoffrey Notch, a gentleman of an ancient family who has run out of a great estate, talks of hounds, horses, and cock-fighting. Major Matchlock discourses of battles, and "does not think any action in Europe worth talking of since the fight of Marston Moor." Honest old Dick Reptile says to his nephew, "Ay, ay, Jack, you young men think us fools, but we old men know you are." The bencher of the neighboring inn, the greatest wit of the company, has about ten distichs of Hudibras without book ; and when any town frolic is spoken of, "shakes his head at the dulness of the present age, and tells us a story of Jack Ogle." But even among such representatives of social life, who flourished in the reign of Anne, and will endure long after the reign of Victoria, their faculties are opened by conversation. The worthies of the Trumpet appeal to Mr. Bickerstaff for information as "the philosopher ;" and puzzled between the Old Style of England, and the New Style of other nations, Sir Jeoffrey, "upon a dispute what day of the month it was then in Holland, pulled his pipe out of his mouth and cried, 'What does the scholar say to it ?'" ‡

Gaming was the universal passion of the reign of Anne. In the first number of the "Tatler" it is said of Will's Coffee-house, "This place is very much altered since Mr. Dryden frequented it. Where you used to see songs, epigrams, and satires, in the hands of every one you met, you have now only a pack of cards." Into these places of public resort the lowest sharpers found their way ; and gentlemen were not ashamed to stake their money against the money of the most infamous of society. Steele carried on a persevering warfare against the gamesters, for which good service he was threatened with personal injury. Some military men of high rank stood up for him. When two swaggerers came into a coffee-house, and vowed they would cut Captain Steele's throat, Lord Forbes told them, "In this country you will find it easier to cut a purse than cut a throat," and the bullies were incontinently kicked out of the room. One of the reproaches against Steele by his political adversaries in the House of Commons was, that he had presumed to reflect on the manners of noblemen and gentlemen. In his published "Apology" there is a touch of covert satire highly amusing. "It would be a contradiction to all Mr. Steele's past writing to speak to the disadvantage of the nobility and gentry. The war that the 'Tatler' brought upon himself for stigmatizing and expelling sharpers out of their company, is a merit toward them that will outweigh this allegation. That gamesters, knaves, and pickpockets are no longer the men of fashion, or mingled with so good an air among them as formerly, is much owing to Mr. Steele." There never was a better illustration of the principle that vice levels all distinctions. The "people of quality" were not ashamed of their companions till the light of public opinion was let in upon them.

In looking at the general question of the amount of public enlightenment at this period, and indeed throughout the next quarter of a century, it is difficult to draw a line between the acquirements of "the common people" and those of "the persons of quality." The ignorant and dissipated of the upper classes were in no essentials different from the mass of the lower classes, except in their power of commanding a greater amount of vicious pleasures. The theatre, which was open to high and low, was scarcely yet redeemed from the licentiousness which came in with the restoration of the Stuarts. The licentious comedies were the delight of the side-boxes and of the galleries. The masquerade attracted the fair denizens of Arlington Street and of Drury Lane. The Bear Garden was equally the resort of the peer and the carman ; of the beau with his clouded cane and the porter with his knot. The genteel part of the company at the Bear Garden sat on high benches at half-a-crown a seat, while the rabble crowded and swore beneath them in their sixpenny standing-place. All ranks gathered to see "a trial of skill exhibited between two masters of the noble science of defence." The fights of the ring have been brutalizing enough ; but to behold two men cut at each other with broadswords, till one was disabled by severe wounds on the forehead and the leg, was a brutality that was at its height in the Augustan age. The "Spectator" describes the encounter between "James Miller, sergeant, lately come from the frontiers of Portugal," and "Timothy Buck of Clare Market ;" and he records that when the sergeant fell beneath the stroke of his more skilful antagonist, "his wound was exposed to the view of all who could delight in it, and sewed up on the stage." *

The small difference in the intelligence of very different ranks of society, in cases where they were led by traditionary opinions, as in popular superstitions, is very remarkable. High and low, of neglected education, had faith in omens. The belief in witchcraft in the eighteenth century is generally looked back upon as a superstition of the lowest part of the community. When Addison represents Sir Roger de Coverley as seriously puzzled about the true character of Moll White, the old woman "who had the reputation of a witch all over the country," we may be inclined to think that the humorist is a little hard upon the intellectual capacity of the country gentleman. When the knight and the spectator visit the old crone's hut, we can scarcely believe that a common delusion of the wealthier class is justly indicated, in Sir Roger's advice, as a justice of peace, to the poor creature, "to avoid all communication with the devil, and never to hurt any of her neighbor's cattle." Surely the writer must jest, when he says, "I have since found upon inquiry, that Sir Roger was several times staggered with the reports that had been brought him concerning this old woman, and would frequently have bound her over to the county sessions, had not his chaplain with much ado persuaded him to the contrary." † It was not always in those days that the chaplain was wiser than the justice of the peace. The statutes of Henry VIII. and of James I. against witchcraft and sorcery were in full force, and they were not repealed till the ninth year of George II. The superstition of Sir Roger was thus gently touched upon by Addison in July, 1711. In March, 1712, Jane Wenham, the witch of Walkerne, near Stevenage, was found guilty under the statute of James, and was condemned to die. The prosecutors of this unfortunate woman were not ignorant rustics—the constable or the overseer. One of them was the worshipful Sir Henry Chauncy, knight, the learned author of the "Historical Antiquities of Hertfordshire;" the other prosecutor was the reverend incumbent of Jane Wenham's parish. The judge, Powel, happily was a little in advance of his age. He reprieved the unhappy creature, very much to the scandal of the stupid jury and the learned prosecutors. That wise judge brought a cheerful nature to the discharge of his solemn duties. Swift passed a mirthful evening in his society at Harley's table, a few months before the Hertfordshire trial: "I went to lord treasurer, and among other company found a couple of judges with him. One of them, Judge Powel, an old fellow with gray hairs, was the merriest old gentleman I ever saw; spoke pleasant things, and laughed and chuckled till he cried again."* This was not the last conviction upon a charge of witchcraft. There is a "Relation" printed in London, that in 1716, Mrs. Hicks, and her daughter, aged nine years, were hanged at Huntingdon "for selling their souls to the devil; tormenting and destroying their neighbors by making them vomit pins; raising a storm so that a ship was almost lost, by pulling off her stockings, and making a lather of soap."† Though Judge Powel had the boldness to reprieve a convicted witch, in spite of the authority of Sir Matthew Hale, who left two poor wretches for execution in 1665, we may conclude, even from the language of the "Spectator," that it was not prudent to avow a disbelief in witchcraft. Addison manages his scepticism very adroitly: "When I consider the question, whether there are such persons in the world as those we call witches, my mind is divided between two opposite opinions; or rather, to speak my thoughts freely, I believe in general that there is, and has been, such a thing as witchcraft, but at the same time can give no credit to any particular instance of it."

That some of the most absurd superstitions and prejudices lasted through the eighteenth century can scarcely be matter of surprise, when we consider how entirely the instruction of the lower classes was neglected. It was neglected upon principle. It was not Squire Booby or Parson Trulliber only who believed that to educate the bulk of the people was to destroy the distinctions of rank. Great writers held the same opinion. Swift, discoursing of the wisdom of the institutions of Lilliput, says, "The cottagers and laborers keep their children at home, their business being only to till and cultivate the earth, and therefore their education is of little consequence to the public." We fear that it was somewhat of a melancholy period for the cottagers and laborers—unable to instruct or divert themselves with reading; the old sports very nearly extinct; wakes and Whitsun-ales kicked out by the Puritans, never to revive. The manly sport of our days that, in a limited degree, makes the young yeoman the associate on the village-green with the best bowler, was scarcely known even in the South of England. In one of D'Urfey's songs at the beginning of the century, "Shenkin," is celebrated as "the prettiest fellow at foot-ball or at cricket." No earlier notice of the game could be traced by the indefatigable Strutt. We fear that Hodge, in "the lovely bowers of innocence and ease" of the real English "Auburn," was too often "a-drinking at the Chequers." The old love of music of the peasant and the mechanic had yielded to the Puritanical tyranny, and had not revived in the bawling monotony of parochial psalmody. Musical taste and skill had died out for the bulk of the people. In Italy, writes Steele, a cobbler may be heard working to an opera tune; and "there is not a laborer or handicraftman that, in the cool of the evening, does not relieve himself with solos and sonatas." But, "on the contrary, our honest countrymen have so little inclination to music that they seldom begin to sing until they are drunk."‡ Sir John Hawkins has described, with some spirit, the musical entertainments which were offered to the middle classes at this period. The landlords of public-houses hired performers, and hither came very unrefined audiences, to drink and to smoke. This historian of music has described such an orchestra: "Half a dozen of fiddlers would scrape 'Sellenger's Round,' or 'John come kiss me,' or 'Old Simon the king,' with divisions, till themselves and their audience were tired; after which, as many players on the hautboy, would, in the most harsh and dissonant tones, grate forth 'Green Sleeves,' 'Yellow Stockings,' 'Gillian of Croydon,' or some such common dance tune, and the people thought it fair music."* Yet Purcell had lived among these harmonists. The fashionable world patronized foreign compositions and foreign performances. "Our English music is quite rooted out, and nothing yet planted in its stead," complains Addison. Nevertheless the old musical taste was not wholly rooted out. Before the palmy days of the "Academy of Ancient Concerts," established in 1710, there had been a signal example of what a man in humble life could do for the revival of that love of good music which had been sleeping for a century. Over his coal-shed in Clerkenwell, Thomas Britton, who literally carried a sack, assembled the best amateurs and professional musicians; and to his concert-loft, ascended by ladder-stairs from the exterior, came the high-born to listen, while the honest man exulted to have Handel sitting at the harpsichord, while he himself touched the viol-de-gamba. The humble tradesman was also a collector of rare books, and was as well known to Hearne, the antiquary, as to Pepusch, the doctor of music. Hughes, a poet, justly placed by Swift "among the Mediocribus, in prose as well as verse," has eight lines, "Under the Print of Tom Britton, the Musical Small-Coal Man," which thus conclude:

"Let useless pomp behold, and blush to find
So low a station, such a liberal mind."

CHAPTER CXLV.

Intellectual activity in every department of knowledge—A reading public—Poetical translations of classical authors—Pope's Homer—The popular element shown in the attacks of the wits upon some pursuits of learning—Battle of the books—Pope's ridicule of Dennis—Martinus Scriblerus—Small poets—The Dunciad—Commentators—Public schools—Universities—Travelling—Entomologists and florists—The abuses of knowledge only deserving the poet's ridicule—The popular element in the mental philosophy of the age—Locke—Character of Swift's genius—Tale of a Tub—Gulliver's Travels—Robinson Crusoe—Defoe.

However low, by comparison with modern times, might be the state of popular enlightenment in the reign of Anne, and in the reigns of the two first sovereigns of the house of Brunswick, the amount of intellectual activity in every department of knowledge was very remarkable. In literature there was evidently forming what Coleridge laughs at—"a reading public." He has well described the process of the change from books for the few to books for the many: "In times of old, books were as religious oracles; as literature advanced, they next became venerable preceptors; they then descended to the rank of instructive friends; and, as their number increased, they sank still lower to that of entertaining companions."† They were approaching this latter state in the early part of the eighteenth century. Again, Coleridge says: "Poets and philosophers, rendered diffident by their very number, addressed themselves to 'learned readers;' then aimed to conciliate the graces of 'the candid reader;' till, the critic still rising as the author sank, the amateurs of literature were erected into a municipality of judges, and addressed as 'the town.'"‡ Yet, whatever evils might result, or be supposed to result, in the comparative discouragement of the higher branches of learning by this enlargement of the circle of knowledge, the immediate consequence was to produce a very marked adaptation of the quality of literature to the wants of the purchasers in an extended market. We doubt very much if the quality were lowered, except in the opinion of some who thought that the "Pierian spring" was not to be tasted except by those who drank deep.

One of the most signal proofs of the extension of reading is furnished by the number of poetical translations of classical authors. Dryden had translated Juvenal and Virgil, just before the end of the seventeenth century. Creech had published his translation of Lucretius in the same period, and had obtained the praise of Dryden. In 1715 Pope issued his first volume of Homer's "Iliad." It was then that Addison, in the true spirit of a scholar who desired no exclusive possession of the riches of knowledge, thus wrote: "When I consider myself as a British freeholder, I am in a particular manner pleased with the labors of those who have improved our language with the translation of old Latin and Greek authors, and by that means let us into the knowledge of what passed in the famous governments of Greece and Rome. We have already most of their historians in our own tongue: and what is still more for the honor of our language, it has been taught to express with elegance the greatest of their poets in each nation. The illiterate among our countrymen may learn to judge from Dryden's 'Virgil' of the most perfect epic performance: and those parts of Homer which have already been published by Mr. Pope give us reason to think that the 'Iliad' will appear in English with as little disadvantage to that immortal poem."* This generous praise was bestowed after there had been a difference between Pope and Addison as to Tickell's rival attempt at a version of Homer. In the same paper of the "Freeholder," it was stated that the translation of Lucan's "Pharsalia" "is now in the hands of Mr. Rowe, who has already given the world some admirable specimens of it." Between 1715 and 1725 Pope completed the "Iliad" and the "Odyssey." Never was literary labor in those times more abundantly recompensed. Pope received nearly nine thousand pounds from his subscribers and from his publisher, as his clear gain from these undertakings. The subscribers to his guinea volumes in quarto were the great and the wealthy. It was no humiliation to the poet to have much larger sums sent him than the price of his books, by the court and by some of his noble friends. But the bookseller would not have furnished all the subscription copies at his own expense, besides paying a large sum for the copyright, had there not been "a reading public." Homer was printed in duodecimo; and Bernard Lintot, we may hope, was paid in more substantial coin than Pope's gratitude for his liberality.

The controversial and sarcastic spirit in which Swift, Pope, Arbuthnot, and some lesser humorists and wits dealt with matters of literature and learning, of art and science, displays the popular element that had become a characteristic of authorship. Until the subjects upon which ridicule is exercised come to be somewhat known and talked about, the ridicule is pointless. But a very superficial acquaintance with the higher objects of knowledge and taste would enable the reader of the "Battle of the Books," of the "Memoirs of Scriblerus," of the "Dunciad," of Gulliver in Laputa, to laugh at the whole tribe of grammarians, virtuosi, critics, projectors. Pope told Spence that "the design of the "Memoirs of Scriblerus" was to have ridiculed all the false tastes in learning, under the character of a man of capacity enough, that had dipped into every art and science, but injudiciously in each. It was begun by a club of the greatest wits of the age."† This sort of ridicule went on for forty years, till "the greatest wits of the age" were all silenced by the greater "antic," who might say, "Where be your gibes now?" But the gibes are still read, while the matters which gave birth to the gibes are well-nigh forgotten. Few care for the controversy between Bentley and Boyle, about the comparative merits of the ancients and moderns, and the authenticity of the "Epistles of Phalaris." The critical student may have read with wonder the "Dissertation" in which Bentley demolished his antagonist with unbounded learning and irresistible logic. The popular reader cares nothing for the quarrel, except to laugh over the comic satire of Swift in the "Battle of the Books." The ancient and the modern volumes have been fighting in St. James's Library, when "the day being far spent, and the numerous forces of the moderns half-inclining to a retreat, there issued forth from a squadron of their heavy-armed foot a captain whose name was Bentley, the most deformed of all the moderns." Scaliger encounters Bentley, and thus assails him: "The malignity of thy temper perverteth nature; thy learning makes thee more barbarous; thy study of humanity more inhuman; thy converse among poets more grovelling, miry, and dull." This is sheer abuse; and if all were such, no one would now turn to the "Battle of the Books." But there are passages of exquisite force and humor, such as the dialogue between the spider and the bee; and of inimitable burlesque, such as the mortal fight in which Boyle slays Bentley and his ally Wotton:

"So Wotton fled, so Boyle pursued. But Wotton, heavy-armed, and slow of foot, began to slack his course, when his lover Bentley appeared, returning laden with the spoils of the two sleepy ancients. Boyle observed him well, and, soon discovering the helmet and shield of Phalaris his friend, both which he had lately with his own hands new polished and gilt, rage sparkled in his eyes, and, leaving the pursuit after Wotton, he furiously rushed on against this new approacher. Fain would he be revenged on both; but both now fled different ways; and, as a woman in a little house that gets a painful livelihood by spinning, if chance her geese be scattered o'er the common, she courses round the plain from side to side, compelling here and there the stragglers to the flock; they cackle loud, and flutter o'er the champaign; so Boyle pursued, so fled this pair of friends: finding at length their flight was vain, they bravely joined, and drew themselves in phalanx. First Bentley threw a spear with all his force, hoping to pierce the enemy's breast: but Pallas came unseen, and in the air took off the point and clapped on one of lead, which, after a dead bang against the enemy's shield, fell blunted to the ground. Then Boyle, observing well his time, took up a lance of wondrous length and sharpness; and, as this pair of friends, compacted, stood close side to side, he wheeled him to the right, and, with unusual force, darted the weapon. Bentley saw his fate approach, and, flanking down his arms close to his sides, hoping to save his body, in went the point, passing through arm and side, nor stopped or spent its force till it had also pierced the valiant Wotton, who, going to sustain his dying friend, shared his fate. As when a skilful cook has trussed a brace of woodcocks, he with iron skewers pierces the tender sides of both, their legs and wings close pinioned to the ribs; so was this pair of friends transfixed, till down they fell, joined in their lives, joined in their deaths: so closely joined that Charon would mistake them both for one, and waft them over Styx for half his fare. Farewell, beloved, loving pair; few equals have you left behind; and happy and immortal shall you be, if all my wit and eloquence can make you."

"The Battle of the Books" was published in 1704. There was a much younger genius at that time writing Pastorals, who listened to the noise of the fray, and perhaps panted for his own day of strife and victory. In 1711 Pope published his "Essay on Criticism." Calm, sensible, modest, as became an author of twenty-two, the poet went out of his way to attack the jealous and suspicious old John Dennis, who laid down laws to the company at Button's, among which he had sate in his more prosperous days as the intimate of Dryden and Congreve. Dennis was furious at his portrait—

> "Appius reddens at each word you speak,
> And stares tremendous, with a threatening eye,
> Like some fierce tyrant in old tapestry."

Addison, who had not yet come under the lash of the "fierce tyrant," gently rebuked the controversial spirit which Pope first displayed in this poem. In the "Spectator," the "Art of Criticism" is generously praised; but Addison, having said "in our own country a man seldom sets up for a poet without attacking the reputation of all his brothers in the art," adds, "I am sorry to find that an author, who is very justly esteemed among the best judges, has admitted some strokes of this nature into a very fine poem—I mean the Art of Criticism, which was published some months since, and is a masterpiece in its kind."* The systematic depreciation, not only of the reputation of "brothers in the art," but of the studies and pursuits in which they took no especial interest themselves, forms a large portion of the writings of Pope and Swift. Gay and Arbuthnot joined heartily in the fun. The wit and the invective, however amusing and occasionally just, present too often only the ridiculous characteristics of useful and honorable labors, and the one-sided view of men not wholly deserving of contempt.

Pope, in his talk with Spence upon the "Memoirs of Scriblerus," says, "The adventure of the shield was designed against Dr. Woodward and the antiquaries." Who has not laughed in reading that "adventure of the shield"? It presents the ludicrous side of studies of which we now know the full value, but of which the popular readers of the time of Arbuthnot could only see the ridiculous aspect. Dr. Cornelius could prove from "the color of the rust the exact chronology of the shield." The scullion "had scoured it as her hand-irons," and the rust was vanished. Laugh we must when the learned doctor cries out, "Where are all those beautiful obscurities, the cause of much delightful disputation, where doubt and uncertainty went hand in hand and eternally exercised the speculations of the learned?" The gossips who had come to the christening of the infant who was brought into the great antiquary's study upon the shield, exclaim "'Tis nothing but a paltry old sconce, with the nozzle broken off." Exquisite banter! Woodward, in 1707, had published "An Account of Roman Urns and other antiquities lately dug up near Bishopgate." There were few, perhaps, who would take much interest in the fact, that under the stones on which they daily trod there was a tesselated pavement; there were urns of Roman pottery; relics of unfading interest to those who could carry their minds beyond the material objects, to think of the wondrous changes of civilized life during fourteen centuries. The satire against the antiquary has not damaged such studies as he pursued with real advantage to learning; nor has it damaged his character as the philosopher who founded the professorship of geology at Cambridge. Woodward stands upon his own substantial merits; and though advancing knowledge may have disturbed some of his theories, he is entitled to reverence as one of the zealous and disinterested workers in the vast fields of science then lying waste.

"Middling poets," said Pope to Spence, "are no poets at all. There is always a great number of such in each age, that are almost totally forgotten in the next. A few curious inquirers may know that there were such men, and that they wrote such and such things; but to the world they are as if they had never been." * Pope has embalmed these dead of his own age. We admire his curious art, as we admire the mummy-cases of the Egyptians; but it is not worth while to unroll the mummies. In a paper written, it is believed, by Pope himself, under the name of Savage, it is said that after various falsehoods and scurrilities against him, he thought "he had now some opportunity of doing good;" and hoped, "by manifesting the dulness of those who had only malice to recommend them, either the booksellers would not find their account in employing them, or the men themselves, when discovered, want courage to proceed in so unlawful an occupation. This it was that gave birth to the 'Dunciad,' and he thought it an happiness that, by the late flood of slander on himself, he had acquired such a peculiar right to their names as was necessary to this design." † Johnson has assigned a higher motive to Pope than the miserable desire for revenge, which is thus acknowledged by himself or avowed by his authority. The talk was of Pope: Johnson said, "He wrote his 'Dunciad' for fame. That was his primary motive. Had it not been for that, the dunces might have railed against him till they were weary, without his troubling himself about them. He delighted to vex them, no doubt; but he had more delight in seeing how well he could vex them." ‡ In a previous conversation which turned upon Pope, Johnson "repeated to us, in his forcible melodious manner, the concluding lines of the 'Dunciad.' While he was talking loudly in praise of these lines, one of the company ventured to say, 'Too fine for such a poem, a poem on what?' 'Why, on Dunces. It was worth while being a dunce then. Ah, sir, hadst thou lived in those days!'" § These "concluding lines" are indeed noble lines; which Pope himself admired "so much that when he repeated them his voice faltered." The whole fourth book of the 'Dunciad' is a grand satire upon many of the remarkable characteristics of the poet's age. It was completed in 1742. Warburton was by the side of Pope when he produced what he called "The New Duncíad," in which the additional book was accompanied by the previous ones recast. The alterations were not judicious. The addition was a proof that the fruit of the sound mind in the feeble body had lost no particle of its spring-time pungency in its autumnal ripeness. With far higher objects than that of damaging authors who had wounded his self-love, Pope in this wonderful poem put forth all his power. We may bestow some care upon its examination; for, perhaps, more than anything he has written, the satirist here paints in the boldest style, and with the most durable as well as brilliant colors, the abuses, as he conceives, of literature, of learning, of science. We may pass over the mere temporary and personal satire of the three first books, then also worked up into their present form, with Theobald deposed from the throne of dulness, and King Cibber installed in his place. Those portions will always be read by the few, in spite of their capricious injustice, and, what is worse, of their miserable grossness. The fourth book, with a little of the same personality, and of the same indelicacy of which it may be readily cleared, may be read by all, as the most magnificent satire in our language.

The heroic games of the goddess Dulness are over. The rival booksellers, Curll, Lintot, and Tonson, have run their race. The authors have dived

> "Where Fleet-ditch, with disemboguing streams, > Rolls the large tribute of dead dogs to Thames."

Hoadly and Blackmore have read the assembly to sleep. King Cibber has been carried to the Elysian shades. The future reign of universal ignorance is foretold:

> "Proceed, great days, till learning fly the shore."

The prophecy is about to be accomplished. The goddess is "coming in her majesty, to destroy order and science, and to substitute the kingdom of the dull upon earth."

> "Beneath her footstool Science groans in chains, > And Wit dreads exile, penalties and pains."

"In tenfold bonds the muses lie." The act for subjecting plays to a licenser, which Walpole had managed to pass, had thus made "Thalia nerveless, cold, and dead." Walpole perhaps had saved Thalia from her own degradation. Opera comes to supplant comedy.

> "When lo! a harlot form soft sliding by
> With mincing step, small voice, and languid eye:
> Foreign her air, her robe's discordant pride
> In patchwork fluttering, and her head aside;
> By singing peers upheld on either hand
> She tripp'd and laugh'd, too pretty much to stand."

Opera "cast on the prostrate Nine a scornful look," and she drove Handel, with her rival oratorio, "to the Hibernian shore." Fame blows her trumpet, and a "vast involuntary throng" crowd round the throne of the goddess. There come the > "Patrons, who sneak from living worth to dead."

The commentators come. Dulness, smiling, exclaims,

> "Let standard authors, thus, like trophies borne,
> Appear more glorious, as more hack'd and torn;
> And you my critics in the chequer'd shade
> Admire new light through holes yourself have made."

Alderman Benson is there, noted for the monuments he put up to departed genius, with his own name and titles pompously recorded in the inscription upon one tomb:

> "On two unequal crutches propp'd he came;
> Milton's on this, on that one Jonson's name."

The vanity of the age of Anne is less offensive than the cold neglect of the age of Victoria, in which it was fruitlessly tried to raise a monument to Caxton. The spectre of the Public Schools appears, with his "beaver'd brow" and his "birchen garland." He would speak in humbler tones now, but the time is not long passed since he thus might have spoken:

> "Since man from beast by words is known,
> Words are man's province, words we teach alone.
> When Reason doubtful, like the Samian letter,
> Points him two ways, the narrower is the better.
> Plac'd at the door of Learning, youth to guide,
> We never suffer it to stand too wide.
> To ask, to guess, to know, as they commence,
> As fancy opens the quick springs of sense,
> We ply the memory, we load the brain,
> Bind rebel Wit, and double chain on chain,
> Confine the thought, to exercise the breath;
> And keep them in the pale of words till death.
> Whate'er the talents, or howe'er design'd,
> We hang one jingling padlock on the mind;
> A poet the first day, he dips his quill;
> And what the last? a very poet still.
> Pity! the charm works only in our wall,
> Lost, lost too soon in yonder house or hall."

Aristarchus comes to represent the universities. Aristarchus, the Bentley of the "Battle of the Books." For a century the ruling powers of Oxford and Cambridge stood up against the terrible satire which their representative thus enunciates:

> "Ah, think not, mistress! more true Dulness lies
> In Folly's cap than Wisdom's grave disguise.
> Like buoys, that never sink into the flood,
> On Learning's surface we but lie and nod.

For thee we dim the eyes and stuff the head
With all such reading as was never read :
For thee explain a thing till all men doubt it,
And write about it, goddess, and about it :
So spins the silkworm small its slender store,
And labors, till it clouds itself all o'er.
What though we let some better sort of fool,
Thread ev'ry science, run through every school !
Never by tumbler through the hoops was shown
Such skill in passing all, and touching none.
He may indeed (if sober all this time)
Plague with dispute, or persecute with rhyme.
We only furnish what he cannot use,
Or wed to what he must divorce, a muse :
Full in the midst of Euclid dip at once,
And petrify a genius to a dunce :
Or set on metaphysic ground to prance,
Show all his paces, not a step advance.
With the same cement, ever sure to bind,
We bring to one dead level every mind :
Then take him to develop if you can,
And hew the block off, and get out the man."

The "man" formed in the seats of learning then comes with his "laced governor from France," who thus addresses the goddess :

"Through school and college, thy kind cloud o'ercast,
Safe and unseen the young Æneas past :
Thus bursting glorious, all at once let down,
Stunn'd with his giddy larum half the town.
Intrepid then, o'er seas and lands he flew :
Europe he saw, and Europe saw him too.
There all thy gifts and graces we display,
Thou, only thou, directing all our way :
To where the Seine, obsequious as she runs,
Pours at great Bourbon's feet her silken sons ;
Or Tiber, now no longer Roman, rolls,
Vain of Italian arts, Italian souls :
To happy convents, bosom'd deep in vines,
Where slumber abbots, purple as their wines :
To isles of fragrance, lily-silvered vales,
Diffusing languor in the panting gales :
To lands of singing or of dancing slaves,
Love-whispering woods, and lute-resounding waves.
But chief her shrine where naked Venus keeps,
And Cupids ride the lion of the deeps,
Where eas'd of fleets, the Adriatic main
Wafts the smooth eunuch and enamor'd swain.
Led by my hand he saunter'd Europe round,
And gather'd every vice on Christian ground."

Never was nobler poetry. With slight difference of times and manners, never was more enduring satire.

The pedants make room for the collectors of coins and curiosities ; and these are succeeded by entomologists and florists :

"A tribe, with weeds and shells fantastic crown'd,
Each with some wondrous gift approach'd the power,
A nest, a toad, a fungus, or a flower."

The goddess expresses her anxiety that such studies should be pursued in the manner in which they have been, and possibly still are, worse than useless :

"Oh ! would the sons of men once think their eyes
And reason given them but to study flies !
See Nature in some partial narrow shape,
And let the author of the whole escape ;
Learn, but to trifle ; or, who most observe,
To wonder at their Maker, not to serve."

It was the "partial narrow shape" which in the infancy of scientific investigation led men to be mere collectors and classifiers. The broad views of great general laws, which connect together the whole natural world, have slowly been formed upon those employments which the poet derides as frivolous. It is not only the dull that "may waken to a humming-bird," find "congenial matter in the cockle-kind," or "wander in a wilderness of moss," but the acutest intellect may be led to the highest generalizations by the study of a mollusk. In the same way it is simply the abuse of learning when the pedant says,

"On words is still our whole debate, Dispute of me or te, of aut or ut."

But in such debate were laid the foundations of accurate scholarship ; and even in "the pale of words" of the public schools did boys learn to do some one thing well, and thereby to discipline the mind to a comprehension of many things. Perhaps in our day some satirist may arise to proclaim the evils of a totally opposite system, with reference to the general enlightenment of much larger masses of society. He may deride a system of competitive examination which embraces the whole circle of knowledge, and thus may produce in all, and not only in the "better sort of fool," the skill of the tumbler jumping through the hoops—passing every science and touching none. It is this sciolism, he may say, which will tend to the same results as the poet has described in him

"Whose pious hope aspires to see the day
When moral evidence shall quite decay."

The solitary freethinker addresses the goddess in words which may be echoed by a conceited multitude :

"Let others creep by timid steps and slow,
On plain experience lay foundations low ;
By common-sense to common knowledge bred,
And, last to Nature's cause through Nature led :
All-seeing in thy mists, we want no guide,
Mother of arrogance, and source of pride."

There is nothing more characteristic of the eminent writers of the earlier part of the eighteenth century than the persistent way in which they addressed themselves to the popular understanding. Even the prevailing mental philosophy had little in it that was abstruse or recondite. In rejecting the doctrine of innate ideas, and making the senses the origin of knowledge, Locke had to derive his illustrations and proofs from the commonest facts. His language is perfectly simple and familiar. He assumes that there is no mystery in the complex operations of the human mind ; and resting our ideas upon experience, he develops a system upon which all men may follow him to his conclusions. Metaphysics have assumed a very different aspect ; and far more subtle views have made the study of metaphysics at once more difficult and more interesting. The same tendency to take the obvious and popular arguments for the evidences of the truths of natural and revealed religion, and to rest the exhortations of the Christian preacher upon that foundation of reason upon which the lay moralist relies, is to be traced in the theological writings of the same period. The theology and the philosophy were equally cold and passionless, equally narrow and incomplete. But they were adapted to their age ; and they were not without their beneficial influence in preparing the way for something higher and nobler—something more expansive than the belief that there is nothing mysterious in the mind of man, in the laws which govern the universe, or in the doctrines upon which faith must take its hold. These are matters which are beyond our province to dilate upon. The same principle, which really consisted in presenting only one portion of a subject in the most palpable form, influenced the lighter writings of that age. It equally pervades the poetry of Pope and the prose satire of Swift. The principle was founded upon an accurate estimate of what the robust English understanding would accept at this period of its development. It assumed that a great deal had been forgotten and that a great deal was unnecessary to be learned, in theology, in philosophy, in poetry. There was a crowd pressing forward to be instructed, to be pleased, to be amused. A broad and smooth road was to be made for their progress ; the old ascents were to be levelled, the dangerous fords were to be bridged over.

The genius of Swift was calculated, more than the genius of any of his great contemporaries, to make the half-truths which he presented to the popular mind have the semblance of containing the whole truth. His wondrous logical power, his lucid manner of dealing with a few details as if they comprehended the entire subject, his sarcasm which looks like candor—these qualities concealed the unscrupulous partisanship which is at the bottom of all his political writings. "To lie like truth" was the art by which he made Marlborough hated, and destroyed the fruits of Marlborough's victories in the peace of Utrecht. By the same power he made the Irish believe that they were ruined by a beneficial project to give the nation a copper currency, instead of the tallies with which the smaller exchanges were often conducted. The masterpieces of literature upon which Swift's fame must ever rest, go with the same directness to the popular comprehension. The humor, so profound, is also so obvious. The irony, so subtle, is also so unmistakable. Every one of common education who reads the "Tale of a Tub" can understand it without a key. The whole scheme of the book is to reduce the gravest questions which have agitated the world to something like burlesque. But it is not burlesque. Underlying the mockery there are stern realities which set men thinking. His wit, it is said, lost Swift a bishopric; but he had his consolations. In his latter years he looked some time upon his first great work, and then, shutting the book, exclaimed, "Good God! what a genius I had when I wrote that!" A genius indeed; but how fatal a possession! What miseries of disappointed ambition, and then what horrors of crushing misanthropy it brought with it!

The circumstantiality with which Swift always invests his ludicrous inventions, is preserved, without the least slip, throughout the "Tale of a Tub." The history of the three brothers, Peter, Martin, and Jack—the representatives of popery, the Anglican Church, and Calvinism—is introduced with a grave anachronism, which mystifies the reader, and takes him from the days of Leo X., Luther, and Calvin, into the town life of the days when Jonathan Swift awed and delighted the club at Button's. We give the passage, with slight omissions, not only as an illustration of the author's peculiar talent, but as an addition to the pictures of social life which the more gentle humorists have sketched.

"Being now arrived at the proper age for producing themselves, they came up to town, and fell in love with the ladies, but especially three, who about that time were in chief reputation; the Duchess d'Argent, Madame de Grands Titres, and the Countess d'Orgueil. On their first appearance our three adventurers met with a very bad reception; and soon with great sagacity guessing out the reason, they quickly began to improve in the good qualities of the town. They wrote, and rallied, and rhymed, and sung, and said, and said nothing; they drank, and fought, and slept, and swore, and took snuff; they went to new plays on the first night, haunted the chocolate-houses, beat the watch, and lay on bulks; they bilked hackney-coachmen and ran in debt with shopkeepers; they killed bailiffs, kicked fiddlers down stairs, eat at Locket's, loitered at Will's; they talked of the drawing-room, and never came there; dined with lords they never saw; whispered a duchess, and spoke never a word; exposed the scrawls of their laundress for billets-doux of quality; came over just from court, and were never seen in it; attended the levee sub dio; got a list of peers by heart in one company, and with great familiarity retailed them in another. Above all, they constantly attended those committees of senators who are silent in the house and loud in the coffee-house; where they nightly adjourn to chew the cud of politics, and are encompassed with a ring of disciples, who lie in wait to catch up their droppings. The three brothers had acquired forty other qualifications of the like stamp, too tedious to recount, and by consequence were justly reckoned the most accomplished persons in the town."

The power which Swift possessed of sustaining, whether in narrative or in argument, the most complete personation of the character he assumes, is one of his remarkable qualities. We all know that Mr. Samuel Gulliver, after his wonderful adventures, "growing weary of the concourse of curious people coming to him at his house at Redriff, made a small purchase of land, with a convenient house, near Newark;" and that he there composed his "Travels into several remote nations of the world," which were published in 1727. Arbuthnot wrote to Swift after this publication, "Lord Scarborough, who is no inventor of stories, told us that he fell in company with a master of a ship, who told him that he was very well acquainted with Gulliver, but that the printer had mistaken; that he lived in Wapping, and not in Rotherhithe." The "Drapier," who stirred the Irish to madness, is throughout his letters "a poor, ignorant shopkeeper," one who has "a pretty good shop of Irish stuffs and silks," and, instead of taking Mr. Wood's bad copper, intends to truck with his neighbors, butchers and bakers, goods for goods. Gulliver is never betrayed into any forgetfulness of his condition of life, and always has some minute circumstance at hand, to bring his marvellous relations within the range of probability. Arbuthnot also wrote to Swift, "I lent the book to an old gentleman, who went immediately to his map, to search for Lilliput." It is in this way that children read Gulliver's adventures with undoubting trust—happy if the melancholy exhibition of Swift's hate to his species be not comprehended by them. The time comes when the man understands the satire, and admires or loathes the satirist. But what vitality in some of the touches; what art, without the slightest exhibition of the artist! Take one example from the court of Lilliput:

"There is likewise another diversion, which is only shown before the emperor and empress and first minister, upon particular occasions. The emperor lays on the table three fine silken threads of six inches long; one is blue, the other red, and the other green. These threads are proposed as prizes for those persons whom the emperor has a mind to distinguish by a peculiar mark of his favor. The ceremony is performed in his majesty's great chamber of state, where the candidates are to undergo a trial of dexterity, very different from the former, and such as I have not observed the least resemblance of in any other country of the new or old world. The emperor holds a stick in his hands, both ends parallel to the horizon, while the candidates, advancing one by one, sometimes leap over the stick, sometimes creep under it, backward and forward, several times, according as the stick is advanced or depressed. Sometimes the emperor holds one end of the stick, and his first minister the other; sometimes the minister has it entirely to himself. Whoever performs his part with most agility, and holds out the longest in leaping and creeping, is rewarded with the blue-colored silk; the red is given to the next, and the green to the third, which they all wear girt twice round about the middle; and you see few great persons about this court who are not adorned with one of these girdles."

It is no derogation from the merit of Swift that he might have learned the secret of personation from one who had gone before him. In 1719 a book was published which thus commences: "I was born in the year 1632, in the city of York, of a good family, though not of that county, my father being a foreigner of Bremen, who settled first at Hull. He got a good estate by merchandise, and leaving off his trade, lived afterward at York, from whence he had married my mother, whose relatives were named Robinson, a very good family in that county, and from whom I was called Robinson Kreutznaer; but, by the usual corruption of words in England, we are now called, nay we call ourselves, and write our name, Crusoe." World-famous name! The author of that book had, in as high a degree as Swift, the power which Mr. Hallam ascribes to Bunyan—the power of representation. "He saw and makes us see what he describes."

In his private conversation Pope indirectly confessed to the gross injustice he had committed in "The Dunciad," in speaking contemptuously of one whose fame will endure as long as his own: "The first part of Robinson Crusoe is very good. Defoe wrote a vast many things, and none bad, though none excellent, except this. There is something good in all he has written." * Of the "vast many things," all of which contain "something good," there are works of fiction which are as striking as Robinson Crusoe, although in their reality—in their naked delineations of actual life, but always with the view to make vice hideous—they can scarcely be recommended for general perusal. Defoe's ruling principle in his broad pictures of the manners of the highest and the lowest ranks is thus stated by him in the preface to his "Life of Colonel Jack:" "The various turns of his fortune, in different scenes of life, make a delightful field for the reader to wander in; a garden where he may gather wholesome and medicinal fruits, none noxious or poisonous; where he will see virtue and the ways of wisdom everywhere applauded, honored, encouraged, and rewarded; vice and extravagance attended with sorrow and every kind of infelicity; and at last, sin and shame going together, the offender meeting with reproach and contempt, and the crimes with detestation and punishment." This was the principle upon which Hogarth also worked. But as Hogarth's prints cannot all be hung up in a modern drawing-room, so Defoe's novels of familiar life are not for universal reading—however journalism may now expatiate o'er scenes where fiction dare not tread.

CHAPTER CXLVI.

During the period which has passed under review in the preceding chapters of this volume, the arts were, with one exception, in a very depressed condition. For a brief space it had seemed as though art would have taken firm root in this country: it was now a sickly exotic. Charles I., although his taste and influence in art matters may perhaps have been overrated, did undoubtedly labor strenuously during his troubled reign to add to the splendor of his court by the liberal patronage of art and artists. Partly it may have been done in rivalry, partly in imitation of the monarch who then sat on the throne of France. But whatever was the cause the effect was the same. He attracted to his court either as visitors or residents some of the most famous painters of the day; he obtained at a cost his necessities could ill afford * a collection of paintings far surpassing anything of the kind which this country had hitherto seen; and, though the evil times on which he had fallen prevented him from carrying his purpose into execution, we know that he sought to unite in one splendid metropolitan palace the utmost attainable magnificence of the combined arts of the architect and the painter. His example found eager imitators among his courtiers. Nobles and wealthy commoners were no longer content as of old, with portraits of themselves, their wives, and their elder sons, but began to compare the merits of Titian and Velasquez, of Raffaelle and Honthorst, of Rubens and Snyders and Vandyck; and to seek for a work by some cunning hand of Italy, Spain, or the Netherlands to decorate their town house or country mansion. The Duke of Buckingham and the Earl of Arundel were at the head of the courtly connoisseurs. They dispatched agents to Italy and the East to seek for works of merit; and, urged on by the rival ministers, our envoys at Madrid, Venice, Constantinople, and the Hague were almost as much occupied in negotiating for pictures and statues as in affairs of state.

The passion for art penetrated probably but little downward. Among the higher classes it was a mere fashion. By the Puritans the taste of the king for religious paintings was regarded as idolatrous: his classic pictures offended their notions of propriety. The civil war broke up the royal and many private collections. Cromwell indeed saved the royal pictures from being utterly dispersed, and the stately galleries of several of the older nobility yet contain many works purchased for them in the reign of Charles. But the influence was not abiding. Cromwell had little leisure, probably little inclination, to attend to pictures and statues. The period of the commonwealth was not one in which private individuals would venture to indulge the taste if they possessed it, still less to simulate a taste they did not feel. With the restoration came a season of lax morals and thoughtless self-indulgent habits, inimical to everything pure and elevating in art, but favorable to the voluptuous and meretricious artist. Verrio and Laguerre grew rich, as their sensual deities and profane virtues sprawled over the ceilings and staircases of the palaces of the king and the nobility; and Lely found ample employment for his pencil in depicting the sleepy-eyed "beauties" of the royal court and harem.

Painting and sculpture were at a low ebb when William and Mary ascended the throne of England. Kneller had succeeded to Lely as the fashionable portrait painter, and he reigned without a rival. Cibber and Gibbons practised as sculptors; but their chisels were almost confined to carving in wood the internal, in stone the external, decorations of buildings. Walpole says of William, "This prince like most of those in our annals contributed nothing to the advancement of the arts." And he adds that "Mary seems to have had little more propensity to the arts than the king." † William was not a man to waste time on what he would consider trifling pursuits, when serious affairs both at home and abroad called for the utmost exercise of his time, thought, and energy. But if he cared little for the other arts, he did not neglect architecture; and so long as William lived Wren had not to complain of ingratitude or neglect. William and Mary did, however, in a certain careless way, patronize painters. They gave employment, as their immediate predecessors had done, to painters of portraiture and of allegory; the one probably because they could understand and enjoy it, the other because it was the mode. The king, we need not doubt, took more genuine delight in superintending the laying out of the grounds of Hampton Court in the Dutch taste than in examining pictures, but he caused a gallery to be erected in his favorite palace for the reception of the marvellous cartoons of Raffaelle, while he decorated the walls of the other apartments of that pleasant residence with Dutch fruit and flower-pieces and scenes of Dutch life. But if William contributed little to the advancement of the arts, his immediate successors contributed even less: and art such as it was in England in the period under notice may be said to have been kept alive rather in defiance than by favor of that royal countenance which on the continent was regarded as the very breath of its nostrils.

Science in its objective development had at this time reached a higher point than it had ever before attained in England; and the one branch of art in which England excelled was, as might have been anticipated, that which is dependent upon science for its very existence. But it was the genius of one extraordinary man, called out by the greatness of the occasion, which re-created English architecture, and made it the sublime thing it became in his hands. Between Inigo Jones and Wren there was no architect worthy to be so called in England. And indeed Wren was the first Englishman who for centuries could put in a claim that could not be gainsayed to the title of architect, as, later, Hogarth was the first to prove that an Englishman might become a great painter. These two men are in fact the connecting links of the art of this period, with that of the preceding and of the following periods: and they mainly save this period of English art-history from being strictly a history of art in England, and not also of English art.

Wren was already a man of mature age, ripe intellect, and of scientific acquirements, unusual in extent and variety even in that age of remarkable scientific men, when he turned to the study of architecture: and it may be that it was owing to this, that in his hands architecture became a living reality and not a thing of rule and system. The son of Dean Wren, and the nephew of the well-known bishop of that name, he received every advantage of education, and every opportunity which social position and family influence could afford. Yet it is little short of marvellous to read of him when a mere boy, as not only skilled in mathematics, but the inventor of various astronomical, gnomonic, and pneumatic instruments; as being looked upon as a prodigy at Oxford, where he had entered as a commoner when only fourteen; as having secured a European celebrity at two-and-twenty; as being the next year appointed Gresham professor, and two or three years later called to the Savilian chair in his own university. At what time he commenced the study of architecture is not known.* From his having been appointed assistant-surveyor-general in 1661, it has been conjectured that his architectural talents must have been recognized then. But this is by no means certain. The surveyor-general was Sir John Denham, the poet, and a knowledge of architecture was certainly no part of his qualification for the office. Wren was made his assistant with a view to becoming his successor. The situation may have been obtained as a motive and a means for retaining in London the brilliant young man of science who was found to be equally ready at drawing up, for the royal signature, the preamble of the newly founded Royal Society, organizing the new institution, and preparing papers and projects, constructing machines, and devising experiments which would give éclat to its meetings; and if such a thing were suggested to the king, who took very unusual interest in the prosperity of the infant society, there can be little doubt that he would willingly give Wren the place without inquiring very strictly into his special fitness for it. Be that as it may, the place was in his hands no sinecure. His first important undertaking in connection with it was the restoration of the old church of St. Paul's, which had been left in a ruinous condition since its desecration by Cromwell's soldiers. It had already lost its Gothic character by the erection of Inigo Jones's great Corinthian portico at the west end; and Wren would have entirely remodelled it by constructing a grand central cupola which he thought would be "of present use for auditory, make all the external repairs perfect, become an ornament to his majesty's most excellent reign, to the Church, and to this great city." But he was not to construct his grand central dome yet. At the outset, as at every future step of his architectural career, he had to encounter stubborn prejudice and stupidity. "You will not forget," said the excellent Evelyn many years later, "the struggle we had with some who were for patching it up anyhow, so the steeple might stand instead of new building; when, to put an end to the contest, five days after, that dreadful conflagration happened, out of whose ashes this phœnix is, and was by providence designed for you." *

* Some curious particulars illustrating the difficulties experienced by Charles in raising money for the full payment of his commissions and purchases will be found in Mr. Sainsbury's admirably edited "Original Papers relating to Rubens" (8vo. 1859). It was more than two years after Rubens had finished his paintings for the ceiling of Whitehall before Charles was able to pay the last 500*l.* of the 3000*l.* which Rubens was to receive for them—though Gerbier, the king's agent at Brussels, writes urgent letters to the king himself, as well as to his ministers, stating how "Spaniards, French, and other nations talk" of the royal pictures lying there "as if for want of money." But the royal jewels were also at this time lying "at pawn there," and the parties who had advanced their money on them were threatening the envoy "by public notary" that if they were not redeemed by a certain day "they would put the jewels up to real and public sale for their satisfaction." (Sainsbury, p. 185, and note.) Even more trouble was experienced and caused by the king's inability to provide the purchase money for the famous Mantuan collection. (Ibid., Appendix H.)

Before the conflagration Wren had happily prepared himself for the mighty labor of repairing its ravages. He had satisfied himself as to the principles of architecture, and familiarized himself as far as possible with the practice. One of the most valuable glimpses we have into his mode of study is in a letter written by him in 1665 from Paris, whither he had gone to examine the vast works at the Louvre, then in course of erection. "The Louvre," he says, "for a while was my daily object, where no less than a thousand hands are constantly employed in the works; some laying mighty foundations; some in raising the stones, columns, entablements with vast stones, by great and useful engines; others in carving, inlaying of marbles, plastering, painting, gilding; which altogether make it a school of architecture the best probably in Europe."† And he, we may say, was certainly the best scholar in it. He would have given his skin, he writes, for Bernini's plan of the Louvre, "but the old reserved Italian gave me but a few minutes' view of it. . . . I had only time to copy it in in my fancy and memory." But other plans and buildings he is able to copy as well as to survey, so that he says, "I shall bring you almost all France upon paper." He might perhaps have done better, as Walpole said, and as has often been said after him, if he had gone on to Italy instead of remaining in France. French "filgrand works and little knacks," as he calls them, did somewhat pertinaciously cleave to his memory and corrupt the purity of his taste; but he left France with a conviction which he emphatically expressed, and which he never after suffered to escape from him, that architecture ought not be swayed like language and dresses by new fashions, but that "building certainly ought to have the attribute of eternal"—an attribute which his buildings certainly possess.

The fire of London was what gave him his grand opportunity, and imparted the strongest and most permanent impulse to his genius. How he was prepared to grapple with the mighty task of reconstructing a great city and how his purpose was foiled, has already been sufficiently told. That he was fully alive to the necessity for great lines of thoroughfare, the value of large central openings, and ready access by broad cross-streets between every part of the city, and of spacious quays along the Thames; and that he could contrive a comprehensive scheme, which, while it would meet the actual requirements of the city, was sufficiently flexible to adapt itself to an ever-increasing commerce, his plan is abundant proof.‡ He would have concentrated the great commercial buildings, such as the Royal Exchange, the Post Office, Excise Office, etc., together in the heart of the city, with the main streets radiating from them; have placed St. Paul's at the division of two main-trunk streets, and nearly where it now stands, so that its lofty dome might form the crown of the capital from whatever side it was approached; but then he would have left a large vacant space before its western front, that its grand proportions might have made themselves fully seen on entering the city from the court end of town, and have built Doctors' Commons behind it, so as to prevent its being encroached on by mean houses; the churches he proposed to erect in conspicuous spots and at nearly equal distances; his main streets were to have been ninety feet wide, and none of the inferior streets less than thirty, while three spacious piazzas would have imparted an air of dignity and finish to their general aspect. That the importance of giving to the city a nobler architectural character had long before impressed itself on his mind, was shown in his report on the state of old St. Paul's, where he speaks of "this great city" as the "most unadorned of her bigness in the world."

The first stone of his master-work, St. Paul's, was not laid till nine years after the fire. At first the authorities were anxious to make the old church last a little longer, but that was decided by its falling about their ears. Then the design he prepared for the new edifice was not approved—the great opponent to it being, as is understood, the Duke of York, afterward James II. Wren had designed a Protestant cathedral. The duke was bent on having one in which the ceremonies of the Romish Church might be performed with unstinted splendor.* Wren was obliged to give way; but his first design was that which he always regarded as the best. The large model which he prepared of it may be seen in the South Kensington Museum. The building would have been surmounted like the present one with a lofty dome. But in the earlier design the architect proposed to assemble the congregation on ordinary occasions in the grand central area under the dome, as has in the present pile been only done in the recent exceptional evening services. There can be little doubt that the first design would have given a simpler, grander, and more original interior. It may be doubted whether the exterior would have been so impressive. The dome, noble as it would have been, was less majestic, and there were no features corresponding to the beautiful western campanile towers, or that would have compensated for their absence. Wren would have preferred his original design, but he did his best to make that on the plan he was forced to adopt the worthiest he possibly could. And, despite all the objections that minute criticism has urged against it, he succeeded in erecting one of the very noblest piles which man has raised for the glory of his Maker.

The work which he commenced in 1675 he steadily prosecuted in the face of opposition and contumely for five-and-thirty years, when, in 1710, he had the happiness to see the last stone laid by his eldest son Christopher: a rare happiness for the architect of so great a work, and one that has secured to London the almost unparalleled fortune of having a cathedral of the grandest class, in which perfect unity of design is maintained throughout, as it only could have been by the architect superintending the work from its commencement to its completion, and as is not always secured even then.

By common consent St. Paul's is placed in the very first rank of the architectural works of modern times. Classic purists and mediæval ecclesiologists alike take exception to its style and details. We may at once admit that its ornamentation is not unexceptionable; that objections may fairly be taken to its style. But making the largest admissions, we cannot but feel that it remains, in grandeur of mass and picturesqueness of outline, alone almost among works of its class: a stately, imposing, seen under some circumstances of position and season, even a sublime temple. Many of the faults which are pointed out in the design there can be no doubt Wren was as cognizant of as his critics; many others that are commonly felt there can be little doubt were forced on him against his earnest protests. Of the plan we have spoken. One of the objections most commonly urged against the design is the coupling of the columns in the west front, and the raising of one order over another. But, as is shown in the Parentalia, Wren had at least well considered the matter. He thought a lofty front necessary to give dignity to the building; but stones of a size equal to those of the ancient porticos being unattainable, he considered that a single order of some ninety feet would have presented an appearance of instability, and that the necessary appearance of strength for a double order could only be obtained by coupling columns of a less diameter; while this would have the advantage, by giving wider openings, of rendering obvious the entrances, a thing not required in an ancient temple. He may have been wrong, but he has at least the merit of erring as the consequence of carefully thinking out his problem—which is better than being correct by the simple rule of copying. So, on the other hand, the balustrade and the vases at the sides, which more than anything else serve to take off from the true magnitude of the pile, were only adopted by him on compulsion; his letter to the commissioners being extant† in which he denounces their resolution to set up a balustrade in the strongest terms, as one that could only have been made by persons ignorant of the principles of architecture. "Statues erected on the four pediments only, will," he says, "be a most proper, noble, and sufficient ornament to the whole fabric;" though he knows that "ladies think nothing well without an edging." This letter, it is noteworthy, was written in 1717, after the building was virtually finished. The "ladies," however, had their way, and the edging was tacked on. The cold naked look of the interior is an objection raised by every visitor; but it ought to be remembered that Wren designed the interior to be adorned with mosaics, and was in treaty with professors of the art in Italy for their execution. The authorities, however, disallowed them, and had in their place the inside of the dome covered with paintings by Sir James Thornhill—worthless in themselves, and the painted imitations of columns, vases, and other architectural features between which, have the further effect of seriously interfering with the curves of the noble vault, and marring its simple majesty.

Next in artistic importance to St. Paul's rank the churches with which Wren adorned the city. These, instead of placing in the most prominent positions, he was compelled to put often in the most out-of-the-way streets and lanes, where the buildings themselves were in many instances concealed by shops and warehouses. Hence he directed his chief attention to the interiors and the spires. And here he showed himself to be a great original artist. Italian ecclesiastical architects had to a great extent adhered to the Roman basilica form. The wonderful Gothic builders of Northern Europe had almost invariably adopted that of the Latin cross. In our own country, with a few exceptions, such as the round churches of the Templars, churches of any size or importance were cruciform. Inigo Jones had, however, in the church of St. Paul's, Covent Garden, for the first time imitated a Grecian temple. Wren as far as he was allowed cast aside precedent, and constructed his churches with the primary purpose of enabling the congregation to see and hear the clergyman. "The Romanists," he said, "built large churches; it was enough if they heard the murmur of the mass, and saw the elevation of the host; but ours are to be fitted for auditories." He has not wholly succeeded perhaps even in this respect, but he succeeded better than most later architects. The interiors of his churches are indeed generally admired by those who are not wedded to particular precedents, and think originality in ecclesiastical architecture a cardinal sin. Of his church interiors, that of St. Stephen's, Walbrook, with its happy arrangement of columns, is the most general favorite, and if it were not that there is something more of solemnity wanting it would be most admirable. The auditory of this church he has covered with a cupola, so he has that of some others. Some he has made oval in plan, and covered with an elliptic cupola (as in St. Benetfink); others, like St. Mary's Abchurch, are square, and covered with a circular dome; several are modelled on the Basilica; none have the form of the Latin cross.*

If the interiors of his churches were designed for service, the towers were as certainly designed for effect. Mr. Cockerell, in his admirable "Tribute to Sir Christopher Wren," has with the greatest care and judgment brought these remarkable examples of our great architect's genius together so that they may be readily compared with each other. But properly to appreciate them they must be studied in their actual positions; and then it will be seen not only how picturesque in form they almost without exception are, but how happily they are adapted to their respective places; while every one who looks over the city so as to see several of them grouped together will acknowledge the charm which their variety affords. Although whenever he directly imitated Gothic architecture he failed utterly—as in the towers he added to Westminster Abbey—these city steeples are a sufficient proof that Wren worked in the true Gothic spirit.

We have dwelt thus long on Wren, and especially on his churches, because he is not only our first great English architect, but because he lived through the entire period of which we have to speak, and his churches are what are most characteristic of him and of his age. They are works not unimpeachable in an artistic point of view, but they are the works of a man of original thought, works of great constructional excellence, works illustrating an age of immense scientific knowledge and independent thought: in their way Wren and his cathedral are as characteristic of the age as are Newton and his Principia.

Had Wren not built either St. Paul's or his parish churches he would yet have been a great architect, though they throw all his other works into the shade. Some of his other works are indeed of no great mark. The monument is not the commonplace thing it has been represented to be, but it has not much of the originality of the monument he originally designed. Marlborough House and his additions to Hampton Court say little for his skill as a builder of palaces; he was more successful in his additions to the palace at Greenwich—now Greenwich Hospital—and in Chelsea Hospital, a work well adapted to its purpose and site. His other more important buildings were: in London, the Royal Exchange, Custom House, both long since destroyed, Temple Bar, and the College of Physicians, now a meat-market; the Sheldonian Theatre, Ashmolean Museum, Queen's College Chapel, and Gateway at Christ's Church College, Oxford; the library and other buildings at Trinity College, and the Chapel of Emanuel College, Cambridge; the Observatory, Greenwich; and the unfinished palace of Charles II. at Winchester. Wren held the office of surveyor-general from the reign of Charles II. to that of George I., when he was displaced to make way for a wretched creature named Benson, only remembered by his discreditable association with the name of Wren, the still more discreditable cause of his early ejection from the office into which he had been so unworthily inducted, and the place Pope has assigned him in the Dunciad. Wren, now in his eighty-sixth year, retired from public life and spent the brief remainder of his days, says his son, "in contemplation and study, and principally in the consolation of the Holy Scriptures: cheerful in solitude and as well pleased to die in the shade as in the light." He had held the office of surveyor for five-and-forty years: his pay as architect of St. Paul's was £200 a year; as architect of all the city churches, £100. He died at the ripe age of ninety; and his countrymen gave him a fitting burial-place, under the choir (it ought to have been under the glorious dome) of his own St. Paul's, and an epitaph worthy of the man and the place.

What Wren did for ecclesiastical, Vanbrugh did, though in a lesser measure, for English palatial architecture. Like Wren, Vanbrugh did not adopt the profession of an architect till long after he had gained celebrity in a very different line. But while a profound acquaintance with mathematics and mechanics might seem a solid basis for constructional architecture, there was little promise that a writer of licentious comedies could at the age of five or six and thirty turn with success to the practice of a profession usually considered to require a laborious course of preparatory study. Vanbrugh's first, and in some respects his finest work, was the extensive palace of the Earl of Carlisle, Castle Howard, a work that at once stamped him as a man of originality of conception, and unquestionable constructive ability. From this time he found no lack of employment, but all his commissions were for works of a similar character: he is not known to have erected a single public building, with the exception (if that can be called an exception) of a theatre in the Haymarket, which he built as a speculation of his own, and in which Congreve was his partner and Betterton his stage-manager. His chief work is Blenheim, of which he was appointed architect by the government, but in the execution of which he met with a long succession of vexations—first from the difficulty of obtaining supplies of money with sufficient regularity to carry on the work, and then, after the death of Marlborough, from the impetuous duchess, who took the building out of his hands, and though she continued it according to his designs, would not pay him his salary, or permit him (or even his wife) to enter the grounds to see the outside of the structure he had designed. Among other of his last works may be named King's Weston, near Bristol; Grimsthorpe, Yorkshire, a very striking structure; Eastbury, Dorsetshire, now pulled down; Oulton Hall, Cheshire, and Seaton Delaval, Northumberland. Vanbrugh had to endure not only the censures of pompous dulness, but the keen shafts of the wits of his day, and perhaps even now his name is most commonly associated with one or other of their pungent epigrams. It cannot be denied that his works abound in incongruities, that the massiveness is often excessive, that the parts are too much broken up, that in aiming at picturesque variety he has produced a fritter of ill-connected parts: yet about them all there is richness, imagination, originality, and power. Condemned by Swift, Pope, and Walpole, it became fashionable to sneer at Vanbrugh, till Reynolds, with the cordial fellow-feeling of genius, saw that Vanbrugh had struck into a new path, and produced what may be called a pictorial style of architecture, and feeling so at once turned the current of popular opinion by boldly expressing his own. And after all that has been said of Vanbrugh, Reynolds' is the truest appreciation of the external character of his buildings: of their interiors we fear so much could scarcely be said with justice, unless it be of the halls, which are always with him a magnificent feature. Reynolds says: "To speak of Vanbrugh in the language of a painter, he had originality of invention, he understood light and shadow, and had great skill in composition. To support his principal object he produced his second and third groups or masses: he perfectly understood in his art what is the most difficult in ours, the conduct of the background, by which the design and invention is set off to the greatest advantage. What the background is in painting, in architecture is the real ground on which the building is erected; and no architect took greater care than he that his work should not appear crude and hard: that is, it did not abruptly start out of the ground without expectation or preparation. This is a tribute which a painter owes to an architect who composed like a painter, and was defrauded of the due reward of his merit by the wits of his time, who did not understand the principles of composition in poetry better than he, and who knew little or nothing, of what he understood perfectly, the general ruling principles of architecture and painting." *

In church architecture Wren was succeeded by his pupil Hawksmoor, and by Gibbs, for the exercise of whose talents a favorable opportunity was afforded by the act of Anne, which provided for the erection of fifty new churches in London, though not nearly so many were built. Hawksmoor was a man of considerable original talent, but having been engaged to assist Vanbrugh in the erection of Castle Howard and some of his other works, he engrafted some of his new master's fancies upon the more masculine style of his original instructor. His best work is generally considered to be St. Mary's Woolnoth, Lombard Street, which has great merit both in the interior and exterior; but to our thinking Limehouse Church deserves at least to divide the crown with it. St. George's, Bloomsbury, also by him, has a portico of fine proportions; but though it has found defenders in our own day, the pyramidal steeple with its crowning statue is a huge absurdity. The chief work of Gibbs is the church of St. Martin's-in-the-Fields, the portico of which has acquired much fame. But Gibbs, like Hawksmoor, failed to learn from Wren how to design, or where to place a tower and spire. Every one of Wren's towers rises directly from the ground, and has the lower part of a massive character. In this church of St. Martin's the spire rises behind the portico, and seemingly out of the roof. Lower in the scale of merit are the churches of St. George's, Hanover Square, St. Luke's, Old Street, with an obelisk for a spire, and Greenwich, the works of John James, a man of some reputation in his day; that "chef d'œuvre of absurdity," as Walpole well designates it, St. John the Evangelist, Westminster, looking, as has often been said, with its four turrets at the angles, like a table with its legs in the air—of which Thomas Archer was the architect, and St. Giles's-in-the-Fields, and St. Olave's, Southwark, by Flitcroft. The accession of the house of Brunswick inaugurated an epoch of ecclesiastical architecture as dreary as that of William had been glorious. And in secular architecture there was not much greater promise. The best works were Chatsworth, by Talman—a very different place to the Chatsworth of our own day, but still a work of considerable merit; Woburn Abbey, by Flitcroft; and Montague House (the old British Museum), for the erection of which M. Pouget was expressly imported from France.

An evidence of the interest taken in architecture was the existence of amateur architects who erected buildings little inferior to those of their professional contemporaries. At the head of these was Dean Aldrich—the author of the famous Oxford Logic—who not only wrote a work on the "Elements of Civil Architecture," but carried his own precepts into practice by erecting from his own designs the church of All Saints, Oxford, and the building at Christ Church, known as Peckwater. The well-known library of Christ Church was the work of another amateur, Dr. Clarke, who represented Oxford in parliament in the reign of Queen Anne. But the most celebrated of these amateur architects was Lord Burlington, the great patron, if not the founder, of that new school which ripened under the Georges, and which looked up to Palladio as its head. Burlington was an ardent admirer of Inigo Jones, but acquired his knowledge of architecture and formed his taste in Italy—Palladio being the master whom he took for his model. On his return to England he devoted himself to the task of making Palladio known to his countrymen, whose taste he fancied had been corrupted by the splendid irregularities of Wren and Vanbrugh, the latter of whom he joined the wits in ridiculing. Burlington not only published the designs of Palladio, but, as illustrations of his manner, constructed the villa at Chiswick, in our own day the favorite residence of the Duke of Devonshire, and Burlington House in Piccadilly, now in the occupation of the Royal Society. The villa at Chiswick was a copy on a reduced scale of the Villa Capsa, while Burlington House was modelled on the Vitricarti Palace, both at Vicenza, and both by Palladio. Lord Burlington also erected a house for Lord Harrington at Petersham, one for the Duke of Richmond at Whitehall, another for General Wade in Cork Street, and the Assembly Rooms at York. All were greatly admired in their day, and all have a certain air of elegance; but they are wanting in the picturesqueness and vigor of those of Vanbrugh, and as it would seem wanting also in their convenience. What is good about them is borrowed. Burlington had no originality, and, despite the praises of Pope, no genius; and his influence and example did much to introduce that systematic imitativeness which for so long pressed heavily on English architecture. Burlington's assistant and disciple was Kent, "painter, sculptor, architect," as he delighted to style himself, and who in painting, sculpture, and architecture, displayed equal want of taste. Kent, however, will be remembered as a landscape gardener, in which art he, with Pope, set the example of a return to a simpler and more natural style.

Sculpture in the reign of William was the handmaid of architecture. In the decorations of St. Paul's, Wren was able to avail himself of the best talent in the country. The wook carvings of the interior were executed by Grinling Gibbons, the phœnix over the south door was by Cibber, and the conversion of St. Paul in the tympanum of the western portico, by Francis Bird.

Gibbons is believed to have been an Englishman by birth, though of Dutch parentage. He was first brought into notice by Evelyn, who, having discovered him by accident in a mean lodging, introduced him to Charles II., and to other lowlier but more liberal patrons. He executed a few statues, among others that of James II. behind the Banqueting House, Whitehall; but his great skill lay in carving birds, flowers, plants, etc., in wood, in which he still remains unequalled. The chief works of this kind executed by him are those in the choir of St. Paul's; those at Chatsworth, in which, however, he was largely assisted by others, and especially by a Derbyshire man named Watson, who possessed rare dexterity as a carver, but of whose power in designing we have no evidence; and those at Petworth, where the marvellous skill of Gibbons in this line of art is seen to most advantage. But, after all, Gibbons was rather a mechanic of matchless ability than an artist—a copyist of what he saw, and in no sense a creator.

Cibber was a native of Holstein. Having studied at Rome he came to England to seek his fortune. For a while he was employed as an assistant by John Stone, a carver of architectural work. On the death of his master Cibber set up on his own account. Although undoubtedly a man of original power, he does not seem to have ventured much beyond the line of business of his predecessor Stone. For some years he was engaged in fabricating gods, goddesses, and Roman emperors, for the house and grounds at Chatsworth. One of the two large vases at Hampton Court, and the bas-reliefs on the London Monument, are also from his chisel. So also were several of the statues in the Royal Exchange. But the work on which his fame rests are the statues of Melancholy and Raving Madness, which stood over the gateway of Old Bedlam, and which may now be seen in the South Kensington Museum; but which have suffered too much by recarving and painting to admit of their original character being fairly estimated.

* Thirteenth Discourse.

Wren's other chief assistant in the sculptures of St. Paul's, Francis Bird, was an Englishman, but studied at Brussels under Cozins. His principal work is the rilievo of the conversion of St. Paul—not one of the worst sculptural ornaments in the tympanum of a London portico; his also are the well-known statues of Queen Anne in St. Paul's churchyard, Henry VI. at Eton, and Wolsey at Christ Church. A better work than either of these, perhaps, is the monument to Dr. Busby in Westminster Abbey: the huge mass of marble erected in the same place to the memory of the Duke of Newcastle is a joint production of Bird and Gibbs. The statues on Temple Bar are the work of John Bushnell. There were other sculptors, both British and foreign, practising in England at this time, but they are now mere names, and were never anything better than carvers in stone.

A truer artist, but later in date, was Scheemakers, a Dutchman, to whom we are indebted for the admirable bust of Dryden in Westminster Abbey, and some other good busts in private collections, as well as for many worthless monuments. With his name may be associated that of another foreign sculptor, John Michael Rysbrack, who for some time was the most fashionable sculptor in this country. Like Scheemakers he was a skilful hand at a portrait-bust, and consequently found ample patronage. But he had also much skill in carving the monuments then in vogue—as may be seen in that prodigious work by him in the chapel at Blenheim, in memory of the Duke and Duchess of Marlborough. He also executed several very respectable portrait-statues.

Rysback and Scheemakers were supplanted in the popular favor by Louis François Roubiliac, a Frenchman, who for many years enjoyed unquestioned supremacy as a sculptor in this country, and whose influence was traceable in English sculpture long after Englishmen had risen to eminence in the profession. The work which brought Roubiliac into celebrity was the monument of John, Duke of Argyle, in Westminster Abbey, of its kind one of the finest monuments in that building. Westminster Abbey contains many other monuments by him, that in memory of Admiral Warren being perhaps the best, but that to Mr. and Mrs. Nightingale the most celebrated. In this, Death in the form of a skeleton is casting a dart at the lady whose husband is endeavoring to shield her from the blow. A less poetic conception it would be hard to find, but similar prosaic conceits disfigure almost all Roubiliac's more ambitious works, and destroy the pleasure which the design of many of the figures and the execution of all would otherwise produce. Roubiliac's real power is most shown, however, in his portrait statues, where he had little opportunity for the exhibition of extravagances like these, but which he too often placed in affected attitudes, and enveloped in drapery which is deficient in everything resembling sculpturesque simplicity and repose. The statues by which he is best known are those of Newton in Trinity College, Cambridge—a work of a very high order, by far the finest he ever produced, and surpassed by few of later date—Handel in Westminster Abbey, and Shakespeare in the Hall of the British Museum. Roubiliac was an imitator of Bernini, and a constructor of allegories in marble, and to his example and authority it is that we are indebted for no small portion of the monumental absurdities which disfigure our two great metropolitan and most of our provincial cathedrals.

We turn now to painting. Whatever might be the state of the arts in other respects, England had not for several generations been without portrait painters of distinguished ability. Henry VIII. employed Holbein; Mary patronized Antony More; Elizabeth, Zucchero and De Heere. Under James flourished Mytens and Vansomer; and about this time Mirevelt, Hilliard, and the elder Oliver found employment for their pencils. Vandyck was the court painter to Charles I., but he found in an Englishman, Dobson, no unworthy rival. The features of Cromwell and the commonwealth chiefs were preserved to us by the manly pencil of our countryman Walker. Under the restoration, as we have seen, Lely was the royal favorite; and his successor, Sir Godfrey Kneller, had risen into distinction when William ascended the throne.

Kneller, a German by birth, was fortunate in the country he chose for his abode, and fortunate in the time of choosing it. He learned painting under Rembrandt and Ferdinand Bol, but he had afterward studied in Rome and practised in Venice. He came to England while Lely was at the height of his celebrity, but he was patronized by the Duke of Monmouth, and granted a sitting by Charles II., and he soon found that England was a profitable field of labor. He lived till far in the reign of George I., but no change of sovereign or of dynasty produced any change in his fortune. Walpole thinks that "had he lived in a country where his merit had been rewarded according to the worth of his productions, instead of the number, he might have shone in the roll of the greatest masters."* This may well be doubted. There was something beyond his cupidity which would have prevented that; and we certainly need not regret that of all the sovereigns who sat to him,† "not one of them discovered that he was fit for more than preserving their likeness." For most painters it would have been abundant honor to have had such sitters. Kneller was not only fortunate as the painter of so many sovereigns, but even more fortunate as reckoning among his sitters an array of names illustrious in the annals of England, such as perhaps no other painter can boast, and such as would have caused the canvases of a far less worthy painter to be carefully cherished: Marlborough, Godolphin, Somers, Bentinck, Russell, Stanhope, Harley, among statesmen and soldiers; Newton, Wren, Locke, Dryden, Evelyn, Gibbons, Vanbrugh, Congreve, Pope, Atterbury, Steele, Addison, among men of science, art, and letters, are but a few of the more famous for whose likenesses we are chiefly indebted to him. Yet Kneller was far from being a good painter. The beauties of the court of William and Mary, which he painted by Mary's desire, in rivalry with Lely's Beauties of Charles II., show that when doing his best Kneller was but an indifferent painter of female loveliness. But another series of pictures produced in his later years, and when his hand was growing feeble, the "Kit-Cat" portraits,‡ evince equally with his famous head of Dryden, and several others named above, that he could paint a fine manly representation of a really intellectual countenance. In truth, Kneller was a shrewd man and a great lover of money. He saw that his fashionable customers cared little for the higher qualities of art so that he gave them smooth features and bright drapery. Portraits of this kind were easily painted, yet, even with the help of a staff of drapery painters, he found difficulty in meeting the demand for his productions. But he was a man of keen intellect, and fond of the society of intellectual men, and when he had to paint the head of one of that order, he set about it with a heartiness which insured a favorable result. His state portraits, therefore, are for the most part smooth, unmeaning, meretricious things; his portraits of eminent men have some of them great merit as works of art, while nearly all bear the stamp of unmistakable intellect.

Contemporary with Kneller during the early part of his career was an Englishman, John Riley, who was a portrait painter of very considerable ability, but he died young in 1691. The portrait painters who shared largest in the popular favor after Kneller at this time were, however, nearly all foreigners. Michael Dahl and John Closterman were, perhaps, the most conspicuous in England; Sir John Baptist Medina having been persuaded to settle in Scotland, where he painted nearly all the nobility of that country.

The rival during his later years, and the successor of Kneller as the fashionable portrait painter, was Charles Jervas, whose manner was founded on that of Kneller, but who possessed little of Kneller's knowledge of art or native ability. Pope has embalmed his memory in verses which must either be regarded as a remarkable illustration of the complacency of his muse in administering to the vanity of his friend, or of his want of judgment in painting. Along with Jervas flourished Jonathan Richardson, an amiable man, and a pleasing writer on art, but a very poor painter; his skill may be judged of by the portrait of Lord Chancellor Talbot in the National Portrait Gallery. Portrait painting has been steadily declining in England from the days of Vandyck, Dobson, and Walker. The corruption of the art was commenced by Lely, continued by Kneller, and carried on with constantly accelerating force by Jervas, Richardson, and their compeers, till it was consummated by Hudson; by whose pupil, Reynolds, however, it was once more restored to all its ancient honor.

Turning to other branches of painting we have only to record the same process of decline. Charles I. invited Rubens to adorn the ceilings of the palaces of Whitehall and Greenwich with gorgeous allegories. Charles II. employed Verrio to cover those of Windsor with similar productions. But the Neapolitan had none of the genius which enabled the brilliant Fleming to fascinate the observer in spite of the coarseness of his forms and the extravagance of his inventions. The paintings of Rubens remain the delight of the connoisseur and the artist. The cold voluptuous allegories of Verrio have become a by-word and a laughing-stock. Yet his pencil was sought after for similar works as long as he could wield it, and through the reign of William he continued to cover the saloons of the nobility with his prodigious compositions. Laguerre exceeded him in folly, and rivalled him in coarseness. Thornhill, who followed in the same line, and in whom it came to an end, was of a colder temperament; but if his works are more decent, they are also more dull. The best of Laguerre's productions are at Blenheim; the best of Thornhill's on the dome of St. Paul's and the hall of Greenwich Hospital. Henry Cooke, who painted the choir of New College Chapel, deserves a word of praise in passing for not having quite ruined the cartoons of Raffaelle, which he was directed by William to repaint and restore. Other of these ceiling-painters were Antonio Pellegrini; Sebastian Ricci, a Venetian of real ability, who seemed inclined to make England his home, but left in dudgeon on Thornhill being appointed to paint St. Paul's; and his nephew, Marco Ricci.

In other branches of painting we might mention as practising with success in this country, the names of the Vandeveldes, the famous sea-painters—the founders of a school which has never wanted followers; Hemskerk, patronized by William for his Dutch drinking pieces; Dirk Maas, the Dutch battle-painter; Godfrey Schalken, whose candle-light subjects are still eagerly purchased; Boit, the enamel painter; Monnoyer, the flower painter; Louis Cradock, who painted birds and animals; and many more of unquestionable ability. But it would be idle to dwell on them. The story would be merely a repetition of what has already been related. There was throughout a certain encouragement of painters, with little knowledge of painting. England possessed neither a school of painting, nor galleries of pictures, nor writers on art. There were no means of instruction for patrons or for students. The demand for pictures was supplied almost wholly by foreign painters of second-rate ability, who found here an amount of patronage they could not hope for in their native places. Art was almost necessarily therefore at the mercy of fashion. The leading connoisseur or the court painter set the mode, and all of inferior rank hastened to conform to it.

The true regenerator of painting in England was William Hogarth, the sturdy asserter of truth and matter of fact in painting. His merit as a satirist, a painter of manners, and a moralist have to be spoken of in another chapter. Even his contemporaries admitted his ability in these respects, though they hardly perhaps took the full measure of his genius. But Walpole only gave utterance to the common belief when he said that Hogarth was no painter. When Hogarth lived and Walpole wrote, the worship of the "Old Masters" of painting had seized hold of those whose talk was of pictures. Walpole meant that Hogarth did not imitate the composition, and copy the chiaroscuro, and borrow the colors, of the painters of the Netherlands or Italy. But though Hogarth looked out on nature for himself, and painted what he saw in the manner it appeared to his own eyes, he always placed his figures so that they would tell the story in the clearest way; drew them with skill; gave to them a truth and force of characteristic expression such as few painters of any other school ever equalled; arranged the light and shadow so as that every object should have just that measure of each which belonged to it, yet every figure and every part of the composition should hold its true place in respect of all the rest, and of the picture as a whole; colored truly and forcibly, and in harmony with the serious purpose of his pictures, although not in accordance with the traditions of painting-rooms and picture galleries; and finally in the manipulation showed an amount of dexterity in the handling of his tools such as many a painter, who is known only as a painter, might well have envied.

With the mention of Hogarth we close this sketch. He forms the link which unites this period with that in which the English school sprang into a sturdy existence, and therefore claimed notice here; but his proper place as a painter undoubtedly is at the head of the school of which he was the founder.

CHAPTER CXLVII.

Hogarth as the historian of manners in the transition-time between Anne and George III.—His art essentially dramatic—Society, in Hogarth's pictures, appears a sort of chaos—The life of the streets—The anarchy out-doors a type of the disorder in houses of public resort—Genteel debauchery—Low profligacy and crime—the cock-pit—The gaming-house—The prison—Bedlam—The rake's levee—The lady's public toilette—Marriage à-la-mode—The election prints—The sleeping congregation—Fanaticism.

When Defoe, in 1724, had given to the world three novels in which the incidents in the various fortunes of a low abandoned woman, of a more refined courtesan, and of a young thief, are related with a circumstantiality that is "like reading evidence in a court of justice," * there was an artist engraving shop-bills and silver plate for a livelihood, who was also looking with a curious eye upon the world around him. As he walked about London, all its strange exhibitions of pomp and misery—its habitual contrasts of velvet and rags—its eccentric characters, its grotesque faces—were to him materials for artistical study and for moral reflection. Did the genius of Hogarth take any direction from the genius of Defoe? Had he read "Moll Flanders," when he painted his first great fiction of the "Harlot's Progress"? Had he read "Colonel Jack" when he painted that never-to-be-forgotten figure in "Industry and Idleness" of the young blackguard who is gambling on a gravestone with Tom Idle—some such as Defoe described as "brutish, bloody, and cruel in his disposition; sharp as a street-bred boy must be, but ignorant and unteachable from a child." Charles Lamb said that Defoe's novels are "capital kitchen-reading, while they are worthy, from their interest, to find a shelf in the libraries of the wealthiest and the most learned." † Hogarth's first set of prints, in which he might originally have had the adornment of the kitchen-wall chiefly in view, became the subjects of fan-mounts, which ladies of quality displayed at the opera. The graphic representations of Hogarth have been truly termed "books." We look upon them as presenting the best materials for the history of manners in the transition time from Anne to George III. We regard Hogarth as the legitimate successor of Steele and Addison, as presenting a mirror of some portion of the higher and middle classes, and of Defoe in exploring the depths of ignorance and vice.

The works of Hogarth range over a period of nearly thirty years; from the days of Walpole and the Excise Law to the days of Wilkes and Liberty. He was the engraver as well as the painter of these representations, "which have the teeming, fruitful, suggestive meaning of words." He got small prices for his pictures. He made a fortune by his prints. Every one could read his prints; and his art went direct to the popular comprehension. His was essentially a dramatic art. But he was bound by no pedantic rules about the unities of time and place, in opposing which law of the critics Dr. Johnson was "almost frighted at his own temerity." On the other hand, he had an absolute reverence for that "poetical justice," the occasional absence of which in Shakespeare Johnson thinks a great demerit. With Hogarth, it is always vice punished, virtue rewarded. The limitations of his art might have something to do with this great object of Hogarth as a moralist. Defoe very considerably departed from such an overstrained view of the results of human conduct. Defoe does not, as a matter of course, hang the thief, and make the respectable apprentice lord mayor of London. His notion is that "the best and only good end of an impious, misspent life is repentance:" and so Colonel Jack, the pickpocket, becomes a decent member of society, and Moll Flanders ends as a respectable wife and mother after she is transported. Hogarth could not very well paint repentance, so as not to be mistaken for hypocrisy. In his pictorial stories we are taken through all the transitions of guilt and extravagance—to Bridewell, to the jail, to the madhouse, to the gallows. Society, in Hogarth's pictures, is a sort of chaos, in which filth jostles finery; grossness makes decorum blush; and drunken frenzy is well-nigh involving all things in a general conflagration, typified by the revellers at the "Rose" setting fire to the map of the world.

Many of the indications of this chaotic state of life in England may be worth a transient notice. Let us glance first at the out-door life—the life of the London streets. By day, as by night, disorder seems to reign. By day there is not the slightest appearance of authority to repress outrage or robbery, to enforce decency, or to save from accident. The brewer's carman falls asleep upon his shaft, and the child driving his hoop across the road is crushed under the wheels of the dray.* St. James's Street is crowded with sedan chairs bearing lords and ladies to Queen Caroline's drawing-room, while a group of shoeblacks, chimney-sweepers, and half-naked vagabonds are playing at cups and balls, dice, cards, and prick-in-the-garter, on the pavement.† In the city, close by the monument, the great thoroughfare to London Bridge is choked by a mob of butchers with marrow-bones and cleavers, of drummers and fiddlers, of beggars relieved with broken meat—all assembled to greet with their din the marriage of Mr. Francis Goodchild.‡ Before the window of the Enraged Musician in St. Martin's Lane, the blind hautboy player, the ballad-singer, the boy with the drum, and other gentry that the policeman now deem street nuisances, are undisturbed, while the irritable professor stops his ears and shrieks in vain. Before Covent Garden Church, on a snowy morning, market-women are warming themselves at a fire of sticks, and the quack doctor is holding forth to the crowd.§ When magistracy, even, puts on its grandest pomp and splendor in the lord mayor's show, the lumbering gilt coach is surrounded by a mob of whooping and fighting blackguards. By night, confusion is worse confounded. Bonfires blaze in the narrowest streets on occasions of public rejoicing. The Salisbury flying coach is overturned at Charing Cross, amid the crackling of tar-barrels and the hissing of squibs. Traitors' heads upon Temple Bar are lighted up by the fire beneath that burns Guy Faux. In their usual state the streets are dark. The cutpurse and the burglar roam about unmolested. The rake beats the watchman, and carries his staff and his lanthorn in triumph to the hideous revels at the night-house.‖ The "fiery fop," the "frolic drunkard," insult every passenger; and no judicious magistrate fines the rich ruffian five pounds, as in our more decorous days.

> "Lords of the street, and terrors of the way,"

The anarchy of the streets is but a type of the absence of all legal supervision and control in houses of public resort, and in places of amusement for high and low. One of Hogarth's early prints is "A Midnight Conversation." Twenty years after Steele and Addison had exhibited, under many forms, the club-life of London, Hogarth brings together a far less decorous set in tipsy jollity. They are not the drunkards of the pot-house. They are the noble Britons who, up to the end of the eighteenth century, thought it no disgrace to a gentleman to be led reeling home by the watchman, or to fall under the table, while roaring out the Bacchanalian songs which were the most precious gifts of the English muse. The president, who is concocting a fresh bowl of punch, is a rubicund divine, whose calling, according to the theory of that age, is as much denoted by the corkscrew hanging from his finger as by the band and cassock which he wears. The solemn listener next to him, with his band and his full-bottomed wig, is a barrister. Another distinguished personage of the company, judging by his laced cravat and his sword, is an undoubted gentleman, although he is so far gone in enjoyment that he sets fire to his ruffles instead of his pipe. The officer with the cockade breaks his head as he falls from his chair; and the apothecary, holding on to the table, pours brandy upon the bald pate. The justice has hung up his cocked hat and wig, and has made himself comfortable in his nightcap, sitting apart in resolute drinking. Maudlin drunkenness, ranting drunkenness, sleepy drunkenness, sprawling drunkenness, are given with inimitable minuteness of character and incident. This is genteel revelry. In the night cellar in Chick Lane, Smithfield, some of the low profligates are fighting in the background with chairs and pokers, while others are quietly smoking on. The thieves in the foreground are dividing their booty; their murdered man is thrust into a hole; the constable comes, not to disperse the whole gang of the Blood-bowl house, but to carry off Tom Idle to Newgate. He began his career by gambling in the churchyard; the beadle stands over him with a stick. He is sent to sea, and runs away from the round dozen. He comes home and becomes a thief; and the end is the last ride in a cart to Tyburn. Tyburnia is now otherwise occupied than in looking upon a procession of javelin men followed by a ragged and scrambling mob, while Tiddy-Doll sells his cakes, and but for the coffin in the cart the gathering has as merry an aspect as a country fair. This is the last step in the mad dance of low profligacy; and the great master of the ceremonies is the hangman, who sits astride upon the gallows, smoking his pipe.

What the bear-garden was in the time of Steele is the cockpit in the time of Hogarth. It is free for all men. The gambler by profession here sits by the side of the amateur in the blue ribbon, as welcome as in the ring at Epsom. The blind peer is betting with the blackguards around him, while the thief at his elbow is purloining the bank-note which my lord is prepared to stake. Another illustrious one, with a star on his breast, is jammed among the crowd; the carpenter, in his shirt-sleeves, presses on the noble shoulder, and thus disturbs the earnestness with which his lordship contemplates the two cocks at the crisis of the game.* In the fashionable gaming-house there is the same equality and happy fraternity. The rake, who has run through his inheritance, but is again master of riches by marriage with an ancient lady whom he will hate and ruin, is the central figure of the gaming-house. He has lost his money, in the frenzy of despair has torn his periwig from his head, and is invoking Heaven with curses. By the fire sits the highwayman, regardless even of the liquor he has ordered. He has no business in such company, for, according to the wise Mr. Peachum, "the man who proposes to get money by play should have the education of a fine gentleman, and be trained up to it from his youth." The company at the gaming-house are gentlemen for the most part in laced coats and ruffles. There is no want of money or credit. The usurer is lending his gold to one, and drawing his bill. Another fortunate gamester is sweeping off his stakes. All are absorbed in their joy or their rage, their hope or their despair; and the watchman who rushes in to bawl that the house is on fire can scarcely obtain a notice. The retribution must come, according to the Hogarthian doctrine, which cannot be impugned, though the moral is not always so palpable as the great painter makes it. The highwayman will be hanged, for he has lost the means of propitiating the thief-taker. The rake will go to the debtor's prison. The economy of the prison is regulated by those approved principles which subsisted for a century after Hogarth. The misery of the common-room leads to the madhouse. The terrible scenes of melancholy and laughing madness which Cibber personified in his statues are minutely displayed by Hogarth. Bedlam was an image of the external life which the painter has represented in so many aspects—the ludicrous side by side with the terrible—and the attempts to make the mad world sane were founded upon the same ignorance of moral health and disease as in the treatment of the lunatic by a general system of coercion.

Horace Walpole has remarked of Hogarth, "the very furniture of his rooms describe the characters to whom they belong. . . . The rake's levee-room, the nobleman's dining-room, the apartments of the husband and wife in marriage à-la-mode, the alderman's parlor, the poet's bedchamber, and many others, are the history of the manners of the age." This is true, as far as it goes. "It was reserved to Hogarth to write a scene of furniture." In the same way Hogarth is the great authority for costume. But dress and furniture are only a small part of the "history of the manners of the age." Let us look at the domestic life associated with these externals. The rake's levee-room is peopled with a group of figures that again remind us of the chaotic state of society even in gilded saloons. Charles

Lamb has described this remarkable exhibition as "almost a transcript" of the opening scene of Shakespeare's "Timon;" "we find a dedicating poet, and other similar characters in both." But the difference is as manifest as the similarity. In Timon's levee we have the poet, the painter, the jeweller, and the merchant. The rake, in his morning-gown, attends to the bully who grasps his sword, and places his hand on his breast, to intimate the secrecy with which he will stab in the dark. The jockey exhibits the bowl which his master's racers have won. The prize-fighter comes to teach him the science of quarter-staff. The French fencer and the attitudinizing dancing-master are ready to give their lessons. Handel is touching the harpsichord. Bridgman has his designs for a landscape garden when the villa is built:

"Heaven visits with a taste the wealthy fool."

The poet is in the antechamber spouting his verses among tailors and wigmakers. It is exaggeration, we may say, to group together such opposite professors of fashionable accomplishments. But ostentation makes no nice distinctions. The patron sees no difference between the poet and the dancing-master.

If the rake's levee may seem to some an overstrained representation, the genius of Hogarth has been vindicated by Scott seizing upon similar characteristics of the levee of George Villiers, Duke of Buckingham—"a gathering of eagles to the slaughter." Amid projectors, and gamesters, and others of "the sordid train"—who "stimulate the wild wishes of lavish and wasteful extravagance," are the poet, the architect, the musician—"all genuine descendants of the daughter of the horse-leech, whose cry is, Give, give."* Turn to the fourth plate of "Marriage à-la-mode." The Lady Squander is at her public toilette. As her hair is dressed—the most important labor of the day—Farinelli is singing to a flute accompaniment. A fashionable lady is in ecstasy; a country gentleman is asleep. The coxcomb sips his coffee with the vacant indifference that belongs to an exquisite with his hair in papers. The mistress of the mansion, whose plebeian wealth has been wedded to titled poverty, is receiving from a gentleman who is lolling upon a sofa a ticket for the masquerade. The barrister who drew the settlement for the marriage of the lady is thus making arrangements for a very prompt dissolution of the tie. The citizen's daughter is the victim of the lawyer's profligacy. The lawyer passes his sword through the noble husband, and is hanged. The lady takes poison. There are various scenes of this drama before we reach the catastrophe. One scene has been painted with matchless skill. The lady has passed the night in her splendid mansion, amid a crowd of visitors. She has snatched an hour or two of broken and feverish sleep, and has risen unrefreshed to a late breakfast. The servants have been unable to repair the disorder of the previous night. It is noon, but the candles are still burning, the furniture is disarranged, the floor is strewed with music, and books of games, and overturned chairs. The husband has spent his night from home. The jaded debauchee—his dress disordered, his features pale and fallen, his whole attitude expressive of that withering satiety which has drunk the dregs of what is called pleasure, and found nothing but poison in the cup—tells a tale of the ruin which has overwhelmed thousands. Neither the besotted husband nor the careless wife can listen to the silent remonstrances of the old steward, who comes to them with a bundle of unpaid bills, and a file with only one receipt upon it. The uplifted hand and careworn face of the old servant distinctly paint the ruin which he sees approaching in debt and dishonor. The catastrophe, indeed, is more sudden than he expects.

If this be the life of fashionable England, we can scarcely be surprised at its "Gin Lane," where the drunken wife lets her infant fall from her arms down an area, and the tumble-down house reveals the spectral sight of a wretch hanging to a beam. The moral is here written in capital letters, which those who run may read. The moral is not quite so legible, when we look upon that print in which Francis Goodchild, esquire, sheriff of London, is represented as feasting the liverymen of his company. The eager clamor for fresh supplies; the gloating satisfaction of the healthful feeder; the exhausted appetite of the apoplectic gorger—these triumphs of civilization may yet attest that Hogarth was "not for an age, but for all time" in some of these note-books. The satire of his "election" is of course only local and temporary. There is now no treating allowed. The odious attempt to seduce the incorruptible British patriot by a vulgar feast is proscribed by statute and by custom. No candidate at the head of the table, with "Liberty and Loyalty" for his banner, submits to be whispered to by a fat old hag, while a facetious elector knocks their heads together. No haberdasher brings an assortment of ribbons and gloves, and is paid by a promissory note. The wife threatening her husband with vengeance if he refuses the proffered bribe, is necessarily extinct. The attorney knocked off his chair by a brickbat that comes through the window, can no longer apply to the gentle people that some libellers in our day call "roughs." The banner of "No Jews" has gone, with every other proclamation of intolerance. Ignorance is banished and no longer shouts "Give us our eleven days." The print of the canvas, again, must be quite obsolete in its allusions. The yeoman no longer stands between two rival agents, with his palm open to each. This sturdy Englishman is not Garrick between tragedy and comedy. He is not Hercules between virtue and pleasure. He is an honest elector, who then did what he thought best for his family. He was tempted, and he yielded. All such temptations are at an end. No man takes guineas in the open street; and we may therefore presume that bribery has ceased to exist. Then, again, no such scenes can take place as in Hogarth's Election Booth, for a registration has been established, and all is fairness and tranquillity. No dying freeholder is brought from his bed to the poll; no idiotic cripple has the name of the Blue candidate shouted in his one ear, and of the Yellow in the other. No counsel are now vociferating for or against the legality of the voter who has lost his hands, taking hold of the Testament with his iron hook. No group of voters now chuckle over a squib which, in addition to its subtle wit, has the picture of one of the candidates on a gallows. Lastly, the solemnity of Chairing has gone out, and perhaps the accompanying generosity of setting free and enlightened non-electors to scramble for sixpences. Hogarth has painted a scene of riot, broken heads, blind fiddlers and dancing bears, which have no exact parallel in our age; and the evils of an election may therefore be supposed, by some believers in social perfectibility, to have died out, with many other political evils, in our more decent times.

Hogarth lived at a period when some very signal changes in morals and manners were slowly developing themselves, under influences which were either ridiculed or regarded as unworthy of notice. The chaotic state of society which he has so truthfully set forth in its most striking examples must not be received as the whole truth. The essayists, the dramatists, the novelists, the painters, have furnished almost the only materials we possess for estimating the peculiar characteristics of a modern age. But we must not attempt to believe that many of their representations of vice and folly were any other than exceptions to the average amount of decorum and good sense which regulated the intercourse of the higher and middle classes, and of respect for the laws and for public order which, taken as a whole, the laboring class manifested. When we look at the defective state of the municipal administration of the country—the total absence of means for the prevention of crime, except the terror of the barbarous code for its punishment—we may almost be surprised that there were not more Gin Lanes and more Blood-bowl houses. When we regard the comparatively small influence which the Church then exercised upon social evils, we may wonder how the upper classes passed from the corrupt atmosphere of Hogarth's saloons into the more healthful air of the court-life of eighty years ago. A great change had then come over all classes. Hogarth has two prints which he produced out of his keen observation of passing things—manifestations which he could scarcely be expected to regard with a prophetic or philosophic spirit. "The Sleeping Congregation" of 1736 speaks of the time when the bewigged preacher droned through his tedious hour, without the slightest attempt to touch the vicious or to rouse the indifferent. The "Credulity, Superstition, and Fanaticism, a Medley," of 1762, tells that a new power had arisen. The chief object is the ridicule of Methodism. Whitefield's Journal and Wesley's Sermons figure by name among the accessories of the piece, where the ranting preacher is holding forth to the howling congregation. Pope had described the "harmonic twang" of the donkey's bray—

* "Peveril of the Peak."

"There, Webster, pealed thy voice, and Whitefield thine." *

Bishop Lavington had written "The Enthusiasm of Methodists and Papists compared." Hogarth followed the precedent, in all ages, of despising reformers. The followers of George Whitefield and of John Wesley might be ignorant, superstitious, fanatical. They themselves might have indirectly encouraged the delusions of a few of their disciples. But they eventually changed the face of English society.

At seven o'clock of the morning of the first of August, 1714, Queen Anne died. The course of proceeding under this event had been determined by statute in 1705. The council was immediately to meet, and then to open three sealed packets, which contained the names of persons nominated by the Protestant successor to the throne, to act with seven great officers of state named in the statute, as lord justices. No contest, therefore, could arise about the temporary possession of authority. When the dying queen appointed Shrewsbury lord high treasurer, the hopes of the Jacobite party received a fatal blow. When the sealed packets were opened, and eighteen peers, the greater number of whom were Whigs, were nominated by the Elector of Hanover, the schemes for the restoration of the exiled family, which had been gradually maturing in the last four years of the reign of Anne, were more effectually crushed. The French agent wrote to Louis XIV. that Bolingbroke was grievously disappointed; for he had said that in six weeks, if the queen's death had not occurred, matters would have been in such a state that there would have been nothing to fear for the future. "What a world is this, and how does fortune banter us," writes Bolingbroke to Swift. There was a bold accomplice in Bolingbroke's plots who was not inclined at first to grieve over the caprices of fortune. It is related upon the authority of Dr. Lockier, Dean of Peterborough, that, upon the death of the queen, Atterbury urged the immediate proclamation of the pretender, to which Ormond demurring, the bishop replied with an oath, "we have not a moment to lose." Lockier, who was a personal friend of George I., says, "Such a bold step would have made people believe that they [the Jacobites] were stronger than they really were, and might have taken strangely. The late king, I am persuaded, would not have stirred a foot, if there had been a strong opposition; indeed the family did not expect this crown; at least nobody in it but the old Princess Sophia." † Opposition there was none. The lords justices issued a proclamation, declaring that the high and mighty Prince George, Elector of Brunswick Lüneburg, had, by the death of Queen Anne, become our rightful and liege lord, King of Great Britain, France, and Ireland. Multitudes crowded round the heralds as they proclaimed the stranger king. Not a voice of dissent was raised. The same afternoon the parliament met, according to the provision of the Act of Regency. The lords justices entered upon their administrative functions. The Peers and the Commons sent congratulations to the new sovereign upon his happy and peaceable accession to the throne, and besought his majesty to give the kingdom the advantage of his royal presence as soon as possible. The civil list was settled upon the same scale as had been granted to Queen Anne. Throughout England, Scotland, and Ireland no popular discontent was manifested. The title of King George was recognized by France and the other European powers, whether Protestant or Catholic. There was partial dissatisfaction, no doubt, among some of that class of politicians whose loyalty was determined by the extent to which their personal interests were expected to be gratified. The name of Marlborough was not found in the list of those nominated to the Regency, and he retired to the country, after having made a sort of triumphal entry into London. Many a solicitation for place and preferment went over to Hanover. But the new king exhibited no eagerness to quit the quiet country where he was respected, and where he had no contests of Whig and Tory to disturb his peace. It was the 18th of September when George, accompanied by his eldest son, landed at Greenwich.

That the new king should have been received with acclamations when he set his foot on English soil was a matter of course. But his personal appearance and demeanor were not calculated to excite any fervid enthusiasm. He was fifty-four years of age. He was below the middle stature. He was shy and awkward. He could not speak English. His public virtues were probably little known to his new subjects. Possessing despotic power, he had governed his Hanoverians wisely and beneficently; and the people shed tears of real grief when he left them. He had no showy qualities. He was unfortunate in his marriage, and did not win popular respect by the exercise of the domestic virtues. Every one knew that twenty years before the Elector George Louis was called to the throne of England—that is, in 1694, when he was electoral heir-apparent—some terrible tragedy had occurred in the palace of Hanover. Count Philip Königsmark suddenly disappeared. Princess Sophia Dorothea, the wife of the electoral prince, was divorced in a somewhat irregular way by a court held at Hanover, and was now pining away her life in the castle of Aldhen, with no glimpse of the outer world but the dreary Heath of Lüneburg. "Old peasants, late in the next century, will remember that they used to see her sometimes driving on the heath—beautiful lady, long black hair, and the glitter of diamonds in it; sometimes the reins in her own hand, but always with a party of cavalry around her, and their swords drawn." * Sophia, born Princess of Zell, was the mother of George II., who constantly asserted her innocence. Of her imprudence there could be no doubt. Her sad story has furnished abundant matter of controversy. After the death of George I., under the floor of the princess's dressing-room a body was discovered which was considered to be that of Count Königsmark. Horace Walpole, who derived his information from his father Sir Robert, assumes that the unfortunate victim of jealousy was there secretly strangled. Later accounts allege that there was a scene of violence and loss of life, in which Königsmark had openly to encounter many persons. "It has at length," says the historian of Frederick the Great, "become a certainty, a clear fact, to those who are curious about it. . . . Crime enough is in it, sin and folly on both sides; there is killing too, but not assassination (as it turns out); on the whole there is nothing of atrocity, and nothing that was not accidental, unavoidable; and there is a certain greatness of decorum on the part of those Hanover princes and official gentlemen, a depth of silence, of polite stoicism, which deserves more praise than it will get in our times." †

The unostentatious sovereign, "all dressed in brown, even his stockings," ‡ was not fitted by nature to form for himself a court-party, by which he might in some degree have neutralized the two great parliamentary parties. He had been accustomed to govern a small country through ministers to whom his will was law; and he did not understand the complications which made the King of England in many respects the possessor of a nominal power, while the real power was with those called his servants. The novelty of his position is well illustrated by his majesty's account of one of his earliest impressions. He said, "This is a strange country. The first morning after my arrival at St. James's I looked out of the window, and saw a park, with canals, etc., which they told me were mine. The next day Lord Chetwynd, the ranger of my park, sent me a fine brace of carp out of my canal; and I was told I must give five guineas to Lord Chetywnd's servant for bringing me my own carp out of my own canal in my own park." § King George was inevitably and completely thrown into the hands of the great Whig party, to whose firmness and decision he was indebted for his quiet accession to the throne. It was not a question, as in the early days of King William, whether the government could be best conducted by the union of party leaders or by one dominant party. George had not the ability or the ambition to be in many respects his own minister, as William was. He had to rely upon the chiefs of the party who upheld his parliamentary title to the crown, in opposition to the party who would have clung to the hereditary title. The Chevalier St. George had issued from Lorraine, on the 29th of August, a manifesto, in which he asserted his right to the throne. He had been inactive, he said, "until the death of the princess, our sister, of whose good intention toward us we could not for some time past well doubt; and this was the reason we then sat still, expecting the good effects thereof, which were unfortunately prevented by her deplorable death." Bolingbroke, the chief encourager of those good intentions, was removed from his office of secretary of state, and the seals were taken from him with some impolitic want of respect. Lord Townshend was appointed in his place, and the other great offices were filled up by leading Whigs. The doubts of Marlborough's fidelity to the Hanoverian succession had been manifested by the omission of his name in the Council of Regency. He was, nevertheless, nominated to his former offices of captain general and master of the ordnance. Trusted, however, he was not; and he justified the suspicions which attached to his proverbial faithlessness by sending, as a loan, a sum of money to the pretender, just before the unsuccessful issue of the rising of 1715 furnished evidence that the Stuart cause had become in a great degree hopeless.

The coronation of the king took place on the 20th of October. The peers of both parties attended the ceremony. In January the parliament was dissolved, and the writs for a new election were sent out. When the two houses met on the 17th of March, the preponderance of the Whigs was decidedly manifested. The king opened the parliament in person, but his speech was read by the lord chancellor. Its tone was moderate and conciliatory. "Let no unhappy divisions of parties here at home divert you from pursuing the common interest of your country." The address of the peers contained a passage which excited an animated debate, in which Bolingbroke spoke for the last time. "To recover the reputation of this kingdom in foreign parts" was held to be injurious to the memory of the late queen. The offensive sentence was carried by a large majority. The address of the Commons was still more pointed against the latter advisers of Queen Anne.

The pretender's hopes, it was said, "were built upon the measures that had been taken for some time past in Great Britain. It shall be our business to trace out those measures whereon he placed his hopes, and to bring the authors of them to condign punishment." It was clear that the new possessors of power would not attempt to win over their enemies by conciliation. Oxford, who was probably not so deeply committed as some of his colleagues, patiently awaited the approaching storm. Ormond braved its utmost fury, and openly associated with the most suspected Jacobites. Bolingbroke appeared at Drury Lane Theatre, bespoke a play for the ensuing night's performance, and then fled to France. He soon after became secretary of state to the prince who asserted his right to the crown of England as James III., and to the crown of Scotland as James VIII. On the 9th of April the secretary of state, Stanhope, laid a mass of papers on the table of the Commons, which had reference to the peace of Utrecht and the cessation of arms which preceded it. These were referred to a secret committee. On the 9th of June their report was presented, and then Walpole rose, and impeached Bolingbroke of high treason. The resolution of impeachment was passed without a division. Lord Coningsby then impeached Robert, Earl of Oxford, of high treason and other crimes and misdemeanors. This resolution was also carried without a division. On the 21st of June a similar impeachment of Ormond was decided by a majority of forty-seven. Ormond followed Bolingbroke in his flight to France. Acts of attainder were immediately passed against both these fugitives. Oxford was impeached at the bar of the lords, and was committed to the Tower.

During the autumn of 1714 it became manifest that the old high-church spirit was again stirring up the bitterest party strife. There were riots at Bristol on the night of the king's coronation, when the cry was, "Down with the Roundheads! God bless Doctor Sacheverel!" At Birmingham, Norwich, Reading, and other towns, there were similar disturbances. The elections of the spring of 1715 were conducted with more violent excitement than at any previous period. Mob intimidation was held to be more effective even than bribery. The impeachments of Bolingbroke, Oxford, and Ormond were followed by riots of a really serious character. At Manchester, in June, the meeting-houses of dissenters were destroyed by a triumphant mob; the prisons were thrown open; the health of King James was openly drunk. In July tumults of an alarming nature occurred in the midland counties, especially in Staffordshire, where the dissenters were the universal objects of outrage. The powers of the justice of peace and the constable were quite unequal to cope with these manifestations of the blind fury of the populace. These disturbances gave occasion to the Riot Act, which, with some modifications, continues to be the law of the land.

On the 21st of September the parliament was adjourned. The royal speech alluded to an event of momentous importance, "the open and declared rebellion which is now actually begun in Scotland." Since the abortive attempt of Prince James Edward to invade Scotland with a French army in 1708, there had been outward tranquillity; but there was considerable dissatisfaction among the Scottish adherents to the national independence, which they held was imperilled by the union. There had been serious differences, also, between the Presbyterians and the tolerated Episcopalians. The Hanoverian king had been proclaimed at Edinburgh without any manifestations opposed to the triumphant attitude of the Whigs. The Jacobites "were so confounded at this surprising turn of Providence that they durst not move a tongue against it in public." * Yet the numerical strength of the scattered supporters of the old dynasty in Scotland was probably greater than that of the sober and industrious inhabitants of towns, who had a natural horror of political convulsions. The Lowland Lairds, a jovial and thoughtless race, having little acquaintance with the real business of life, and very slight participation in the conduct of public affairs, were ready enough to hiccup out sedition as they drained their punch-bowls to the health of King James. They could enforce military service upon the theory of feudal obedience; but they had lost the power of practically organizing those tenants who were once content to be accounted vassals. On the contrary, in the Highlands there was still in vigor the old clannish spirit, which could readily convert the mountaineers into a formidable army. If the chiefs of clans could again agree to take part in a general insurrection, they might co-operate with the discontented Lowlanders; and with the aid of the Roman Catholic gentry of the English border counties, the Hanoverian succession might be overthrown by one vigorous blow. Such was the belief that produced the rebellion of 1715.

Among the Scottish nobles who had advocated the union none had been more zealous than John Erskine, Earl of Mar, who came to Edinburgh as secretary of state in 1706, under the Whigs, and continued to be secretary under the Tories. His happy art of accommodating himself to circumstances procured him the name of "Bobbing John." In the interval between the death of Queen Anne and the arrival of King George in England the Earl of Mar addressed a letter to his new sovereign, in which, as one of his secretaries of state, he congratulated him upon his happy accession; set forth that his own sincerity and faithfulness were out of dispute, seeing the part he acted "in the bringing about and making of the union, when the succession to the crown of Scotland was settled in your majesty's family;" and protested that "your majesty shall ever find me as faithful and dutiful a subject and servant as ever any of my family have been to the crown, or as I have been to my late mistress the queen."

The advisers of George had small confidence in these protestations; and upon the changes which ensued after the arrival of the king, the Earl of Mar was removed from his important office, and the Duke of Montrose was appointed in his stead. He came to London, married a daughter of the Duke of Kingston, one of the great Whig party, attended the royal levee on the 1st of August, and on the 2d was on his way to Scotland to organize an insurrection. In one of the most curious memoirs of that period, the Master of Sinclair, who took an important part in the great rising of 1715, directs against Mar the extremest force of "the peculiar tone of asperity" which caused his narrative to be so long withheld from the public eye.† In his view the mind of Mar was as deformed as his body.

The motives of Mar in raising the standard of revolt are thus described by this bitter censor: "Having no other game to play, knowing that the mobs and broils in England had roused the Scots Tories, who were very attentive to all that passed there, which, according to their laudable custom, they magnified to cheat themselves, he did not know how far, with his management, and making use of so favorable a conjuncture, he might work them up before things turned stale, and while their spirits were in a ferment. If, by the force of lying, and making them believe he was trusted by the English Jacobites and the King [James], he should succeed in raising them, no matter what came of it, he could lose nothing, not even a reputation." * Even Sir Walter Scott gives Mar credit for no higher principles of action than "disappointed ambition and mortified pride." † Disguised as a working-man, the earl, with two friends and two servants, sailed from London to Newcastle in a collier; and there hiring a vessel, went up the Frith of Forth, and landed at Elie, a village in Fifeshire. In his way to his castle of Kildrummie he issued invitations for a great hunting-party in the forest of Mar. On the 26th of August several noblemen and gentlemen of "interest in the Highlands" were assembled round Mar's castle, with a following of about eight hundred men. On the 3d of September a meeting of a more select number was held at Aboyne, a castle of the Gordon family; when Mar, "telling them of his design, he showed them the king's picture, which was all the credentials he had." ‡ This portrait he repeatedly kissed.

He subsequently issued a manifesto announcing his appointment to command the forces, which appointment the Master of Sinclair holds to have been forged. On the 6th of September the Earl of Mar, in his capacity of general, raised the royal standard in Braemar, and proclaimed James VIII. King of Scotland, and James III. King of England. The Highlanders beheld with dismay the fearful omen of the gilt ball on the top of the flagstaff being carried away by a gust of wind. The chiefs separated, to send the fiery cross through their districts, at whose sight their vassals were expected to prepare to appear in arms at a general rendezvous. Mar accompanied the signal by a gentle enforcement of his commands, addressed to his baillie of the lordship of Kildrummie: "Let my own tenants in Kildrummie know, that if they come not forth with their best arms, I will send a party immediately to burn what they shall miss taking from them. And they may believe this only a threat—but by all that's sacred, I'll put it in execution, let my loss be what it will, that it may be an example to others. You are to tell the gentlemen that I expect them in their best accoutrements on horseback, and no excuse to be accepted of. Go about this with all diligence, and come yourself and let me know your having done so. All this is not only as ye will be answerable to me, but to your king and country." §

The tenants upon whom Mar desired to enforce this obedience to his arbitrary will were not under the absolute command of a chief as were the Highland clans. They are described as people of a Lowland origin, who spoke the English language with the northern accent. ‖ A more unlimited authority was exercised over their Highlanders by the Marquis of Tullibardine, the eldest son of the Duke of Athol, by the Marquis of Huntly, the eldest son of the Duke of Gordon, by the Earl of Panmure, by the Earl of Southesk, and by many lesser chieftains, under whose command the white cockade was speedily worn by their devoted vassals. The great soldier and statesman, John, Duke of Argyle—the Mac Callum Mhor, under whose command thousands of Celtic followers would fight either for King James or King George—was the stanch supporter of the Hanoverian succession, and to him was confided the command of the government forces in Scotland. The general body of Presbyterians soon saw that, although they might clamor against the union and the Whig ministers, there was no alliance for them with the Roman Catholic and the Episcopalian supporters of King James. There was many a discontented laird like the Master of Sinclair, who "had an innate zeal and affection for all the remains of the old royal family of Scotland," and had a great contempt for the "wretches of a mushroom growth," who had been thriving upon the improving industry of the country, "and thereby put themselves upon a level with those whose vassals they were not long before." * The people, properly so called, had no participation in the rising of 1715. Wherever there was wealth, the fruit of industrious labor—as in the country south of the Forth and the Clyde—Jacobitism had no strong hold. From the Highlands, with the exception of a few districts, the discontented chieftains could carry a large following to the field. In the northern counties of England there were many Jacobites and Papists; but the rebel leaders of Scotland were wofully deceived in the expectation from them of any important aid. According to Sir Walter Scott "the handful of Northumberland fox-hunters seem never to have had any serious thoughts of fighting, and soon sickened of it." †

At the moment when Mar raised the standard of revolt in Scotland the news arrived of the death of Louis XIV. The great monarch died on the 1st of September. Bolingbroke, who as long as the king lived was sanguine of engaging the aid of France in the restoration of the Stuart family, wrote to his friend Sir William Wyndham, "my hopes sunk as he declined, and died when he expired." The Scottish Jacobites affected to make light of the loss of this consistent supporter of their cause. One of them said to the Master of Sinclair, "A young prince, such as the regent, would push our affair with more vigor than the old king, who was half-doated." The regent Duke of Orleans was more politic than to quarrel with the English government, and he not only rendered no assistance, but intercepted the military stores provided for the insurgents at the expense of the Chevalier St. George. The "honest men," as the Jacobites named their party, were left to their own resources. Some of their first movements were successful. Others as signally failed. They were defeated in a bold attempt to seize the castle of Edinburgh on the 9th of September. Lord Drummond had concerted this enterprise with ninety gentlemen, according to one authority; ‡ with fifty young apprentices, advocates' servants, writers, and some servants of the government, according to the Master of Sinclair. They had corrupted a sergeant, a corporal, and two sentinels of the garrison. The sentinel on duty was to draw up a scaling-ladder; and the operation was being performed when the ladder was found too short. In this dilemma they lingered and hesitated till the patrol approached to relieve the sentinel; when he drew down the grappling-iron, fired his piece, and shouted "Enemy." The conspirators escaped as well as they could, but four or five were secured by the civil authorities as they leaped down from the lower shelf of the rock. The Master of Sinclair, who had joined the insurgents in spite of his doubts of their prudence and his contempt of their leader, set out from the camp at Perth at the head of four hundred horsemen, each with a trooper behind him; and having marched through Fife with great expedition, succeeding in boarding a government vessel laden with arms that was at anchor near Burntisland. They thus obtained the means of arming four hundred rebels, and returned unmolested to the headquarters at Perth, where Mar had now about twelve thousand men under his command. As usual with the Highland chieftains, some were quarrelling about the post of honor, and all were waiting the opportunity for some lucky undertaking, and neglecting the means of their own safety. The Master of Sinclair says, "Mar, after coming into Perth, did nothing all this while but write; and, as if all had depended on his writing, nobody moved in any one thing. There was not a word spoke of fortifying the town, nor the least care taken of sending for powder to any place. We did not want gunsmiths; and yet none of them were employed in mending our old arms. Whoever spoke of these things, which I did often, was giving himself airs; for we lived very well, and as long as meat, drink, and money was not wanting, what was the need of any more?" § The leaders in this strange insurrection seemed to believe that the mere announcement of their intentions to place James on the throne, coupled with their implicit reliance on Mar's assurance that their king was coming with irresistible aid from France, would suffice for their triumph in Scotland, while the advance of some of their forces into England would at once drive the Elector of Hanover from his usurped power.

with about fifteen hundred regular troops. Small as this army was, the position of Argyle was such that Mar could not venture an attempt to force a passage, if he desired to move southward to assist a rising on the English border. Nor could he venture with his main body to cross the Frith of Forth, for a large naval force was cruising on that coast. Moreover, Mar, if these impediments could have been overcome, could not safely move his whole army, for he had received letters from Bolingbroke stating "that in all probability the king would land very quickly in the north of Scotland." It was therefore determined to send a large detachment of the rebel force to the aid of the southern insurgents, while the main army remained at Perth to await their expected royal leader. This determination was executed with skill and boldness. Two thousand five hundred men marched under the command of Brigadier Mac Intosh, an experienced soldier, toward the coast of Fife, where a number of boats had been collected in various small harbors. To divert the English cruisers, an appearance of bustle in preparing craft was made in the neighborhood of Burntisland; while an embarkation of troops took place at Craile, Anstruther, and other small places, where the estuary was broadest, and a passage in open boats would be considered hazardous. On the night of the 2d of October sixteen hundred men were thus carried across to landing-places on the southern coast of the Forth, near North Berwick. Another detachment, which sailed later, was not so successful; for the government vessels were then on the alert, and a portion of the troops had to return to the Fife coast, while three hundred landed on the Isle of May, having been chased thither by ships of war. These men, under the leadership of Lord William Murray, sustained great privations, having been blockaded on the island by the government vessels. The Master of Sinclair, who seldom indulges in panegyric, pays a tribute to the heroism of this fourth son of the Duke of Athol—"the school-boy" who kept his men together, and refused himself to leave the island till he had brought them all safely off. Mac Intosh and his little army were tempted to depart from the instructions of Mar to go "on south, to meet our friends who are in arms there," so as to be out of Argyle's reach before he could come up with them. They resolved, on the contrary, to attack Edinburgh before Argyle could be there to defend it. But the delay of a day in their western march afforded time to the civic authorities to summon the duke from Stirling; and he was at Edinburgh with five hundred horse, as the foot soldiers of Mac Intosh arrived. They found no supporters waiting for them in arms, and they marched to Leith, which town they entered without resistance, and then posted themselves in the remains of the citadel, built by Cromwell, but demolished at the restoration. Here, having seized some cannon and ammunition from vessels in the harbor, they were enabled to show so firm an attitude that Argyle, having no artillery, thought it imprudent to attack them. After having held Leith for two days the insurgents, on the night of the 15th, marched at the lowest ebb of the tide along the sands beyond Musselburgh; and they reached Seton House, the castellated mansion of the Earl of Winton, early in the morning of the 16th. Here they remained safely till the 19th; for Argyle had hurried back to Stirling on receiving intelligence that Mar's army was moving southward. The movement of Mar was a judicious feint to avert the attack that would probably have been fatal to the band of Mac Intosh.

The march of these Highlanders to the south of Scotland, and onward to Preston, has been minutely described by one who deserted their cause and gave testimony against his confederates, but whose narrative is full of those curious details which personal observation can alone supply.* On the first day of their march they reached Longformachus. On the second day, at Dunse, they proclaimed King James, the Highlanders being drawn up in order of battle. On arriving at Kelso, on the 22d, they were met, according to appointment, by a body of horsemen from the south of Scotland, and of Northumbrians. The Scots were under the command of Lord Kenmure; the English under that of Mr. Forster. These leaders were chosen as being Protestants, to counteract the prevailing opinion that this was a Roman Catholic insurrection. The number of the English did not exceed three hundred. Having crossed the deep and rapid Tweed, they entered the town, and the Highlanders soon joined them from the Scottish side, "with their bagpipes playing, led by old Mac Intosh; but they made a very indifferent figure; for the rain and their long marches had extremely fatigued them, though their old brigadier, who marched at the head of them, appeared very well." * Among the English was Lord Derwentwater, who, with many friends and all his servants, "mounted, some upon his coach-horses, and others upon very good useful horses, and all very well armed," had united his fortunes, and given the countenance of his excellent character to this feeble attempt to overthrow a strong government. On Sunday, the 23d, the Reverend Mr. Patten was directed to preach "at the great kirk of Kelso," the grand old Norman abbey church. Protestants and Papists both attended the service, and the chaplain pays his tribute of admiration to the decency and reverence with which the common Highlanders behaved. A Presbyterian clergyman preached in the afternoon. On the Monday, King James was proclaimed, "with colors flying, drums beating, and bagpipes playing;" and a long document was read, entitled "Manifesto by the noblemen, gentlemen, and others, who dutifully appear at this time in asserting the undoubted right of their lawful sovereign, James VIII., by the grace of God King of Scotland, England, France, and Ireland, defender of the faith, etc., and for relieving this, his ancient kingdom, from the oppressions and grievances it lies under." The evils of the union were dwelled upon in this manifesto. It talked about the preservation of laws, liberties, and property, with freedom from foreign domination; and it inferred that the restoration of the Stuarts would be the best security for the Protestant religion. Never were words more unmeaningly used, to cover the one design which was clearly enough expressed in the text which Mr. Patten chose for his sermon: "The right of the first-born is his." And so the borderers who stood armed in the market-place at Kelso shouted, "No union! No malt-tax! No salt-tax!" and the poor Highlanders probably wondered how nobly the English gentlemen, who were assembled with their fiery racers and hunters, and were surrounded by their liveried servants, would be able to reward them for having left their native hills to engage in a cause of which nothing was said that they could comprehend. The insurgents lingered at Kelso for five days, and then the little army of about fourteen hundred men moved forward. They at last moved, after much debate whether they should march to the west of Scotland and attack Dumfries and Glasgow, or return northward and give battle to General Carpenter, who was following them, as they knew, or go boldly into England, where they were assured twenty thousand men of Lancashire would join them. This plan was at last resolved upon, and the march was commenced to Jedburgh, and thence to Hawick. Here the Highlanders resisted the decision to cross the border. They separated themselves, and went to the top of a rising ground; there resting their arms, and declaring that "they would fight if they would lead them on to the enemy, but they would not go to England." Lord Winton had told them that if they went to England they would be all cut in pieces or sold for slaves. They, however, agreed to keep together as long as they stayed in Scotland. As the little army advanced in a westerly direction along the border, their discontent became more manifest. They were threatened by their southern allies, whom they appeared more ready to fight than to obey. They were tempted by the offer of sixpence a day—a promise to them of fabulous wealth. But five hundred of the obstinate mountaineers went off, and dispersed themselves in the hills and moors, in the hope to reach, sooner or later, their distant homes. On the 31st of October the diminished forces had reached Longtown. When they were on English ground the command of the whole band was assumed by Mr. Forster, who held his commission from the Earl of Mar.

The insurgent force, although under imperfect discipline and irregularly armed, was so formidable in its appearance that fifteen thousand of the posse comitatus, called out to oppose them, fled in terror at their approach to Penrith. Of this valiant body Lord Lonsdale and the Bishop of Carlisle were the chief leaders. Patten, with a covert sarcasm, says that many blamed Lord Lonsdale for his retreat; but those who knew how unprepared with arms and stores the multitude was, justly commended his wise conduct. At Penrith King James was proclaimed, and the Highlanders had the comfort of finding abundant good cheer which had been prepared for the English whom they had scared away. They conducted themselves with civility toward the inhabitants, who gazed with wonder, not unmixed with fear, upon the brigadier, who "looked with a grim countenance" as he rode at the head of his strangely accoutred men. Reaching Lancaster on the 7th of November, they were welcomed by Roman Catholic families; and it is recorded that "the gentlemen soldiers dressed and trimmed themselves up in their best clothes, for to drink a dish of tea with the ladies of this town."* Lancaster, with its castle, offered a strong position for defence; but, says Patten, "our infatuations were not yet over." Having halted for two days, they marched on to Preston, through roads which long after were described as the worst in England. This town obtained its name of "proud Preston," as being a favorite residence of the rich Catholic families. Two troops of dragoons quartered here moved off on the approach of the rebels. It seemed to them as if England could offer no resistance to their march. At Preston they were joined by many of the Catholic gentry, with their tenants and servants. Although this accession of strength fell far short of their expectation of a general rising in the northern counties, the insurgents were full of confidence. They abandoned themselves to the pleasures of the hour as if no danger were at hand. "The ladies in this town," writes one Peter Clark, "are so very beautiful, and so richly attired, that the gentlemen soldiers, from Wednesday to Saturday, minded nothing but courting and feasting." Mr. Forster, the commander of the rebel forces, seems to have been wholly unequal to the duty he had assumed. He relied upon the sanguine assurances of the Lancashire Jacobites that no force could approach Preston on the English side. He was contented to have intelligence of General Carpenter's movements in his advance from Scotland. On the night of Friday, the 11th of November, the news came that a force under General Wills was marching from Wigan upon Preston. A council of war was immediately held, but without the chief in command, who, it was alleged, had received "some damage at a convivial entertainment," so that it became necessary he should retire to bed. The orders given by this council were countermanded by Forster the next morning. He went forth to look upon the enemy when he could no longer doubt of their approach. At the bridge over the Ribble, about half a mile from the town, Forster had stationed a small detachment; but it was soon withdrawn by him, and the road to Preston from the south was left open instead of being resolutely defended. Patten says that General Wills expected that the rebels would have made a stand at the bridge, which they might have barricaded, and he therefore advanced cautiously through the deep and narrow lane which led from the bridge. This lane was the place where Oliver Cromwell was resisted in an uncommon manner, according to Patten's narrative, by the king's forces in 1648, "who, from the height, rolled down upon him and his men, when they had entered the lane, huge large millstones." Cromwell makes no mention of this incident in his dispatch of the 20th of August, but he describes the place as "a lane, very deep and ill, up to the enemy's army, and leading to the town." In this lane, and on either side, Cromwell was fighting for four hours, in what he calls "a hedge dispute," before he "charged the enemy in the town and cleared the streets."† Along this famous lane Wills advanced cautiously. He began to think that the rebels had quitted the town; but when he entered the street he found that barricades had been thrown up, which presented a formidable defence. Two of his dragoons having been shot, no summons to surrender was required; and an attack was immediately made on the barrier of the street near the church, which led to the Wigan road. Mac Intosh here commanded. A hundred and twenty of the king's troops fell in a few minutes from the deadly aim of the Highland marksmen. But other entrances to the town by by-lanes were soon occupied by the besiegers, and they possessed themselves of two houses which became strong positions. Three other barriers were the scenes of sharp conflicts. Houses set on fire burned on through the night, while the unceasing sound of musketry proclaimed how deadly was the struggle. The insurgents who had marched from Scotland held their ground bravely, but many of the new recruits took the opportunity of making their escape from such perilous strifes, over an unguarded ford of the Ribble.

The morning of Sunday, the 13th, brought to the rebel army the sad conviction that the game was nearly played out. General Carpenter had reached Preston with two thousand five hundred cavalry; and the town was effectually surrounded on every side. Carpenter, though of superior rank, did not supersede Wills in his command. The Highlanders wished to make a daring attempt to cut their way through the king's forces. Forster and the English made an effort to obtain favorable terms of surrender. In the subsequent trials of some of the unfortunate leaders of this insurrection, General Wills deposed, and his deposition was fully confirmed by other officers, that Colonel Oxburgh, an Irishman, having been deputed by Mr. Forster, offered that the besieged should lay down their arms, on condition of being received as prisoners of war, and recommended to the royal mercy. Wills replied that he would not treat with rebels. All that he would do for them was, that if they laid down their arms, and submitted prisoners at discretion, he would prevent the soldiers cutting them in pieces, till he had further orders. Other negotiators came to the general, and the surrender was finally postponed to the next morning. But no promise of applying for the royal mercy could be obtained from Wills. Oxburgh, who forfeited his own life, declared upon the scaffold that the general said, "You cannot better entitle yourselves to that clemency than by surrendering yourselves prisoners at discretion." There were, of course, two modes of interpreting such a loose declaration. About fifteen hundred of the rebels surrendered, two thirds of whom were Scotch. Among the prisoners were eight noblemen. The number of the insurgent forces who escaped from Preston must have been considerable. The English troops marched into the town. The Highlanders were drawn up in the market-place, and were finally put into the church, "where," says Patten, "they continued about a month, the townspeople being obliged to find them water and bread, while they took what care of themselves they could, unripping all the linings from the seats or pews, and making thereof breeches and hose to defend themselves from the extremity of the weather." Some of the common men were subsequently tried, and, being found guilty, were executed or transported. Officers who had held commissions in the royal forces were summarily convicted by courts-martial, and were shot. The noblemen and other leaders were marched under strong guard to London. Patten relates that, "setting forward from Highgate, we were met by such numbers of people that it is scarce conceivable to express, who with 'Long live King George,' and 'Down with the Pretender,' ushered us throughout to our several apartments."

While the English insurrection thus came to an end at Preston, important events were taking place in Scotland. The government, partly through the politic adhesion of Simon Fraser, who claimed to be Lord Lovat, obtained possession of Inverness. At the same time the Earl of Mar marched southward from his camp at Perth, and Argyle led his forces northward. The Master of Sinclair represents the movements of Mar as indecisive, and deficient in military organization—that he incumbered his army with cannon without having powder or ball; and being prevented by the presence of the enemy from passing the Forth at Stirling, was wholly ignorant where the river was fordable at this winter season. "I never heard," he says, "of any man in our army who knew anything of these fords except Rob Roy; who, they themselves said, they could not trust."* On the 12th of November the Master of Sinclair, with three squadrons of cavalry and the greater number of the Highland clans, were in advance of Mar, whose quarters were at Ardoch. They were marching upon Dunblane, when the wife of a Jacobite laird sent a lame boy as messenger to say that Argyle was already there. The van ceased their advance, the rear formed a junction with them, and the whole army passed the night in a very narrow hollow of the hill near the Sheriffmuir—so called as being the old place of meeting for the militia of the sheriffdom of Monteith. "All the night did our army lie in that small circumference; and I believe eight thousand men, for we were about that number, were never packed up so close together since the invention of gunpowder."† Early in the morning of the 13th the insurgents drew out of their confined quarters, and formed, in two lines, above the hollow where they had passed the night. From the elevated ground Mar saw some officers at a short distance examining his position. Argyle, who was now at the head of four thousand seasoned troops, was looking upon the irregular forces, twice in number, that he was preparing to encounter. He had prearranged that he would endeavor to bring the rebels to battle upon the Sheriffmuir. It was a very peculiar battle-ground—"a broad eminence, which is formed by a spur of the Ochils, but swells so gently that at a distance it seems an elevated plain. . . . It has the peculiarity of being a regular curve, presenting in all parts a segment of a sphere, or rather an oblate spheroid. There are no rapid declivities and no plains. Hence in every part of the hill there is a close sky-line, caused by the immediate curve; and where there is so much of the curve as will reach a perpendicular of some eight feet between two bodies of men, they cannot see each other." * When Argyle's army was known to be at hand there was little question how to act. When there was a doubt with some about venturing to attack, the Highland chiefs cried out "Fight! Fight." The clans shouted, tossing up their caps and bonnets. Mar headed the Highlanders who were to oppose the left wing of the king's troops. He was superior in numbers. The English, under General Witham, were terrified and scattered under the rush of the Highlanders, and in a few minutes were in full retreat toward Stirling. The attack of the insurgents on the right wing, commanded by Argyle, had a totally different result. The night of frost had made a morass hard enough to bear a charge of cavalry; and while a squadron passing over the icy ground took the enemy in flank, Argyle with his remaining horse attacked their front. The rout was here complete, though many times in a distance of three miles did the Highlanders attempt to rally. It was a doubtful battle. Argyle had broken the left wing of the rebels, and had driven them over the river Allan. Mar had scattered the left wing of the royal army, and had chased them to Corntoun, a village near Stirling. Mar had been the first to return to the battle-field. He saw Argyle toiling along the road at the foot of the hill with his exhausted forces. "If they had but thrown down stones," writes Sir Walter Scott, in a note to Sinclair's "Memoirs," "they might have disordered Argyle's troops." Mar determined to leave the battle-field to Argyle, and then, while the wail of the bagpipes was heard in the retreat, was uttered, by Gordon of Glenbucket, the well-known apostrophe, "Oh, for an hour of Dundee!" But the ineffectual battle had for Argyle all the advantages of a great victory. The insurgents returned to Perth in numbers greatly reduced by desertion. "We were not long in our old quarters," writes the Master of Sinclair, "when the bad news of our friends' misfortune at Preston was brought us." Mar felt that the time was come when he might, through a friend, ask if Argyle was empowered to grant terms. Argyle replied that he would apply for such powers. Mar in his Diary says that no answer was returned to Argyle's application to the government in London.

It might have been wise in the government of George I. to have made some demonstration of a conciliatory policy. But the fear of a successful insurrection in England was overpassed. The affair of Preston had destroyed all the hopes of the northern Jacobites. Six thousand Dutch troops had landed, and were on their march to Scotland. Other reinforcements for Argyle's army were constantly arriving at Stirling. In this condition of strength no overtures toward oblivion were likely to be favorably regarded. An event now occurred which, if it had been well timed, might have rendered the struggle between the house of Brunswick and the house of Stuart more equal. James Edward had sailed from Dunkirk in a small armed vessel and had landed at Peterhead. He had only six followers, and proceeding through Aberdeen he reached the camp at Perth on the 16th of January, 1716. The advent of the prince was not so propitious to his cause as his adherents might have expected. The Highlanders gazed on a man of somewhat feeble frame and of listless action. In an account of the "proceedings at Perth" it is said, "We saw nothing in him that looked like spirit. Our men began to despise him. Some asked if he could speak. His countenance looked extremely heavy. He cared not to come abroad among us soldiers, or to see us handle our arms or do our exercise." The prince whose appearance was thus so disappointing took up his residence at Scone, and surrounded himself with all the etiquette of royalty. He issued proclamations, one of which commanded all able-bodied male persons to repair to his standard; another fixed the day of his coronation for the 23d of January. Alarm seems to have been felt at the court in London. Lord Townshend, who may be considered prime minister, was apprehensive that the chevalier would receive assistance from France. On the 26th of January Townshend wrote thus to Horace Walpole, the English minister at the Hague: "The pretender is now at Perth, and to be crowned King of Scotland. This step his friends here would not have suffered him to take in the present situation of affairs, unless the regent [of France] had given strong assurances of assistance. They send over in single ships, arms and ammunition, and officers; and those who are in the secret of their affairs seem confident they shall be further and more openly assisted as soon as the season will permit. For my part I cannot think anything can divert the regent from taking vigorously part with the pretender, but a strict union among our old friends and allies, by which he will see that he cannot meddle with our affairs here without involving France in a new war with all Europe; and by the best intelligence we have, the passion of the French is so strong in favor of the pretender that nothing but the fear of a new and general war can prevent their assisting our rebels here." *

To have relied upon that union of strength with merciful conciliation which the ministers of George had in their own power, without regard to continental alliances, might have been the best course for defeating the hopes of the pretender. The regent of France was not disposed to give the aid to the pretender which Townshend dreaded. The open assistance did not arrive. Argyle, with his reinforced army, was moving northward. Between him and Perth were villages in which shelter and provision might be obtained; and a decree went forth from the royal palace of Scone, by which the military commanders of Mar's forces were ordered to burn and destroy each village—houses, cows, and forage. Six happy abodes of a peaceful population were thus devastated, and the inhabitants were turned out in the snow to perish. Mar in a private letter wrote, "We shall be forced to burn and destroy a good deal of the country to prevent the enemy marching, which goes very much against the king's mind, as it does mine and more of us; but there's an absolute necessity for it." The prince himself wrote to Argyle respecting this act, "It was indeed forced on me by the violence with which my rebellious subjects acted against me, and what they as the authors of it must be answerable for—not I." Mar's belief was that Argyle's troops could not march when there was no cover left; for "how they can endure the cold for one night in the fields I cannot conceive; and then the roads are so that but one can go abreast." But Argyle did march, although, it is alleged, with some reluctance. On the 21st of January a party of dragoons went forth to report how far it was practicable to advance through a country buried in snow. On the 29th the main body moved, the peasantry having been pressed to clear the roads. On the 30th Argyle was at Auchterarder, one of the desolated villages. Terror began now to prevail among the courtiers in Perth. James Edward attended a council of war, and manifested extreme reluctance to compromise his personal safety. The Highlanders desired to place the king in the midst of them, and fight to the death—a desire by no means agreeable to an unenterprising man who now saw before him little else than a prospect of more signal misfortune than had yet awaited him. On the 30th of January, a day of evil omen, the army was informed that it was determined to retreat from Perth. They crossed the Tay upon the ice, and passing through Dundee reached Montrose on the 4th of February. Many of the Highlanders had previously dispersed, and had sought the shelter of their valleys. In the offing were several French vessels. Murmurs went through the camp that they were about to be deserted by the prince who had come to lead them to victory. Appearances were kept up by a guard of honor patrolling round the royal quarters. But the plan of escape had been effectually arranged. James Edward and the Earl of Mar passed at night by a lane to the harbor, got into a boat which was in waiting, were soon on board a French ship, and were safely landed near Gravelines. General Gordon, who was left chief in command, went on to Aberdeen with an army reduced to a thousand men. When Argyle entered Aberdeen on the 8th of February the whole insurgent army had melted away. The unhappy prince, whose attempt to regain the throne of his ancestors had thus so signally failed, wished to do a slight act of justice to the poor people who had been ruined by what he deemed a military necessity among rebellious subjects. With the letter to Argyle which we have mentioned, he sent a sum of money, desiring it to be given as a relief to those whose homes he had commanded to be destroyed.

The parliament met on the 9th of January, 1716. The rebellion was necessarily the most prominent subject of the king's speech. The past successes were matter of congratulation; but the danger was not yet overpassed. "Our enemies," said the king, "animated by some secret hopes of assistance, are still endeavoring to support this desperate undertaking; and the pretender, as I have reason to believe, is landed in Scotland." Among the ill consequences of this rebellion was the extraordinary burden which it must create. "I take," added his majesty, "this first opportunity of declaring that I will freely give up all the estates that shall become forfeited to the crown by this rebellion, to be applied toward defraying the extraordinary expense incurred on this occasion." This incentive to a sweeping measure of attainder was scarcely wanted to stimulate the zeal of the majority in the Commons. Not an hour was lost in the proceedings which were expected to consign many victims to the executioner. Before the house adjourned, Mr. Lechmere, in a speech which is reported at length, impeached James Earl of Derwentwater of high treason. This speech of the Whig member is remarkable for its emphatic assertion that the punishment of the leaders of the rebellion was a national question, involving the great principle of the Act of Settlement as opposed to the bare claim of hereditary right. In justice to the king, as well as the people, they ought to take this prosecution into their own hands. The power of impeachment, Mr. Lechmere said, was the most valuable and useful privilege that belonged to the body of the Commons, and he maintained that no pardon under the great seal could discharge a judgment obtained under such an impeachment. Six other members severally impeached William Lord Widdrington, William Earl of Nithisdale, George Earl of Winton, Robert Earl of Carnwath, William Viscount Kenmure, and William Lord Nairn. The Commons agreed to the impeachments without any opposition; and on the same day the seven members carried their impeachments to the bar of the House of Lords. In a few days the articles against the seven noblemen were presented to the Peers; and on the 19th of January they knelt at the bar, and each delivered his answer to the charges. The answers of all, with the exception of that of Lord Winton, amounted to a plea of guilty. When Lord Derwentwater was asked by the chancellor if he meant by his answer to plead guilty, the reply was, "He does; and submits to the king's mercy, and humbly desires their lordships' intercession to his majesty." The same supplication for mercy, founded upon extenuating circumstances set forth in their answers, was urged by the five Scottish noblemen whose pleas of guilty were recorded. On the 9th of February Lord Derwentwater and his companions in misfortune were again brought to the bar of the House of Lords, and the ancient sentence in cases of high treason was pronounced by Lord Chancellor Cowper, who had been appointed by the king to act as lord high steward.

That unavoidable struggle between the advocates of an exemplary punishment for the highest legal offence, and the advocates for mercy toward mistaken but conscientious political offenders, now went on under circumstances of intense interest. The ordinary feelings of compassion and the national dislike of blood-shedding were more than commonly excited when it was known that the young Countess of Derwentwater, surrounded by the highest ladies of the court, had obtained an audience of the king, and implored pardon for her lord. It was known too that the wives of the Lords Nithisdale and Nairn had suddenly appeared in an antechamber through which King George passed, and throwing themselves at his feet had disturbed the phlegmatic monarch by attempts to present their petitions. Lady Nithisdale has described this scene: "I caught hold of the skirt of his coat, that he might stop and hear me. He endeavored to escape out of my hands, but I kept such strong hold that he dragged me upon my knees from the middle of the room to the very door of the drawing-room. At last one of the blue ribbons who attended his majesty took me round the waist, while another wrested the coat out of my hands. The petition, which I had endeavored to thrust into his pocket, fell down in the scuffle, and I almost fainted away through grief and disappointment." Walpole, whose nature was wholly opposed to severity, took the statesman's view that condign punishment in the cases of these lords was essential to the public security. The lobbies of parliament on the 21st of February were filled with high-born ladies who came in a body to petition the Lords and Commons. Many even of the Whig members of the lower house, among whom was the kind-hearted Richard Steele, were advocates for mercy. Walpole, to prevent these appeals, moved the adjournment of the house to the 1st of March, during which interval the executions were to take place. Walpole only carried his motion by a majority of seven. In the House of Peers, upon a debate whether the king could pardon those condemned under impeachment, Nottingham, a member of the cabinet, opposed the opinion of his colleagues. The power of the king to pardon was affirmed; and an address to his majesty, to reprieve such of the condemned lords as should deserve his mercy, was voted by a small majority. The ministers could not wholly resist such manifestations. They met in council; resolved to reprieve the Lords Nairn, Carnwath, and Widdrington; but issued an order for the execution of the Lords Derwentwater, Kenmure, and Nithisdale on the following morning. On the 24th of February Derwentwater and Kenmure suffered death on a scaffold erected on Tower Hill. They each professed their remorse for having pleaded guilty, and avowed their conviction that James III. was their rightful sovereign. The chamber in the Tower in which Lord Nithisdale was confined was found vacant. His escape had been effected by the courageous agency of his devoted wife. The relation of this heroic adventure is contained in a letter from Lady Nithisdale to her sister, after she had resided many years happily with her husband in France.* Having vainly striven to move the king to receive her petition, she formed the resolution to attempt her lord's escape. Seeing no prospect of his pardon, on the night before the morning appointed for his execution she went in a coach to the Tower, accompanied by a tall and slender lady of the name of Morgan, who, in addition to her own clothes, carried under her riding-hood a complete dress, fitted for a tall and stout lady named Mills, about the same size as the noble prisoner. Lady Nithisdale took in the slight Mrs. Morgan to her husband, and disrobed her of the clothes intended for the portly Mrs. Mills. Mrs. Morgan was then dismissed, and sliding out unnoticed, sent up stairs the other lady, who was weeping, and covering her face with her handkerchief. The exchange of dress was soon effected by Mrs. Mills, who left her own clothes for the prisoner; and she took her departure with loud injunctions from Lady Nithisdale to "dear Mrs. Catherine," who was no longer weeping, to send her ladyship's maid with a dress fitted for her to present a petition that night. The excellent manager then returned to her lord, whitened and rouged his face, concealed his beard, put on an artificial head-dress, and led him out with his handkerchief to his eyes, the very Mrs. Mills who had come in weeping and covering her face. At the outer door was the tardy maid, who in reality was an affectionate friend of Lady Nithisdale, and by her care was the fortunate prisoner conducted to a place of security. The anxious wife now returned to her husband's chamber, talked, as to her lord, somewhat loudly, imitated his voice, finally bade him good-night, so that all might hear, and then went quietly away. It is difficult to understand this without being apprised that Lady Nithisdale had previously moved the compassion of the guards, had given them little presents, and was accustomed to pass to her husband without much notice. Having shared her husband's place of concealment in an obscure lodging for a day or two, the brave wife had the satisfaction of knowing that he got to Dover in the disguise of a footman to the Venetian ambassador, whose coach and six was going to meet his brother. Such details as these of the ingenuity which love may prompt in the hour of distress are a welcome relief to the consideration of the severe course of penal infliction which we should be scarcely justified in describing as political vengeance. The escapes of many of the prisoners—among whom was Lord Winton immediately after his trial, Mr. Forster, and the old brigadier Mac Intosh—would lead to the belief that the government was not sorry that the stern necessity for the punishment of rebels taken in arms should be avoided by less direct modes than that of the royal clemency. In this case, as in many others, a government has much to contend with in the passions and prejudices of individuals. It might have been thought that after the lapse of ten years the hatreds of clanship and the thirst for the fall of political enemies might have been laid aside. The following record is not creditable to the character of the Duke of Argyle. In the Diary of Lord King, who was lord chancellor in 1725, is the following entry: "June 15th, 1725. A regency, where, among other things, was read a petition of George Lord Murray, setting forth that he was but eighteen years old when he went into the rebellion; that he stands indicted, but was never convicted nor attainted; praying the king's mercy: which being referred by the king to the regency for their opinions, we were all of opinion that there was nothing in law to stand in the way of the king's pardon, and that if he pleased he might do it. But it was desired that there might be a more explicit opinion, and what we should advise the king to do. I said I wished him pardoned, but I was unacquainted with the facts, and therefore could only say that if the king thought fit to pardon him, there was nothing in law to obstruct it; but to advise either one way or other I could not, because I was not sufficiently master of the facts. The archbishop would not advise anything in the case of blood. The Duke of Argyle strongly against it, because this man's treason was attended with perfidy, in deserting the king's troops and running away to the rebels; and if this man were pardoned, others would immediately make the same application. Roxburgh, Walpole, a majority were for it; so a letter ordered to advise the king to pardon him." *

The escapes, to which we have alluded, of some of the leaders in this rebellion, were very remarkable instances of boldness and perseverance. Mac Intosh, though advanced in years, on the day before his trial was to take place knocked down the keeper and turnkey of Newgate, fled into the London crowds, and reached a place of safety abroad. Forster, by the agency of his servant, got out of Newgate with the aid of a false key, and the master and the man had time to get off, having locked up the keeper in his own prison. Winton, whose adventurous life had given him some profitable experiences, having lived with a blacksmith in France, "was very curious," says Patten, "in working in several handicraft matters." He cut one of the iron bars of his window in the Tower with some small tool which he had concealed from his keepers. Some humbler instruments of the insurrection were less fortunate. Many were tried at Liverpool who had been taken at Preston. Some were executed, and more banished to the plantations. A large number of Scotch prisoners had been sent for trial to Carlisle, but Scots of all parties contended that this proceeding was a breach of the judicial independence of Scotland. An act had been passed by which the rebels might be tried in other English counties than those in which they were apprehended. The Scottish lawyers maintained that this act did not apply to prisoners taken in Scotland. The trials at Carlisle went on. Some were condemned, others were released, but no capital punishment was inflicted. The English judges did not choose to incur the responsibility of the possible misconstruction of a statute.

Within a fortnight after the fugitive prince, who had slunk away at night from the brave mountaineers who would have fought for him to the last, had landed on the continent, King George announced the fact to parliament. Both houses addressed the king, desiring that the most effectual means should be taken "toward preventing the pretender from finding refuge or protection in any country in amity with your majesty." The pretender himself took the most effectual means to quiet the alarm of the Whig politicians. On his arrival at St. Germains, incognito, he was met by Bolingbroke; received from his secretary the sound advice to hasten to his old residence at Bar-le-duc; promised Bolingbroke that he would immediately set out, embracing him at their parting; and, instead of taking a journey to find a safe asylum, before it was too late, lingered in Paris, and sent to Bolingbroke, by the hands of the Duke of Ormond, a dismissal from his service. James at once fell into the hands of weak politicians and intriguing priests. He was politely refused admission to the territory of Lorraine, and he finally settled in the papal states—a locality precisely calculated to render the Protestant feeling of Great Britain more acute. Bolingbroke never forgot the indignity he had received. He vowed that never more should his sword or his pen be employed for a Stuart, and he kept his word. The character which he drew of James is marked by the intensity of his dislike: "He is naturally inclined to believe the worst, which I take to be a certain mark of a mean spirit and a wicked soul. . . . Prone to judge ill of all mankind, he will rarely be seduced by his credulity; but I never knew a man so capable of being the bubble of his distrust and jealousy." *

The vindictive and intolerant spirit of the English legislature against Roman Catholics was again called into action by the rebellion of 1715. A few days after the execution of Lord Derwentwater, whose adherence to the old religion and the old dynasty cost him his life, and bereft his family of their fair possessions, a bill was brought in by Mr. Lechmere, "to strengthen the Protestant interest in Great Britain by enforcing the laws now in being against papists." One of its provisions was to punish papists for enlisting in the king's service. All such securities for the Protestant interest have happily yielded to the influence of time. One important act of parliament, which was mainly intended to avert the dangers which threatened the peaceful continuance of the Hanoverian succession, remains in force, after nearly a century and a half, when all such apprehensions have long since passed away. Amid the vital changes in parliamentary representation which we have seen in our time, the Septennial Act of George I. has endured, and will probably continue to endure, without reference to the temporary objects of its original enactment. The bill which provided that no parliament should in future sit more than three years, upon which William III. exercised his veto in 1693, was passed in the year following. Before the passing of this triennial act of the 6th of William and Mary, the duration of parliament was only limited at the will of the reigning sovereign, or was determined by his death. The second parliament of Charles II. sat for seventeen years. The preamble to the Septennial Act, after reciting the portion of the statute of William and Mary regarding the duration of parliament, says, "Whereas, it hath been found by experience, that the said clause hath proved very grievous and burdensome, by occasioning much greater and more continued expenses, in order to elections of members to serve in parliament, and more violent and lasting heats and animosities among the subjects of this realm, than were ever known before the said clause was enacted, and the said provision, if it should continue, may probably, at this juncture, when a restless and popish faction are designing and endeavoring to renew the rebellion within this kingdom, and an invasion from abroad, be destructive to the peace and security of the government." The Septennial Act was called by Dr. Priestley, "a direct usurpation of the rights of the people; for by the same authority that one parliament prolonged their own power to seven years they might have continued it to twice seven." Had the parliament of George I. simply repealed the Triennial Act, they might have sat to the end of his reign without interruption except from the pleasure of the crown. The preamble to the Septennial Act looks to its temporary expediency; to the evils that might have been produced in the agitated state of parties (when the greater number of Tories had become Jacobites, as Bolingbroke asserts), if a general election were to take place in 1717. The debates on this question had principally relation to the Septennial Bill as a permanent measure. It was introduced in the House of Lords, where it passed by no very preponderating majority. In the Commons the proportionate majority was much greater. Among the people generally the measure appears to have excited very little interest, and scarcely any opposition; there being only petitions against it from ten boroughs, half of these being places of small population,* and open to that corruption which made frequent elections occasions for dishonest traffic. During the passing of the bill Lord Somers was in his last fatal illness. His intellect was sufficiently clear for a short time to give an opinion upon the measure to Lord Townshend: "I think," he said, "it will be the greatest support possible to the liberty of the country." The great constitutional lawyer died on the day the bill was read a third time in the House of Commons. Speaker Onslow often declared that the passing of the Septennial Bill formed the era of the emancipation of the British House of Commons from its former dependence on the crown and the House of Lords.† The period would arrive when this greater power of the House of Commons produced by the Septennial Act would be looked upon with jealousy by large portions of the middle classes, and of those beneath them in station; and when a principle even more democratic than that of triennial elections should be ardently desired, as one of the modes of converting the member of parliament into a delegate instead of a representative. Practically, very few parliaments of recent times have had a septennial existence; and many thinking persons have been disposed to agree with Mr. Hallam, that under the existing custom of considering six years as the natural life of a House of Commons, "the usual term of duration should be permitted to take its course, except in cases where some great change of national policy may perhaps justify its abridgment." Our constitutional historian holds that "the crown would often obtain a very serious advantage over the House of Commons, if it should become an ordinary thing to dissolve parliament for some petty ministerial interest, or to divert some unpatible resolution."‡ While the Septennial Bill was passing through committee in the Commons, Mr. Lechmere desired to introduce a clause to disable the holders of pensions during pleasure from becoming members of either house of parliament. This was opposed as interfering with the privileges of the Peers. But Stanhope, one of the secretaries of state, brought in a bill which provided that no person having a pension from the crown during pleasure, or for a term of years, either in his own name or in the name of any person for his benefit, should sit or vote in the House of Commons, under a penalty of twenty pounds for every day in which he should so sit or vote.§

By the Act of Settlement the descendant of the Princess Sophia of Hanover who should be called to the throne of Great Britain was restricted from going out of the kingdom without the consent of parliament. A bill was brought in to repeal that clause of the act; and becoming law without opposition, the king prepared to set forth to his German dominions. Previous to his majesty's departure there was a creation of eight peers. The king's anxiety to visit Hanover at this juncture was extremely objectionable to his responsible advisers. But their remonstrances were useless. When Addison eulogized what he described as the "uniformity and firmness of mind" of George I.,‖ he, of course, did not recognize that family characteristic which carried firmness, too often, into obstinacy. "His majesty was bred up from his infancy with a love to this our nation," continues Addison. He did not speak of the greater love which the king, not unnaturally, bore to his own hereditary dominions. "By his succeeding to the dukedom of Zell," writes the political essayist, "he became one of the greatest princes of Germany, and one of the most powerful persons that ever stood next heir to the throne of Great Britain. The duchy of Bremen and the bishopric of Osnaburg have considerably strengthened his interests in the empire, and given a great additional weight to the Protestant cause." Happier might it have been if this great prince of Germany, and his successor, could have mitigated their excessive "predilection for their native country, which alone could endanger their English throne."¶ There was a constant suspicion, during their reigns, that continental alliances and wars were in the interest of Hanover rather than in that of Great Britain; and although this belief was in some instances unjust, every minister had to contend against the unpopularity which it threw upon the government. Every minister, from Walpole to Chatham, was, in his turn, obliged to yield, however unwillingly, to the "uniformity and firmness of mind" which governed the continental policy of these princes. Their repeated absences from England were no light interruption to the tranquil progress of English affairs. These absences became a positive danger when each of these kings was known to stand upon the worst terms with his eldest son. Speaking a foreign language, surrounded by foreign mistresses and favorites, and constantly called away to his foreign states, George I. never ceased to be regarded by the English people as a foreigner. He was imperfectly acquainted with the character of the people he had been called upon to govern; and he took no pains to understand their reasonable wishes, or to conciliate their unreasonable prejudices. The government of the kingdom naturally fell into the hands of the ministers who represented the stronger party. It was fortunate that eventually a minister obtained almost exclusive power, who for many years kept the nation quiet, and allowed its growing industry to become the source of great material prosperity. The system of Sir Robert Walpole was little fitted to call forth any high political aspirations, to originate any great reforms, to widen and deepen the foundations of freedom and toleration. But it preserved the country from convulsions, if it failed to destroy the bitterness of parties. Walpole was neither tyrannous nor unjust. He governed by corruption, in our present improved view of what is corruption, when a bribe is no longer termed "a consideration;" but having obtained his parliamentary supremacy by unworthy methods, he did not employ his venal instruments to trample upon the liberties of his country. He laughed at the noisy patriots whom he did not care to buy, or was unable to buy; but during the twenty years of his unassailable possession of power, amid the constant sense of danger from the tendency of Toryism to identify itself with Jacobitism, he proscribed no political enemy. It has been truly said, "Sir Robert Walpole was the minister who gave to our government that character of lenity which it has since generally preserved."* Before Walpole became the supreme director of affairs, there was much complication of foreign policy, which we will endeavor to relate as succinctly as the necessary details will permit.

In the spring of 1716 defensive alliances had been concluded by the British government with the States-General and with the emperor, to operate in case of aggression on either by France or other powers. The issue, however, of the rebellion of 1715 had entirely indisposed the government of the Regent of France to any rupture with England. The Duke of Orleans was moreover anxious to procure the support of England to his succession to the crown of France, in the event of the death of Louis XV., a sickly boy. The claim to that crown had been renounced by the Bourbon King of Spain; but Philip V. might interpret that renunciation according to the power which he might possess of setting his agreement at nought. While George I. was at Hanover this summer, negotiations were going forward between Stanhope, his secretary of state, and the Abbé Dubois, the profligate but most able servant of the regent. The English government desired the expulsion of the pretender from France and its dependencies, and was anxious to stipulate that a new harbor should be abandoned which Louis XIV. had begun to construct at Mardyke, to serve the same warlike purposes as Dunkirk, which had been demolished according to the terms of the Treaty of Utrecht. The agent of the regent was ready to yield these points, to secure the friendship of the government of King George. Thus the policy of England and France tended toward peace and a more intimate alliance. On the other hand, the continental objects of George I. threatened to involve his island subjects in a war, in which they would certainly not have engaged had their king not also been Elector of Hanover. When Charles XII. of Sweden, in 1714, after those five years of seclusion at Bender which followed the disastrous day of Pultowa, burst upon Europe again, he found a large part of his territories divided among many rapacious neighbors, with whom he would have to fight if Sweden were to regain any semblance of her old power. Frederick IV. of Denmark, in 1712, had conquered Schleswig and Holstein, Bremen and Verden. To strengthen himself against Charles, "the Swedish-iron hero," as Mr. Carlyle calls him, Frederick bartered away Bremen and Verden to the Elector of Hanover, in 1715, for a hundred and fifty thousand pounds, on condition that George should join a coalition against Sweden. George's son-in-law, Frederick William of Prussia, had gone to war that same year, with his giant grenadiers, to compel Charles to resign his pretensions to Stettin, which Prussia had obtained in pawn for a payment of sixty thousand pounds. The northern war blazed furiously. The Elector of Hanover sent a British fleet into the Baltic to coerce Sweden, and with six thousand Hanoverians joined the Prussians, Danes, and Russians, against "the Lion-king." At Stralsund Charles made his last effort. He was overpowered, and getting away to Sweden, meditated schemes of vast import, but thoroughly impracticable. Charles endeavored to gratify his revenge against England in stirring up another Jacobite insurrection. Northern Europe was now still more agitated; for the Czar Peter had marched with his Muscovites into Mecklenburg, and was threatening Denmark. George was for violent measures against Russia, which his minister Stanhope very wisely discountenanced. This smoke did not burst into flame. In the conduct of the negotiation with France there was a difference of opinion between Stanhope at Hanover and Townshend at home; and this, with other less dignified causes, produced a partial breaking-up of King George's first Whig ministry.

The history of the schism which drove Townshend from the helm is given with great minuteness by the excellent descendant of Stanhope; and with a laudable anxiety to acquit his ancestor of any paltry attempt to abuse the confidence of George I., to the prejudice of his honest and able minister at home.* It is scarcely necessary for us to enter generally upon these details. One point, however, connected with this ministerial change is of importance, as a characteristic of the domestic politics of the first, second and third princes of the house of Brunswick who were kings of England. From the second year of George I. may be dated the manifestation of that national calamity which our country had to endure during three successive reigns—the hateful exhibition of a party in opposition to the government of the actual sovereign gathering round the heir-apparent. When King George set out for Hanover in the summer of 1716, he was extremely jealous of intrusting, during his absence, any special power and authority to the Prince of Wales. The king wished to join others in commission with the prince. Townshend opposed this. The king so far yielded as to appoint his son guardian of the realm and lieutenant; but he withheld the title of regent from him, and imposed several restrictions upon his administrative power. The popularity which the prince acquired during the king's absence was looked upon with fear and suspicion at Hanover. He was affable, appeared fond of English customs, spoke our language tolerably well, and went among the people in a free and unreserved manner. Party-writers began to contrast the son with the father. The prince was not discreet in a position where discretion was so essential. He manifested an eagerness to open the parliament in person during the king's absence; while the king desired that the prorogation might be extended, to enable him to remain longer at Hanover. Townshend, in his communications with Stanhope, had pressed that the king should speedily decide as to his return, intimated the prince's wish to open parliament, and suggested that in certain emergencies a larger discretionary power should be given to the "Guardian of the Realm." The king was enraged, and avowed his determination to dismiss his chief minister from his office of secretary of state. To soften this dismissal Townshend was offered the office of lord lieutenant of Ireland. The secretary at first stoutly refused. His colleagues were indignant. Stanhope, from Hanover, tried to persuade them to acquiesce in the king's determination. The Whigs, he wrote to Mr. Methuen, one of the commissioners of the treasury, "may possibly unking their master, or (which I do before God think very possible) make him abdicate England; but they will certainly not force him to make my Lord Townshend secretary."† When Townshend was removed from the administration, the public indignation was loudly expressed. He was considered to be sacrificed to the cabal which looked upon Hanover as more important than England. He was known to be hated by the rapacious Mademoiselle de Schulenberg, the king's mistress, who was afterward created Duchess of Kendal. George hastened his return to England, and having probably been made aware of the danger he incurred in breaking with the most important members of the great Whig party, expressed his regret to Townshend for having acted with precipitation. The fallen minister was at last induced to accept the lord lieutenancy of Ireland, and Methuen was appointed secretary of state as the colleague of Stanhope. The apparent renewal of the friendly relations of the sovereign and his ministers was not of long duration.

The king opened the session of parliament on the 20th of February, 1717. He announced that a treaty of alliance had been concluded between Great Britain, France, and the States-General. There were to be no longer apprehensions about Dunkirk and Mardyke; the pretender was to be removed beyond the Alps. This treaty, concluded on the 4th of January, 1717, is known as the "Triple Alliance." The king further notified that he had directed papers to be laid before parliament, "which contain a certain account of a projected invasion." These papers were "Copies of letters which passed between Count Gyllenburg, the Baron Gortz, Spaar, and others, relating to the design of raising a rebellion in his majesty's dominions, to be supported by a force from Sweden." The discovery of this scheme had delayed the opening of the session. In October some letters between Baron Gortz, the bold and intriguing minister of Charles XII., and Count Gyllenburg, the Swedish envoy in London, had been intercepted and deciphered by the English government. On the 29th of January Stanhope, as secretary of state, laid the information thus obtained before the council; and it was determined to resort to the extraordinary measure of arresting the Swedish envoy, and of seizing his papers. Gyllenburg, of course, stoutly resisted, and pleaded the protection to which the representatives of foreign governments are entitled by the law of nations. That law, however, does not sanction an ambassador in being the active instrument of plots against the government to which he is accredited. General Wade carried off the contents of the Swede's escritoire, and put a guard over his prisoner. The contents of the papers fully justified the act of the government. Gortz had organized a scheme for an insurrection in England, and a simultaneous invasion of Scotland by the King of Sweden. Spain had entered into the confederacy. Its prime minister, Alberoni, had remitted a million of French livres to Spaar, the Swedish envoy in Paris, to set the forces of Charles XII. in motion. The pretender had offered sixty thousand pounds for the same object. The whole affair exploded upon the arrest of Gyllenburg. The King of Sweden did not disown the acts of his ministers, neither did he own them; but he ordered the British resident at his court to be put under arrest. Apprehensions of danger from Sweden were still professed by the English ministry, and on the 3d of April Stanhope delivered to the Commons a royal message, asking for an additional supply, "not only to secure his majesty's kingdoms against the present dangers with which they are threatened from Sweden, but likewise to prevent as far as possible the like apprehensions for the future." In the debate which ensued strong objections were made to the proposition. "It must needs be very surprising to the whole world," said one member, "that a nation, not long ago the terror of France and Spain, should now seem to fear so inconsiderable an enemy as Sweden." The motion for a supply was only carried by a majority of four votes. It was opposed by many of the Whigs, and coldly supported by others. Walpole, to whom the house looked up on all financial questions, spoke indeed in favor of the motion, but with a reserve that was more significant than censure. It was clear that the most important of the Whig leaders were jealous of the influence of Sunderland, who was now held to be the king's chief adviser. The result of this debate was that the same evening Townshend was dismissed from his office of lord lieutenant of Ireland, and that the next morning Robert Walpole resigned—firm in his resistance to the entreaties of the king to keep the seals of chancellor of the exchequer. Other resignations followed, including that of Methuen. Stanhope now became the head of the government, Sunderland and Addison were appointed secretaries of state, and James Craggs secretary at war.

Robert Harley, Earl of Oxford, having been two years a prisoner in the Tower, presented a petition to the House of Lords praying that his confinement might not be prolonged. The day of his trial was therefore fixed for the 24th of June. The Peers were assembled in Westminster Hall; the Commons were in attendance as prosecutors; the prisoner stood at the bar with the axe by his side; one of the managers opened the first article of impeachment regarding the Treaty of Utrecht. Lord Harcourt, the ex-chancellor, then moved that the Peers should retire to their own house, and he there proposed a resolution, which was carried by a majority of thirty-two, "that no evidence should be received on the charges for misdemeanor till the charges for high treason were disposed of." It was known that the evidence was insufficient to convict Oxford of the crime that would have affected his life and estate. The Commons were indignant at this proceeding of the Peers, which it is affirmed was suggested by Walpole; and they refused to comply with it, regarding it as an infringement of their privileges. The Lords persevered, and named the 1st of July as the day when the trial should proceed according to the principle they had laid down. The Commons resolved that, justice being denied to the nation, they would abandon the prosecution. The defeat of the government was no doubt fortunate. Oxford was acquitted, as no prosecutor had appeared. The multitude cheered, and the nation generally, as well as the Tories, was not displeased that there should be some oblivion of political offences. The session of parliament was concluded by an Act of Grace, from which Oxford and Prior were excluded, but which released from prison the Lords Carnwath, Widdrington, and Nairn, and others who were under sentence of death or in confinement for their participation in the rebellion of 1715.

The period during which Stanhope had the chief administration of affairs, from 1717 to his death in 1721, was a period of extraordinary excitement in the complicated policy of various European states, and of momentous embarrassment in the financial operations of the English people and the English government. It is difficult to describe our foreign relations in a brief narrative, and it would not be very interesting to relate the events connected with them in any lengthened detail. The whole course of these events is calculated to show how, in many cases, those territorial arrangements which appear to have been finally settled by treaties are suddenly broken up by unforeseen combinations; how the restless ambition of princes and ministers, the pretensions of rival dynasties, the dissatisfaction of peoples shifted from master to master, render what is called the balance of power a condition of things in which those who fancy they may preserve an equilibrium, fall under the necessity of perpetually throwing a weight into one scale, or taking a weight out of another. Such attempts being generally failures, the blindfolded phantom of justice terminates the abortive labor by throwing away the scales and drawing the sword.

The chief instigator of the disputes which in 1717 threatened to involve Europe again in a general war was Cardinal Alberoni, the prime minister of Spain. Philip V. had never displayed any vigor of mind, and he was now governed by his queen, over whom Alberoni had an absolute control. This remarkable Italian, the son of a laborer, had been in Spain with the Duke de Vendôme during the War of the Succession. His agreeable qualities had gained him the favor of Vendôme, and he had gradually worked his way to the highest trust and dignity. When General Stanhope was a prisoner in Saragossa he became acquainted with Alberoni, and when the same general became King George's secretary of state, their correspondence on the subject of a commercial treaty was marked by a more than usual manifestation of a desire on the part of the Spanish minister to be on good terms with the British government. But the emperor had never recognized Philip as king of Spain. Under the peace of Utrecht he held the dominions in Italy which had formerly belonged to Spain. In the defensive treaty between Great Britain and the emperor the territorial guarantee was thus offensive to the court of Philip V. The alliance with France was still more offensive. The tone of Alberoni toward the British government became wholly changed. He had great projects in view, which he thought would raise Spain in the scale of nations. He prepared an armament at Barcelona, whose destination was wholly unknown. In August, 1717, a Spanish fleet anchored in the bay of Cagliari, and eight or nine thousand troops made a descent on the island of Sardinia, of which they took possession after a stout resistance from Spaniards of the Austrian party. The expedition was not merely intended to seize this barren territory. Spain had an eye to Sicily, which had been ceded at the peace to Victor Amadeus. England interposed, in the endeavor to preserve the peace of Europe. Negotiations went forward, without much effect; Stanhope having sent his cousin, afterward Earl of Harrington, as ambassador to Spain. The Regent of France also sent his ambassador. But the bold and crafty Alberoni wanted only to gain time, and he made the most extensive preparations for war upon a great scale. Spain, directed by the energy of this adventurer, threw off her accustomed lethargy. In a year or two he had set in motion every instrument of intrigue against France and England. The Turks had been totally defeated by Prince Eugene at the great battle of Peterwaradin. Alberoni urged the Sultan to persevere in the war with the emperor. He had encouraged Baron Gortz in his schemes for the invasion of England by Sweden. He entered into correspondence with the pretender, and proposed a Spanish expedition to land in Britain, to be commanded by James, or by the Duke of Ormond. He fomented insurrections and conspiracies in France. In 1718 it became evident that the British government must prepare for warlike operations, and give up its attempts at mediation. Alberoni, whose vanity made him presumptuous, but whose acuteness gave him signal advantages over ordinary politicians, must have offered many a rude shock to the complacency of diplomatic routine. The English negotiators had to attempt the difficult task of reconciling the conflicting interests of the emperor and the Bourbon King of Spain. The Treaty of Utrecht had failed in placing the peace of Europe on a durable foundation. There must be other territorial arrangements, which it was the object of the Quadruple Alliance of England, Holland, France, and the emperor to effect. Exchanges of dominion were to be made between the rivals; something gained and something yielded on either side; doubtful successions guaranteed; compensations; all interests consulted but that trifling one, the welfare of those handed about from potentate to potentate. It is impossible not to feel a sort of respect for the vain and insolent Alberoni, when he encountered with words such as these the solemn bargain-makers whom the English cabinet employed to arrange articles of accommodation between the Austrian and Bourbon rivals: "You made war to establish the balance of power, and you concluded a peace without any balance whatever. . . . There are certain men who would cut and pare states and kingdoms as though they were so many Dutch cheeses." Thus treating their projects of pacification with contempt, he went his own way to redress the wrongs of which he complained, describing the peace of Utrecht as "a treaty made by the devil," and the scheme of another balance as a monster which he termed "a goat-stag." He resolved for war, exclaiming, "The Lord's hand is not shortened."

With this threatened interruption to the peace of Europe, the administration of Stanhope, who was now raised to the peerage, had to meet the parliament which was summoned for the 21st of November. Just at this time a scene took place within the walls of St. James's Palace which threatened as much embarrassment to the tranquil progress of government as any complication of foreign affairs. The king and the Prince of Wales openly quarrelled. The rupture was deemed of sufficient importance to warrant the secretary of state in writing an explanation of the circumstances to the foreign ministers. This official account does not differ in any material point from the more lively narrative of Horace Walpole: "The Princess of Wales had been delivered of a second son. The prince had intended his uncle, the Duke of York, Bishop of Osnaburg, should with his majesty be godfather. Nothing could equal the indignation of his royal highness when the king named the Duke of Newcastle for second sponsor, and would hear of no other. The christening took place as usual in the princess's bedchamber. Lady Suffolk, then in waiting as lady of the bedchamber, and of most accurate memory, painted the scene to me exactly. On one side of the bed stood the godfathers and godmothers; on the other the prince and the princess's ladies. No sooner had the bishop closed the ceremony than the prince, crossing the feet of the bed in a rage, stepped up to the Duke of Newcastle, and, holding up his hand and forefinger in a menacing attitude, said, 'You are a rascal, but I shall find you;' meaning, in broken English, 'I shall find a time to be revenged.' 'What was my astonishment,' continued Lady Suffolk,

'when going to the princess's apartment next morning, the yeomen in the guard-chamber pointed their halberds at my breast, and told me I must not pass! I urged that it was my duty to attend the princess. They said, 'No matter; I must not pass that way.'" * The Prince of Wales had been put under arrest in his own apartment, into which Lady Suffolk was forbidden to pass, and was finally commanded to leave the palace, which he did with the Princess Caroline of Anspach, his sensible wife. Then was exhibited the unbecoming spectacle of the heir-apparent in opposition to the government of his father; of the court of Leicester House in rivalry to the court of St. James. The discarded members of the Whig cabinet could at Leicester House lament, in common with Tories and Jacobites, over their exclusion from power. Walpole and Shippen could make common cause as assailants of the existing government, however irreconcilable themselves upon the principles upon which the government should be conducted. The king, on the other hand, was surrounded by some indiscreet and unscrupulous adherents. After his majesty's death, Queen Caroline found among his private papers a proposal from the Earl of Berkeley, first lord of the admiralty in 1718—which proposal was in the handwriting of Charles Stanhope—to seize the Prince of Wales and carry him off to America. George I. had too much sense to adopt the kidnapping project; but he formed a crude plan to obtain an act of parliament that the prince should be compelled to relinquish his German possessions upon coming to the throne of Great Britain. The friends of a constitutional monarchy were alarmed at these proceedings, and it was fortunate that the power which the great abilities of Walpole eventually secured under George I., enabled him to use, for the purpose of outward reconciliation, the influence which he had obtained over the Prince of Wales during his term of opposition politics.

Into fightings arising out of the squabbles of the empire and of Spain—or rather, out of the squabbles of "Kaiser Karl VI. and Elizabeth Farnese, termagant queen of Spain" †—was England precipitated. When the number of troops to be maintained came to be discussed in parliament, "downright Shippen" said that some expressions of the king's speech "seem rather calculated for the meridian of Germany than of Great Britain." He added, "It is the only infelicity of his majesty's reign that he is unacquainted with our language and constitution, and it is therefore the more incumbent on his British ministers to inform him that our government does not stand on the same foundation with his German dominions, which, by reason of their situation and the nature of their constitution, are obliged to keep up armies in time of peace." ‡ For these expressions Mr. Shippen was sent to the Tower, and there remained till the prorogation of parliament in March. There were interesting debates in both houses on the evident tendency to engage in war indicated by the number of troops to be employed; but the parliament was prorogued with the royal expression of a hope that such treaties might be concluded, "as will settle peace and tranquillity among our neighbors." The hope was illusive; and indeed was contrary to a message from the crown, just at the close of the session, pointing out the necessity of an increase of the navy. No specific object was named; but Walpole observed that the message and the address which was voted had the air of a declaration of war against Spain. On the 4th of June Admiral Byng sailed for the Mediterranean, having twenty ships of the line under his command; for intelligence had been received that an armament of twenty-nine ships of war, with transports for thirty-five thousand soldiers, had sailed from Barcelona with sealed orders. The English prime minister, Lord Stanhope, in the desire to avert war, had proceeded to Madrid, and he was even prepared to give up Gibraltar, which it appears he thought "of no consequence." Alberoni, amid pacific professions, had manifested no disposition to abate his pretensions. While Stanhope was talking of peace, the Spanish fleet had sailed into the Bay of Solento, and having landed a large force upon Sicilian ground under the Marquis di Lede, the troops in a few days had become masters of Palermo. The chief military operation was the siege of Messina. On the 31st of July the citadel was invested. On the 1st of August Sir George Byng's fleet was anchored in the Bay of Naples, where he took on board two thousand German troops to reinforce the Piedmontese garrison of Messina. The Spanish fleet would have been in comparative safety if they had remained at anchor in the road of Messina, in line of battle, with the batteries behind them that Di Lede had constructed. The admirals chose to put to sea, and Byng hurried after the Spaniards, through the Straits of Faro. On the 11th of August the English squadron was carried by a breeze into the heart of the Spanish fleet, off Cape Passero. Six of their men-of-war had been separated from their main body, and a division, commanded by Captain Walton, was dispatched by the English admiral to intercept them. The battle, it is held, was commenced by the Spaniards. Byng was superior in force, and the Spanish admirals acted without a settled plan. But they fought bravely, till the main fleet was all taken or destroyed. The report of Captain Walton to his admiral is the very model of a business-like dispatch: "Sir, we have taken and destroyed all the Spanish ships which were upon the coast: the number as per margin." The Spanish fleet was thus swept away; but Byng, in a letter to Di Lede, affected to consider this catastrophe as not necessarily involving a war between the two nations. Messina fell before the Spanish troops, at the end of September, and Byng again anchored in the Bay of Naples. Alberoni did not quietly endure the pacific mode in which his fleet had been annihilated. He seized all British vessels and goods in Spanish ports.

The war smouldered on during two years, for an object which has been truly said, "could not be excelled in insignificance." * King George, in opening parliament on the 11th of November, announced that he had concluded terms and conditions of peace and alliance between the greatest princes of Europe, but that Spain "having rejected all our amicable proposals, it became necessary for our naval forces to check their progress." Walpole headed in the Commons the opposition to an address of thanks, contending that by their giving sanction to the late measures they "would screen ministers, who, having begun a war against Spain, would now make it the parliament's war." The motion for an address of thanks was carried by a majority of sixty-one.

A domestic measure of real interest to the nation, and honorable to the ministry to have proposed, was carried during this session, with some curtailments of its original design. It was a bill for the relief of Protestant dissenters, entitled "a bill for strengthening the Protestant interest in these kingdoms." Stanhope took a liberal view of the religious differences which had so long agitated the nation, and he desired to repeal, not only the Act against Occasional Conformity, the Schism Act, and the Test Act, but to mitigate the penal laws against Roman Catholics. It was contended, and perhaps prudently, by some of his colleagues, that by aiming at too much nothing would be accomplished. The debates were warm in both houses; and finally, by a majority of only forty-one, the measure was passed, without the repeal of the Test Act, and without any attempt to put the Roman Catholics upon a juster footing of equality, however limited, with their fellow-subjects.

The hostility of Alberoni toward the government which had proved the most formidable enemy to his designs for the extension of the power of the Spanish monarchy, now assumed the somewhat dangerous form of an alliance with the pretender, and a direct assistance to him in another attempt at the invasion of Great Britain. There was no longer to be hope for the house of Stuart in the rash designs of Charles of Sweden. He had fallen by a stray bullet—probably by the hand of an assassin—in the trenches of Frederickshall. He no more will terrify the world with his volcanic outbreaks. Alberoni was to accomplish, by weaving his web of intrigue around the persevering adherents of James, what his brother intriguer Gortz had failed to accomplish. Upon the sister of Charles XII. succeeding to the crown of Sweden; there had been a political revolution, and the restless minister of the late king had perished on a scaffold. Alberoni had failed in the issue of a conspiracy which he had stirred up against the regent Orleans. It was effectually crushed; and, whatever were the private views of the regent, his lenity in this affair was a proof that he possessed one of the best attributes of power, "the quality of mercy." The plot of the Duke and Duchess of Maine being clearly traced to the schemes of the Spanish minister, war was declared by France against Spain. There was one great card more to play. The pretender was invited to Madrid. He safely reached that capital from Italy, and was received with signal honors. The Duke of Ormond and the Earl Marischal and his brother had also passed from France into Spain. An expedition had been prepared by Alberoni, which it was originally intended that James should lead. But it was at length arranged that Ormond should land in England, that Lord Marischal should sail with some forces to Scotland, and that Keith, his brother, should go through France to gather together the Jacobites who had taken refuge there. The armament which sailed from Cadiz, consisting of five men-of-war, with twenty transports, carrying five thousand men, was scattered by a great storm in the Bay of Biscay. The crews threw overboard the stands of arms, the munitions of war, and the horses, to lighten their vessels, and the greater part of the armada returned to Spanish ports in a dismantled condition. The Earl Marischal, with two frigates, carrying about three hundred troops, proceeded to Scotland; and his brother, with Tullibardine, Seaforth, and a few other noble refugees, joined him in a small vessel. The whole proceeding was known to the British government through information furnished by the Regent of France. The adventurers, with the Spanish soldiers, landed on the banks of Loch Alsh, in the month of May, 1719. The vessels returned to Spain, and the Scottish leaders were left to face their desperate enterprise. They established themselves in an old castle in the inner reach of the loch; but their attempts to fortify it afforded them no safety. Three English vessels of war entered these solitary waters and battered the rude tower to the ground. Scattered parties of Highlanders joined the Spaniards, and the whole body, about fifteen hundred—some accounts say two thousand—encamped at Glenshiel. In this valley, surrounded by mountains whose pathways were known only to the natives, they remained inactive, expecting to be joined by large bodies of insurgents. No general rising took place in the Highlands. No great chiefs again ventured to appear in arms against a strong government. In June General Wightman, with sixteen hundred troops, marched from Inverness. He hesitated to attack desperate men in their formidable pass; but a sharp struggle took place with detached bodies on the mountain sides, which lasted three hours. The next day the Spaniards surrendered as prisoners of war, but the Highlanders had disappeared. Wightman had twenty-one men killed, and a hundred and twenty-one wounded. He brought into Edinburgh two hundred and seventy-four Spanish prisoners. The Scottish leaders took shelter in the Western Isles, and finally escaped to Spain.

Whatever opposition might be raised to the origin and objects of the war in which England was engaged against France, no one could complain that the naval power of the country was inefficiently employed. No British admiral could have manifested more energy and promptitude than Admiral Byng displayed, in exploits that required the utmost courage and decision of character. He rendered the most efficient aid to the forces of the emperor in the contest with the Spaniards for the possession of Sicily. By his sagacious counsels he gave a successful direction to the languid efforts of the imperial commanders, who were jealous of each other, and divided in their plans. Their troops were destitute of provisions, and he supplied them by sea with stores, to prevent them starving in the interior of the island. They were insufficiently supplied with ammunition, and he furnished them with the means of attack and defence. With such aid the Austrians, after a serious defeat at Franca Villa, in June, 1719, were enabled to besiege the Spaniards in Messina, of whose citadel they obtained possession in October. There were military operations of less importance before the Spaniards finally evacuated Sicily and Sardinia. Meanwhile the French had sent an army against Spain, under the command of the Duke of Berwick, the natural son of James II.—the general who had won the victory of Almanza for the Bourbon King of Spain. Berwick was now to lead an army against the same king; and he was to be assisted by English sailors belonging to the government of the sovereign who was regarded as an usurper by the head of his own family. The French made themselves masters of Fuenterabia and St. Sebastian; and Lord Cobham, with an English squadron, captured Vigo. These disasters might have convinced Alberoni that the conflict with these great powers, in which Spain had engaged, was an undertaking in which his own abilities could not supply the want of material resources. But he probably was not prepared to be deserted by the court which he had so ably served in the endeavor to increase its power and importance. Before the reverses in Sicily Alberoni had made overtures for peace. Stanhope proposed to Dubois to demand from King Philip the dismissal of his minister. His ambition, said Stanhope, had been the sole cause of the war; and "it is not to be imagined that he will ever lose sight of his vast designs, or lay aside the intention of again bringing them forward, whenever the recovery of his strength and the remissness of the allied powers may flatter him with the hopes of better success." King Philip submitted to this dictation. In December, 1719, Alberoni, by a royal decree, was dismissed from all his employments, and was commanded to leave the Spanish territory within twenty-one days. Incapable grandees rejoiced that the son of an Italian gardener no longer ruffled their solemn pride; some loftier spirits testified their respect to fallen greatness. The cardinal went back to Italy a poor man. After vain attempts to resist or evade the demands of the allies that Spain should accede to the Quadruple Alliance, that accession was proclaimed in January, 1720, Philip declaring that he gave peace to Europe at the sacrifice of his rights. He renewed his renunciation of the French crown. Europe was again at peace. Even the Czar of Muscovy had been warned by the presence of an English fleet in the Baltic that he would not be permitted utterly to destroy Sweden. By England's protection of the female successor of Charles XII. the Elector of Hanover secured Bremen and Verden. The policy of foreign affairs did not exclusively contemplate the safety of King George's island subjects, but there was no advocacy of merely German policy of which the nation had a right to complain. The reputation of Great Britain was not damaged by the mode in which the war had been carried on. Her naval strength had been successfully exerted. A peace of twelve years, with a very trivial interruption, was the result of the Quadruple Alliance.

The two parliamentary sessions of 1719 were remarkable for ministerial attempts to carry a measure which would have produced a vital change in the composition of the House of Lords. It was proposed to limit the royal power of creating peers; and the king was persuaded to send a message to the Lords that his majesty has so much at heart the settling the peerage of the whole kingdom upon such a foundation as may secure the freedom and constitution of parliament in all future ages, that he is willing his prerogative stand not in the way of so great and necessary a work. In February resolutions were proposed in the upper house that the English peers should not be increased beyond six of their present number, with the exception of princes of the blood, and that instead of there being sixteen elective peers for Scotland, the king should name twenty-five as hereditary peers. In the House of Lords the resolutions were carried by a large majority. The proposition produced an excessive ferment. The Whig members and the Whig writers took different sides. Addison supported the bill; Steele opposed it. The measure was abandoned on account of the strong feeling which it produced on its first introduction; but it was again brought forward in the session which commenced on the 23d of November. It passed the Lords with very slight opposition. In the Commons the bill was rejected by a very large majority, 269 to 167. On this occasion Walpole, generally the plainest and most business-like of speakers, opposed the bill with a rhetorical force which, according to the testimony of Speaker Onslow, "bore down everything before him." The exordium of his speech is remarkable: "Among the Romans, the wisest people upon earth, the temple of fame was placed behind the temple of virtue, to denote that there was no coming to the temple of fame but through that of virtue. But if this bill is passed into a law, one of the most powerful incentives to virtue would be taken away, since there would be no arriving at honor but through the winding-sheet of an old decrepit lord, or the grave of an extinct noble family; a policy very different from that glorious and enlightened nation who made it their pride to hold out to the world illustrious examples of merited elevation:

"Patere honoris scirent ut cuncti viam."

The opponents of the Peerage Bill did not fail to use the obvious argument, that although the prerogative of the crown might be abused by the creation of peers, as in the late reign, to secure a majority for the court, there was a greater danger in so limiting the peerage as to make the existing body what Walpole called "a compact impenetrable phalanx."

The South Sea scheme—Public infatuation—The bubble bursts—Parliamentary measures—Session of 1722—Plot for invasion and insurrection—Trial of Atterbury, Bishop of Rochester—His banishment—Wood's patent for a copper coinage in Ireland—The Drapier's letters—The ale-duty in Scotland—Riot at Glasgow—Impeachment of Lord Chancellor Macclesfield—Foreign affairs—Treaty of Hanover—Siege of Gibraltar—Peace—Death of George I.

THE great event of the sixth year of the reign of George I. was the exciting affair of the South Sea Scheme—an event upon which, after the lapse of a hundred and forty years, we may still look with greater interest than upon the treaties and the wars of which it is said, with some truth, that they are to us as the "mere bubblings up of the general putrid fermentation of the then political world."* Few people of that time clearly understood what this famous South Sea project meant; and it is somewhat difficult to make it intelligible now.

In the infant days of the national debt the great terror of statesmen was its increase and duration. At the accession of Queen Anne the debt amounted to sixteen millions; at her death it had reached fifty-two millions. In 1711 there was a floating debt of about ten millions. Harley, then lord treasurer, proposed to create a fund for that sum, and to secure the payment of interest, by making certain duties of customs permanent. Capitalists who held debentures were to become shareholders in a company incorporated for the purpose of carrying on a monopoly of trade to the Spanish coasts of South America, making the new fund a part of their capital stock. Thus was established the South Sea Company. When the peace of Utrecht was completed, Spain refused to permit any approach to the free trade which would have made such a commercial company of value. One ship only was allowed to be sent annually. A few factories were established, and the one ship sailed in 1717. Alberoni broke the treaty and seized the British goods. But the company had other means for the employment of capital, and many opulent persons were among its shareholders and directors.

At the opening of the session of parliament in November, 1719, the king said to the Commons, "I must desire you to turn your thoughts to all proper means for lessening the debts of the nation." In January, 1720, a proposal was read to the House of Commons from the South Sea Company, in which it was set forth that if certain public debts and annuities were made part of the capital stock of the company, it would greatly contribute to that most desirable end adverted to in his majesty's speech. Before that speech was delivered, Sir John Blunt, a South Sea director, had been in communication with the ministers, who gave a favorable ear to his projects. There was an annual charge upon the revenue of eight hundred thousand pounds, for irredeemable annuities granted in the reigns of William and Anne. To buy up these annuities was the advantageous point in the proposal of the company. The House of Commons agreed in the necessity of reducing the public debts. "Till this was done," said Mr. Brodrick, who moved that other companies should be allowed to compete, "we could not, properly speaking, call ourselves a nation." The Bank of England accordingly sent in a rival proposal; and the two companies went on outbidding each other till the South Sea Company's large offer to provide seven millions and a half to buy up the annuities was accepted. The annuitants were not compelled to exchange their government security for the company's stock; and the chief doubt seemed to be whether the greater number would consent to this transfer. Although the terms offered by the company to the annuitants were not encouraging, there was a rush to accept them. To hold stock in a company whose exclusive trading privileges might realize that "potentiality of wealth" which is never "beyond the dreams of avarice," was a far grander thing than to receive seven, eight, or even nine per cent upon annuities. Within six days of the announcement of the company's terms, two thirds of the annuitants had exchanged their certain income for the boundless imaginary riches of South America.

Upon this foundation was built the most enormous fabric of national delusion that was ever raised among an industrious, thrifty, and prudent people. It had been long manifest that there was a great amount of superfluous capital, especially of the hoardings of the middle classes, which wanted opportunities for employment. To obtain interest for small sums was scarcely practicable for the mass of those who were enabled to keep their expenditure below their incomes. Before the beginning of the century, companies, more or less safe, had been formed to meet this desire for investments. In spite of the long wars of the reigns of William and Anne, and the Jacobite plots and rebellions which threatened the Protestant succession, the country was going steadily forward in a course of prosperity. Wherever there is superfluous wealth, beyond the ordinary demands of industry for capital, there will be always projectors ready to suggest modes for its co-operative uses. The machinery of directors and managers—an organization with which our countrymen are now as familiar as that of a parish vestry—was as ready, though not quite as efficient, at the beginning of the eighteenth century as in the middle of the nineteenth. There was then to be seen many a type of the subtle attorney and the impudent secretary, who have spread such consternation in our own times. There was then to be seen the magnificent list of noble names, such as continue to attract the unwary to have confidence in some board where very few know the secret transactions. Even the Prince of Wales was then the governor of a Welsh copper company. But it seems to us that the belief of all the schemes of that scheming time being fraudulent and delusive is a mistake. Many of these schemes might be premature; and having chiefly in view the profit to be made by the rise of shares, might be called "bubbles." But it is scarcely reasonable to class the following projects among the ridiculous schemes of that gambling time: For improving alum works; for paving the streets of London; for supplying various towns with water; for improving the art of making soap; for improving the paper manufacture; for making iron with pit-coal; for extracting silver from lead. It had been justly said by a writer who decried, in 1695, "many pernicious projects now on foot," that "some were very useful and successful while they continued in a few hands, till they fell into stock-jobbing, now much introduced, when they dwindled to nothing: others of them were mere whims, of little or no service to the world."* Such, no doubt, was the general character of the manifold projects of 1720. In the summer of that year, the South Sea year, "the dog-star rages" over Exchange Alley with a fury that has never been equalled; because no capitalist, even to the possessor of a single shilling, was then too humble not to believe that the road to riches was open before him. Subscribers to projects recommended by "one or more persons of known credit," were only required to advance ten shillings per cent. A shilling, and even sixpence per cent was enough to secure the receipt for a share in the more doubtful undertakings. Shares of every sort were at a premium, unless in cases where the office that was opened at noon on one day was found closed on the next, and the shillings and sixpences had vanished with the subscription books. But the great impulse to the frantic stock-jobbing of that summer was the sudden and enormous rise in the value of South Sea stock. In July Secretary Craggs wrote to Earl Stanhope, who was abroad with the king, "It is impossible to tell you what a rage prevails here for South Sea subscriptions at any price. The crowds of those that possess the redeemable annuities is so great that the bank, who are obliged to take them in, has been forced to set tables with clerks in the streets."† The hundred-pound shares of the South Sea Company went up to a thousand pounds in August. The shares of the Bank of England and of the East India Company were transferred at an enormous advance. Smaller companies of every character—water companies, fishery companies, companies for various manufactures, companies for settlements and foreign trade—infinite varieties, down to companies for fatting hogs and importing jackasses from Spain—rushed into the market amid the universal cry for shares and more shares. The directors of the South Sea Company opened a second, a third, and a fourth subscription. They boldly proclaimed that after Christmas their annual dividend should not fall short of fifty per cent upon their £100 shares. The rivalry of the legion of projects of that season was odious to these great lords of the money-market. The government itself began to think that some fearful end would come to the popular delusion; and a royal proclamation was issued against "mischievous and dangerous undertakings, especially the presuming to act as a corporate body, or raising stocks or shares without legal authority." It was calculated that the value of the stock of all the companies, with corporate authority or no authority, amounted at the current prices to five hundred millions sterling, being five times as much as the circulating medium of Europe, and twice as much as the fee simple of all the land of the kingdom. The attempt of the South Sea Company to lessen the number of their competitors was the prelude to their own fall. At their instance, writs of scire facias were issued, on the 18th of August, against four companies; and the subscribers to these, and to all other projects not legalized, were ordered to be prosecuted by the officers of the crown. A panic ensued. In a day or two the stocks of all the companies not incorporated rapidly fell; and with the downward rush went down every description of stock. Before August knowing and cautious holders of South Sea stock began to sell out. Walpole, who had originally opposed the scheme, did not carry his opposition to the extreme of neglecting his opportunity of largely adding to his fortune by investing at the proper time and selling out at the proper time. The Earl of Pembroke applied to Walpole for his advice as to the great question of selling when the shares were at their culminating point. The adroit financier coolly answered, "I will only tell you what I have done myself. I have just sold out at £1000 per cent, and I am fully satisfied."* By the middle of September holders of South Sea stock were crowding the Exchange, not as eager buyers but as more eager sellers. The stock was at 850 on the 18th of August; in a month it had fallen to 410. Mr. Brodrick, on the 13th of September, writes that the most considerable men of the company, "with their fast friends, the Tories, Jacobites, and Papists," had drawn out, "securing themselves by the losses of the deluded thoughtless numbers whose understandings were overruled by avarice, and hopes of making mountains of molehills. Thousands of families will be reduced to beggary. . . . The consternation is inexpressible; the rage beyond expression; and the case is so desperate that I do not see any plan or scheme for averting the blow."† On the 29th of September South Sea stock had fallen to 175. This greatest of bubbles had burst. Many persons of rank and station were not so prudent as Walpole and the Earl of Pembroke had been. The Duke of Portland, Lord Lonsdale, and Lord Irwin were provided with colonial governments to enable them to live—a species of consideration for ruined nobility which is rather in bad odor in our days. Merchants, lawyers, clergy, physicians, passed from their dream of fabulous wealth and from their wonted comforts into poverty; some "died of broken hearts; others withdrew to remote parts of the world, and never returned."‡ It has been observed that "the calamitous effects of the madness were rather individual and immediate than permanent or general. There was little, if any, absolute destruction of capital. The whole mischief consisted in a most quick and violent shifting of property from one hand to another."§ But the derangement of the ordinary course of industry was to be added to this shifting of property. Serious as was this temporary evil, furious as it made the sufferers in their reproaches against every one but themselves, eager as it rendered the legislature for confiscation of the property of the South Sea directors, the national credit was not permanently impaired by the infatuation which produced so much private misery. In this respect the issue of the South Sea scheme was essentially different from the Mississippi scheme of John Law in France, which also exploded in that fatal year for projectors; producing there what was equivalent to a national bankruptcy. When the South Sea crash came there was alarm for its public consequences. But Walpole, who had again joined the government, though in a subordinate office, applied his great financial abilities to avert the difficulties which this convulsion might occasion to the state; and instead of joining the first cry for vengeance upon the South Sea directors, he calmly said in parliament, that if London were on fire, wise men would endeavor to extinguish the flames before they sought for the incendiaries. When the king opened the session on the 8th of December the royal speech recommended measures "to restore the national credit." Walpole was regarded by all parties as the man to effect this.

To endeavor to equalize, to the most inconsiderable extent, the losses and gains of individuals by the extravagant rise and sudden depression of South Sea stock would have been a task far beyond the province of any minister of state. The financial abilities of Walpole were necessarily directed to the very difficult labor of disentangling the government from the embarrassments of the South Sea Company. The English ministry had never attempted to sustain the value of the company's shares by arbitrary edicts, or to interfere with their fall by regulations that were based upon other principles than the great natural laws by which the money market, like every other market, must be governed. The French ministry, when the scheme of Law for relieving its exhausted finances by a paper currency, based on the imaginary riches of Louisiana, was in the course of breaking down, gave its orders that individuals should not retain in their possession any sum beyond a small amount of gold and silver, and should be compelled to carry on their transactions in Law's substitute for money. The shares were not to fall according to the rate at which their owners were willing to sell them, but to sink in nominal value, by a monthly reduction, till they had reached half their original price, at which rate they were to be fixed. All this, of course, was the merest convulsion of despotism. The regent had shifted a large amount of the debts of the state to the deluded people, and no attempt was made to retrieve the national credit. Walpole had to pursue a policy which was the only possible one under a limited monarchy, and which indeed was not beset with the difficulties that the government of the regent would have had to encounter in any struggle to be honest. The French finances were hopelessly embarrassed by a long course of extravagance, before Law thought he could perform the part of the magician in the Arabian story, making a scrap of paper pass as a piece of silver. The English finances were healthy, though the national debt amounted to fifty or sixty millions. The French government adopted the schemes of Law to furnish the means of new extravagances. The English government went into the scheme of the South Sea Company with the view of redeeming a portion of the national debt, and thus of lessening the amount of taxation. Voltaire records that he had seen Law come to court with dukes, marshals, and bishops following humbly in his train. The English court was not free from shame in the South Sea project. Half a million of fictitious stock had been created by the directors previous to the passing of the bill. The Duchess of Kendal, as well as other favorites of the king, had large douceurs out of the profits which the directors made by the transfer of these shares; and it is lamentable to add that Craggs, the secretary of state, his father the postmaster-general, and Aislabie, the chancellor of the exchequer, were among the recipients of this bribery. It was the business of parliament to trace the extent of the corruption, and to punish in some degree those directors for vengeance upon whom the nation was frightfully clamoring. Although in the petitions to parliament "for justice on the authors of the present calamities," we may see how individuals come to consider the losses produced by their own insensate desire for sudden riches as national misfortunes, we may yet observe how general is the calamity when a people think to grow rich by gambling instead of by work. The petition of the county of Kent avers that it was lately one of the most flourishing in the kingdom, "and is now reduced to a most unhappy condition by the execrable fraud of the late wicked South Sea directors." The petition of the borough of Leicester states that "no sooner had the South Sea directors, and the vile emissaries they dispatched over the kingdom to propagate lies and forgeries, so imposed upon the honest credulous people as to draw all their ready money and treasure into their infamous hands, but we saw trade instantly struck dead, our manufactures disregarded, our combed wool (once the staple and glory of our industrious corporation) lie neglected in our workhouses, our poor increasing for want of employment." Maidstone cannot pay the duty on hops, for there is no money in circulation. Somerset represents that the clothier's trade is gone to decay. Warwick says that the South Sea parricides have reduced a plundered people, in the space of one year only, "to as deplorable a state of calamity and distress as they ever yet suffered by any civil tumult or foreign war." Birmingham complains that its trade is wonderfully reduced, and that there is no money to pay the poor workmen. Want of money is the universal cry. No branch of industry has been exempted, according to these petitions, from suffering.* There may be exaggeration in these complaints. But it is nevertheless easy to understand how difficult it would be, in a condition of society where commercial credit was not upheld by large banking operations, to escape very serious evils, when the many streams and rills in which capital ordinarily flowed were diverted into one vast flood, and thus for a while the channels were left dry from which industry derived its regular nourishment.

The Commons, through the entire session, were occupied with investigations and discussions connected with the financial convulsion. Walpole brought forward his plan for sustaining the national credit, and had induced the house to agree that the public contracts with the South Sea Company should be undisturbed. His first proposal, to engraft a portion of the stock of that company into the Bank of England, and another portion into the East India Company, was carried after much debate; but this plan was ultimately merged into another measure. The private estates of the directors were to be regarded as a fund to provide some remedy for the public embarrassment. A bill was passed to compel them to deliver on oath an estimate of the value of their property, and to prevent them going out of the kingdom. A secret committee of inquiry was appointed. After they had examined Mr. Robert Knight, the cashier of the company, he fled to Brabant. A reward of £2000 was offered for his apprehension; but it was believed that there were influences at work powerful enough effectually to screen him. Knight was arrested at Antwerp; but the States of Brabant refused to give him up. "Screen" became a byword. Caricatures—which it is said were become common at this period for political objects—had for their point the Duchess of Kendal and the flight of the cashier. "The Brabant Screen" exhibited the king's mistress sending Knight upon his travels, giving him his dispatches from behind a screen.* The prudent cashier took care to obliterate, as far as possible, the evidence that great ladies and ministers of state had been corrupted by the South Sea directors. The committee of the Commons reported that "in some of the books produced before them false and fictitious entries were made; in others entries with blanks; in others entries with erasures and alterations; and in others leaves were torn out." They found, further, that some books had been destroyed, and others taken away or secreted. Out of the mouths of the directors the committee extracted evidence to show that there had been extensive appropriation of stock to "certain ladies," at the instance of Mr. Secretary Craggs; and the proof was clear that persons high in office had received and held stock during the time that the company's bill was depending in parliament, "without any valuable consideration paid, or sufficient security given for the acceptance of, or payment for, such stock." Nevertheless Charles Stanhope, one of the accused, was cleared by a majority of three. The Earl of Sunderland was exonerated by a larger majority; but he could not stand up against the popular odium, and resigned his post of first commissioner of the treasury. Aislabie, the chancellor of the exchequer, was expelled the house, and was sent to the Tower. James Craggs died of small pox during the heat of this inquiry. His father, the postmaster-general, destroyed himself by poison.

The charges against the directors were founded upon their practice of "selling their own stock at high prices, at the same time that they gave orders for buying stock upon account of the company;" and upon their various contrivances "to give his majesty's subjects false notions of the value" of the South Sea stock. Their punishment, under the bill that was passed, was severe. Their estates, amounting to two millions sterling, were confiscated for the relief of the sufferers by their schemes. A small allowance was made to each; but they were disabled from ever holding any place, or for sitting in parliament. Such visitations for their offences were thought far too lenient by the greater number of their contemporaries. They may now be considered excessive. Edward Gibbon has recorded his opinion of what he held to be the oppression endured by his grandfather, one of the directors. "Of the use or abuse of the South Sea scheme, of the guilt or innocence of my grandfather and his brother directors, I am neither a competent nor a disinterested judge. Yet the equity of modern times must condemn the violent and arbitrary proceedings which would have disgraced the cause of justice, and would render injustice still more odious. No sooner had the nation awakened from its golden dream than a popular and even a parliamentary clamor demanded their victims; but it was acknowledged on all sides that the South Sea directors, however guilty, could not be touched by any known laws of the land. The speech of Lord Molesworth, the author of 'The State of Denmark,' may show the temper, or rather the intemperance, of the House of Commons. 'Extraordinary crimes (exclaimed that ardent Whig) call aloud for extraordinary remedies. The Roman lawgivers had not foreseen the possible existence of a parricide; but as soon as the first monster appeared he was sewn in a sack and cast headlong into the river; and I shall be content to inflict the same treatment on the authors of our present ruin.' His motion was not literally adopted; but a bill of pains and penalties was introduced, a retroactive statute, to punish the offences which did not exist at the time they were committed. Such a pernicious violation of liberty and law can be excused only by the most imperious necessity; nor could it be defended on this occasion by the plea of impending danger or useful example."*

During a debate in the Lords upon the conduct of the South Sea directors, the Duke of Wharton, as profligate as he was able, made a furious attack upon Stanhope, comparing him to Sejanus. The anger to which the earl was moved produced a rush of blood to his head. A temporary relief by cupping was obtained; but the next day the skilful and honest secretary of state suddenly expired. No suspicion of improper connection with the South Sea scheme had affected his honor. Lord Townshend again became secretary of state. With Walpole chancellor of the exchequer, salutary measures were pursued to restore confidence. The South Sea Company were relieved from certain engagements to make advances to the government, and the credit of their bonds was sustained at its just value.

The session of 1722 was a busy session. Questions more important than those connected with party interests were discussed. An act had been passed in the last session—under the apprehension of the plague which was raging in France—for the building of pest-houses, to which infected persons, and even the healthy of an infected family, were to be removed; and lines were to be drawn round any infected town or city. Earl Cowper, the ex-chancellor, a man of liberal and enlightened views, moved for the repeal of these powers, as unknown to our constitution, and inconsistent with the lenity of our free government. But his motion was rejected. "The people called Quakers" had presented a petition, complaining that, under their present form of affirmation, they were unable to answer in courts of equity, take probates of wills, prove debts on commissions of bankruptcy, take up their freedoms, and be admitted to poll at elections for their freeholds. Upon a debate in the Lords, Atterbury, the Bishop of Rochester, spoke against indulgences "to be allowed to a set of people who were hardly Christians." The London clergy petitioned against a bill for their relief, contending that, however the Quakers might be injured in their private affairs, "an oath was instituted by God himself as the surest bond of fidelity among men," and that any relaxation of that principle would only tend to multiply a sect "who renounce the divine institution of Christ, particularly that by which the faithful are initiated into his religion." The bill for the relief of the Quakers was passed in spite of the hard terms in which they had been assailed. The session was prorogued to the 15th of March; and it was previously dissolved, under the provisions of the Septennial Act. During the prorogation the Earl of Sunderland died; and his father-in-law, the great Duke of Marlborough, terminated his checkered career of political time-serving and of military glory. When he was borne to Westminster Abbey, with funeral pomp proportioned to his great achievements, we may believe that there were few who did not feel that his wonderful services to his country ought in some degree to obliterate the memory of the infirmities of an ambitious and selfish nature—the failings which have prevented him taking his place in history as one of the grandest of England's sons.

In 1720 the wife of James Edward carried forward the aspirations of the house of Stuart into another generation, by giving birth to a son. Atterbury, the most uncompromising of partisans, considered this "the most acceptable news which can reach the ears of a good Englishman." Charles Edward Louis Casimir, whose royal descent was put beyond suspicion by the presence of seven cardinals in the chamber of the princess, was destined even in his cradle to give the signal for conspiracies and possible insurrections. The Duke of Ormond was again to lead foreign forces to the invasion of Britain. The Jacobites in England, among whom there were five earls and the undaunted Bishop of Rochester, were to get possession of the Tower, seize all the deposits of public treasure, and to proclaim James III. The delusions of these men are to be pitied. They were enthusiasts. They looked upon the fallen house of Stuart through a haze of sentiment, and saw in Charles I. and James II. only the images of legitimate kings, murdered and deposed by their wicked and rebellious subjects, and in the exiled descendants of these kings only princes who had an absolute right to eject the unlawful possessors of their crowns. The nation—the people—were, in their view, but men born to obey, in whose obedience there could be no discretion. They saw, moreover, in a dominant church, that supreme authority over the consciences of Christian believers which would admit of no scruples as to doctrine or ceremonials. Dissent was simply heresy and schism. A judicious, and in many respects impartial, historian, ascribes, what he calls "the second growth of Jacobitism" to the publication in the reign of Anne of Clarendon's "History of the Rebellion." Atterbury was one of its editors. The "gray discrowned head" of Charles; the exile and the restoration of his son—these were the stirring recollections that made the remnant of the old cavaliers, now bearing the somewhat less glorious name of Tories, turn to the first Charles' grandson "pining in a distant land, under circumstances not far unlike to those of Charles Stuart in France."* We may reasonably doubt whether so clever a man as Atterbury had not read other histories besides those of Clarendon; whether he could only see the popular gladness of the restoration, and not direct one thought to the degradation of the monarchy, to the struggles to make his countrymen slaves and papists, which followed the restoration. Yet some men do read history in the way which is held to have produced "the second birth of Jacobitism," and Atterbury might have been of the number.

The departure of the king, in the summer of 1722, upon his usual visit to his German dominions, was to be the signal for an invasion of England by the pretender and his faithful Ormond. Disbanded troops of various countries were being collected together for this enterprise. The managers of the plot had the supreme folly to apply to the Regent of France for the aid of five thousand men; and the regent, having more respect for treaties than Louis XIV., informed the British minister at Paris of the application. The vigilant Walpole was soon acquainted with the plan of action and the names of the actors. The king was advised not to go to Hanover; a camp was formed in Hyde Park; and some of the conspirators—two nonjuring clergymen, two Irish priests, a young barrister, and two lords—were apprehended. After a delay of three months the Bishop of Rochester was arrested, and, after examination before the council, was sent to the Tower. For nearly thirty years had Francis Atterbury been known as the keenest of controversialists as well as the most impressive of preachers. From the beginning of the century he had been considered as the leader of the high-church party: the great asserter of the independence of convocation. Gradually he had become identified with the most extreme principles of passive obedience; was the promptor of Sacheverel in his defence in 1710; was recognized as having earned a bishopric when Harley came into power; and had, upon the death of Queen Anne, taken a very decided part in his hostility to the Hanoverian succession. His arrest in August, 1722, produced the most violent ferment among his church party. The Episcopal order, it was proclaimed, was outraged. Atterbury was prayed for in the London churches. Atterbury was represented, in a print intended to move the popular sympathy, as standing behind his prison-bars, gazing upon a portrait of Laud. The plot, it was maintained, was a base fiction. The new parliament met in October; and the king, in his speech on the 11th, announced the discovery of a dangerous conspiracy, and the arrest of some of the conspirators. The Habeas Corpus Act was suspended for a whole year; and the consent of the House of Peers was desired to sanction the detention in the Tower of the Bishop of Rochester, Lord North and Grey, and the Earl of Orrery. A foolish declaration, signed "James Rex," had been issued on the 22d of September, in which James III., King of England, Scotland, and Ireland, proposed that George should quietly deliver to him the throne of those kingdoms; when he, King James, would bestow upon George the title of king in his native dominions, and invite all other states to confirm it. Moreover, the British crown should be confirmed to the penitent usurper, if ever he should attain it in the due course of legitimate succession. This wonderful production was ordered by parliament to be burned by the common hangman, as "a false, insolent and traitorous libel." On the 1st of March, 1723, a committee of the Commons made a report of their examinations into the evidence of the conspiracy. It is a document of great length. It involved other eminent persons besides those who had been arrested. Christopher Layer, the barrister, had been previously tried and condemned in the King's Bench. He was the only person who suffered capital punishment. Bills of pains and penalties were passed against the two Irish priests. The most important person among the accused, the Bishop of Rochester, was also proceeded against by bill, enacting his punishment and deprivation. This bill passed the Commons without a division. Atterbury declined making a defence before the lower house; but on the 6th of May he stood at the bar of the House of Lords, and after the evidence against him had been gone through he defended himself with great ingenuity and eloquence.

The debate among the Peers on the question that the bill do pass was remarkable for the constitutional opposition of Lord Cowper, the ex-chancellor. He said, "My lords, this bill carries in the frame of it an invincible objection to it; for the preamble and the enacting part, the crime and the punishment, bear no proportion to each other. The preamble contains a charge of high treason against the bishop; and pray, my lords, why should he not be punished accordingly? . . . What reason can be given why the bishop should not be punished, at least equal with others, in case of high treason? Why truly, the want of legal evidence is the only reason pretended. . . . To palliate the matter a little, a distinction is endeavored to be made between legal evidence and real evidence, or between such evidence as our law requires and such as in natural justice and equity ought to be admitted. But, my lords, this is a distinction entirely without a difference; for what is evidence of a fact before any judicature whatsoever but such testimony as the nature of the case requires, to induce a moral certainty of the truth of the thing testified? . . . The wisdom and goodness of our law appear in nothing more remarkably, than in the perspicuity, certainty, and clearness of the evidence it requires to fix a crime upon any man, whereby his life, his liberty, or his property may be concerned: hereon we glory and pride ourselves, and are justly the envy of all our neighbor nations. Our law, in such cases, requires evidence so clear and convincing that every bystander, the instant he hears it, must be fully satisfied of the truth of it. It admits of no surmises, innuendoes, forced consequences, or harsh constructions, nor anything else to be offered as evidence but what is real and substantial, according to the rules of natural justice and equity." These arguments of a great legal authority have a lasting importance far beyond the immediate question of Atterbury's guilt or innocence. The bill of pains and penalties was a mischievous precedent, "open to the same objection as the attainder of Sir John Fenwick—the danger of setting aside those precious securities against a wicked government which the law of treason has furnished."* The possible guilt of the offender does not justify an irregular and arbitrary mode of dealing with his offence. It might be merciful in the government thus to proceed against the bishop in a mode which did not affect his life; but that mode was more probably the only way in which they could secure a conviction at all. The connection of Atterbury with the exiled family before his banishment has been abundantly proved by other evidence than that within the reach of his accusers and judges. The bill against him was passed by a majority of forty peers, most of the bishops voting against him—possibly with some higher motive than that imputed to them in the sarcasm of Lord Bathurst, of believing, as the wild Indians believed, that they would inherit the abilities as well as the spoils of any great enemy whom they slew. The estate of Atterbury was not forfeited by his attainder. He embarked for France in June, 1723, and died at Paris in 1732.

In 1724, through the ordinary course of ministerial rivalries and jealousies, the accomplished Lord Carteret was removed from the office of secretary of state, which he held in conjunction with Lord Townshend, and the same course was pursued toward him as toward Townshend himself in 1716. Carteret was appointed lord lieutenant of Ireland—a post considered of far less anxious responsibility than that of secretary of state. During his lord-lieutenancy Ireland became no bed of roses. Among the many real wrongs which Ireland has borne, and the not less numerous imaginary grievances of which she has complained, in her connection with England, there is probably no example of a national ferment so wholly disproportionate to the extent of the injury as that of Wood's patent for a coinage of copper farthings and halfpence. No one can doubt that when a nation is in almost utter want of money of the lowest denomination, the extortions practised upon the humblest classes must be considerable. Ireland was so completely without a currency to conduct the smaller operations of trade that laborers were paid by cards bearing the seals and signatures of their employers. In all such cases of a questionable or a depreciated currency, it is the poor man who has to bear the largest amount of trouble or loss. In 1722 a patent was granted to William Wood, a proprietor and renter of iron and copper mines in England, to enable him to coin farthings and halfpence for Ireland to the value of £108,000. There is no doubt that the patentee was to make a profit, for the Duchess of Kendal had been bribed to promote the grant of the patent. But Walpole and his subordinates took every reasonable measure of precaution that the coinage should not become an opportunity for fraud or excessive gain. Sir Isaac Newton, as master of the mint, approved the terms of the contract; and when the coins were in circulation, and it was seen that discontent was assiduously stirred up, an assay was made by the officers of the mint, and it was declared that in weight and fineness of metal the pieces were satisfactory. The difference of exchange between England and Ireland had been thought a satisfactory reason for a slight diminution in weight of the copper currency for Ireland.

The Irish parliament, moved in some degree by the apparent neglect of this exercise of the royal prerogative, without consulting the Irish privy council, voted an address to the king, that the terms of the patent would occasion a loss to the nation of 150 per cent. Walpole was astonished, as he well might be, at this impudent declaration of a legislative body. He examined the matter carefully, and perceived that the assertion was founded upon a computation that the rough Irish copper was worth twelvepence a pound, and that a pound of halfpence and farthings coined out of fine copper were to pass for thirty pence. He found that the mint of London paid eighteen pence per pound for prepared copper; that the charge of coinage was fourpence per pound; and that the duties and allowances upon copper imported into Ireland amounted to 20 per cent. A committee of the English privy council went into a searching examination of the whole affair, and fully justified the patentee from any charge of having abused the fair terms of his patent. It was, however, conceded that the amount of farthings and halfpence issued should not exceed £40,000 in value; and that this money should not be a legal tender for a larger sum than fivepence halfpenny in one payment.

Under these circumstances, in 1724 a letter was published by M. B. Drapier, addressed "to the tradesmen, shopkeepers, and country people in general, of the kingdom of Ireland, concerning the brass halfpence coined by one William Wood, hardwareman," which letter thus solemnly opens: "What I intend now to say to you is, next to your duty to God and the care of your salvation, of the greatest concern to yourselves and your children: your bread and clothing, and every common necessary of life, entirely depend upon it." The writer, as every one guessed, was the famous Dean of St. Patrick's; and certainly no pen was so able as that wielded by Jonathan Swift, to raise a popular clamor by the most skilful treatment of his subject; and, what was perhaps as much to the purpose, by the most unscrupulous assertions. In England the Drapier said, halfpence and farthings pass for little more than they are worth; if you were to beat them to pieces and sell them to the brazier, you would not lose much more than a penny in a shilling. But Mr. Wood made his halfpence of such base metal and so much smaller than the English ones, that the brazier would hardly give you above a penny of good money for a shilling of his; so that the sum of £108,000 in good gold and silver must be given for trash that will not be worth eight or nine thousand pounds real value." The Irish parliament falsely asserted that the depreciation amounted to 150 per cent. The more mendacious demagogue asserted that the depreciation amounted to 1100 per cent. "For example, if a hatter sells a dozen of hats for 5*s.* apiece, which amounts to £3, and receives the payment in Wood's coin, he really receives only the value of 5*s.*" Throughout the whole of the Drapier's letters, Swift's argument rests upon the most solid basis of political economy; but his premises are utterly false. He knew well what England and Ireland had suffered by the depreciation of the coin. This bold opponent of the government which had delivered his country from despotism, says, "I intend to truck with my neighbors, the butchers and bakers and the rest, goods for goods; and the little gold and silver I have I will keep by me, like my heart's blood, till better times, or until I am just ready to starve; and then I will buy Mr. Wood's money, as my father did the brass money in King James' time, who could buy £10 of it for a guinea." Against such logic as this what could simple truth avail? The Irish went mad about Wood's halfpence. The mischievous dean not only stirred the nation up with Drapier's letters, but with songs that were sung in every street. Wood was to be scalded in his own melted copper. He was to be hanged:

"The halfpence are coming, the nation's undoing;
There's an end of your ploughing, and baking, and brewing;
In short, you must all go to rack and ruin."

When Carteret came over he found the Irish people in a state of frenzy. He tried what are called strong measures. He offered a reward of £300 for discovering the author of the "Drapier's Letters." He prosecuted their printer. The grand jury threw out the bill; and another grand jury made a presentment, setting forth that "several quantities of base metal coined, commonly called Wood's halfpence, have been brought into the port of Dublin, and lodged in several houses in this city, with an intention to make them pass clandestinely;" and that "having entirely his majesty's interest and the welfare of our country, and being thoroughly sensible of the great discouragements which trade hath suffered by the apprehensions of the said coin, whereof we have already felt the dismal effects, and that the currency thereof will inevitably tend to the great diminution of his majesty's revenue, and the ruin of us and our posterity, do present all such persons as have attempted or shall endeavor by fraud or otherwise, to impose the said halfpence upon us, contrary to his majesty's most gracious intention, as enemies to his majesty's government, and to the safety, peace, and welfare of all his majesty's subjects of this kingdom." It was in vain that the government attempted to stand up against this storm. The grand jury said, "We do, with all great gratitude, acknowledge the services of all such patriots as have been eminently zealous for the interest of his majesty and this country, in detecting the fraudulent imposition of the said Wood, and preventing the passing of his base coin." Swift wrote this eulogy upon his own patriotism. He had beaten the government of King George. The patent was withdrawn. It was believed by the few who knew how baseless were the exaggerated complaints of Wood's halfpence, that the Drapier had asserted the independence of Ireland. The multitude believed whatever he had predicted of national ruin. This victory was in some respects the triumph of genius; but it must not be forgotten that if the genius manifested in the "Drapier's Letters" could lead one admirer of Swift to regard them as the most perfect examples of oratory since the days of Demosthenes,* a calmer view of the limits to which genius ought to be confined by honesty would lead us to say that out of the four names which the great partisan chose to bear, that of Drapier ought to be as odious to those who justly estimate the duty of a public writer, as that filth in which Swift delighted to wallow—more his own filth than the filth of his age.

"Dean, Drapier, Bickerstaff, or Gulliver,"

Walpole restored Ireland to quietness by cancelling Wood's patent. He had the rare wisdom of yielding even to popular prejudice, when perseverance was clearly more perilous than concession. With Walpole such a course may be regarded as prudence. With a less skilful and powerful administrator it would have been weakness. In 1725

Scotland was also firing-up upon a domestic question. The House of Commons, in opposition to the opinion of Walpole, had determined that the malt duty, which had been constantly evaded in Scotland, should be merged in a duty of threepence on every barrel of ale. The duty was to come into operation on the 23d of June. On that day there was considerable restlessness among the population of Glasgow. Daniel Campbell, the member of parliament for Glasgow—one of the class which had been raised to opulence by the commercial freedom which the union opened—was considered by the populace to have supported the government in devising the ale duty. Campbell's house was attacked at midnight and destroyed. Military force was called in; and the next day the soldiers, being beset by the mob in their guard-house, the people were fired upon and several were killed and wounded. General Wade, whose troops had been employed in the most useful service of constructing the great military roads of the Highlands, marched into Glasgow and effectually quelled the riot. At Edinburgh the resistance to the tax took another form. The brewers refused to brew. The Scotch lawyers talked of prosecution and imprisonment. The wiser secretary for Scotland indeed threatened; but he saw that such a combination would break down of itself. The brewers had a meeting and resolved to put the question, "Brew or not?" One man said he would not be bound by a majority, and voted "Brew." The assembly broke up, and all the brew-houses of Edinburgh were at work that night. Walpole wrote to Lord Townshend in September, "I think we have once more got Ireland and Scotland quiet if we take care to keep them so."

In 1725 England presented the miserable spectacle which she had witnessed in the reign of James I.—a lord chancellor impeached for malversation in his great office. Thomas Parker was a very different man from Francis Bacon; and the offences of which the Earl of Macclesfield was accused were of another character than those which were the ruin of the Viscount St. Alban's. The chancellor of King James was disgraced upon the charge of having received bribes from suitors. The chancellor of King George was impeached, found guilty, excluded forever from office, and fined thirty thousand pounds, upon the charges of selling masterships in the Court of Chancery and of conniving at the frauds of the masters in trafficking with the trust-money of the suitors and the estates of widows and orphans. Lord Campbell, in controverting a disposition in some writers of recent times to consider that Lord Macclesfield was unjustly condemned, holds that "his conviction was lawful and his punishment was mild." *

The foreign policy of George I. under the able administration of Walpole had become decidedly pacific. The nation was manifestly prospering under the relief which peace had brought. The fear of the pretender and of Spanish or Swedish invasions had passed away. The house of Brunswick after ten years of struggle was firmly fixed on its constitutional throne. Yet there were still threatenings of war. The Congress of Cambrai, to which the difficulties that had not been finally settled by the peace of 1720 had been referred, had been wearily discussing certain royal claims and disputes—"bailing out water with sieves"—for four or five years. The regent Orleans had died during these tedious protocollings in 1723. Louis XV., declared of age, had taken the government of France into his own hands, with the Duke de Bourbon as his minister. The alliance of France with England continued uninterrupted. But the Emperor Charles and the King of Spain, Philip, were coming to a closer understanding about territorial arrangements than England, France, and Russia thought safe. Philip of Spain was a mere shadow in the management of these affairs. His queen was the restless agitator; and Elizabeth had found a most active successor to Alberoni in the Duke de Ripperda, a Dutch adventurer, who found it as easy to change from Protestantism to Catholicism, as he afterward did to change from Catholicism to Mahometanism. Ripperda was sent upon a secret mission to Vienna, to accomplish, by a direct treaty between the two great rival powers, what the Congress of Cambrai had been vainly hammering at for a time not to be borne by royal patience. The courts of France and Spain had, moreover, got into a very pretty quarrel in 1725. When Philip acceded to the Quadruple Alliance, his reluctance had been smoothed over by a plan for marrying the infanta of Spain to the youthful King of France, and also of marrying his son, Don Luis, to a daughter of the regent Orleans. The children were betrothed, after the then usual fashion of sovereigns. When Louis XV., though only fifteen years old, was held of age to govern, the infanta was only eight years old. The Duke de Bourbon, and probably the young king also, had no disposition to complete a marriage which so long postponed the prospect of succession. The infanta was returned to Spain with little ceremony, and another Queen of France was looked out for. The court of Madrid was of course in a fever of indignation. The national pride was wounded as well as the royal honor. All Frenchmen were ordered to leave Spain. The Congress of Cambrai was at an end. Ripperda was to make any bargain with the emperor. As King George hesitated about taking part in the quarrel, the alliance of the courts of Madrid and Vienna was to be one of hostility to the courts of Versailles and St. James's. The Treaty of Vienna, in 1725, was ominous to the peace of Europe.

Looking back upon these affairs, they excite very small interest in our day; they pass over as the summer cloud "without our special wonder." It was fortunate that England and France had no desire for war. Cardinal Fleury had succeeded the Duke de Bourbon as prime minister of Louis XV., and he and Walpole were not going to rush into hostilities. But they would take measures of precaution. The Treaty of Hanover bound England, France, and Prussia—the date September 3d, 1725—in an engagement to hold by each other if either were attacked. The tables were turned since the War of the Succession. The old foes were fast friends, and the old friends bitter foes; and all these changes took place, as in private friendship, for "some trick not worth an egg." War seemed imminent, however pacifically disposed were Fleury and George. When the English parliament met on the 20th of January, 1726, the king announced the conclusion of his defensive treaties with the Most Christian king and the King of Prussia, to which several of the powers had been invited to accede. There was some opposition to the address approving the treaty; but the government majority was very large. Some change might have been expected in the policy of Spain, by the fall of Ripperda, who was dismissed from his employments, and, apprehensive of royal or popular resentments, had taken refuge in the house of the English minister. He was accused of having exaggerated the desire of Austria for so intimate an alliance with Spain as would have warranted an offensive league between them. Ripperda was dragged from Mr. Stanhope's apartments and sent to prison. The rights of ambassadors were considered to have been violated, and the remonstrances of the English government embittered the disputes between the two countries. They were more embittered by the revelations that Ripperda made to Stanhope, in revenge for his disgrace, and in gratitude for the asylum that had been afforded him. He disclosed the secret articles of the Treaty of Vienna, and declared that its chief object was the extirpation of the Protestant religion.

Warlike movements were very soon organized in England. The Czar Peter was dead. The Czarina Catherine I., had prepared a fleet for co-operation with Austria and Spain. Admiral Wager sailed to the Baltic with an English fleet; and the politics of Russia became more pacific. A squadron under Admiral Hosier blockaded Porto Bello—an unfortunate enterprise, for the brave admiral and a large number of his fleet's crews perished of yellow fever in the Spanish Main. If this activity was not war, it was very like war. In the parliament which met in January, 1727, the king announced that he had received information upon which he could wholly depend, that one of the secret articles of the Treaty of Vienna was an agreement to place the pretender upon the throne of Britain. The parliament instantly voted a large increase of the army and navy. The emperor was advised by Palm, his minister at London, to disavow such a secret agreement. The indiscreet resident addressed a memorial to the king, a translation of which was printed and published, in which the secret articles were disavowed, and the royal word was spoken of with disrespect. The two houses were indignant at "the insolence" of the imperial minister in dispersing his memorial through the kingdom; declaring "their utmost abhorrence of this audacious manner of appealing to the people against his majesty." Palm was commanded immediately to leave England. Spain was assembling an army for the siege of Gibraltar, under the command of the Conde de Las Torres, who boasted that in six weeks he would drive the heretics into the sea. On the 11th of February the siege was commenced. English men-of-war in the harbor secured a constant supply of provisions for the garrison from the coast of Africa. Lord Portmore—one of the men whose energy age appears unable to cripple—hastened from England, in his eightieth year, to defend the fortress of which he was the governor. For four months the Spaniards ineffectually fired upon the rock, and then they raised the siege.

On the 15th of May, 1727, King George closed the session of parliament preparatory to his departure for Hanover. He adverted to the attack upon Gibraltar. He had suspended, he said, his resentments under such provocation; and instead of having immediate recourse to arms, and demanding that assistance of his allies which they had engaged, and were ready to give, he had concurred with France and the States-General in making overtures of accommodation. Sweden had acceded to the Treaty of Hanover, and a convention had been signed by Denmark. The overtures of accommodation, thus mentioned, had been successful. The Austrian ambassador signed, on the 31st of May, preliminaries of peace with England, France, and Holland. Spain remained alone; neither prepared for war nor acceding to the conditions of peace. At this juncture the power of Walpole seemed to be somewhat endangered. Bolingbroke—who had been allowed by the intervention of Walpole to return to England; who was about to embark at Calais at the close of his exile, when Atterbury landed there a banished man; who had been restored to his estates by act of parliament in 1725—was intriguing to reach once more the possession of power under George which he had obtained under Anne. He had secured, by bribes and protestations, the favor of the Duchess of Kendal, the mistress, or, according to some, the left-handed wife of the Hanoverian king. The duchess presented to her royal admirer a memorial from Bolingbroke, in which he denounced Walpole as the author of every public evil. The king put this paper into the hands of Walpole, with his usual straightforward mode of action. The ambitious statesman therein requested an interview with his sovereign. George was indisposed to grant this meeting. Walpole earnestly pressed it, with his never-failing sagacity; for, as he himself said, "if this was not done, the clamor would be that I kept his majesty to myself, and would allow none to come near him to tell the truth." George told his minister that Bolingbroke's complaints and representations were "bagatelles." The king set out for Hanover on the 3d of June, accompanied by the Duchess of Kendal and Lord Townshend. The unhappy wife of George had died on the 13th of November, 1726, after many schemes of escape. The king landed on the 7th at Vaert, in Holland. On the 8th he proceeded on his journey, leaving the Duchess of Kendal on the Dutch frontier. On the 9th he slept at Delden, and was again in his coach at four o'clock in the morning of the 10th, accompanied by two official persons of the court of Hanover. In the forenoon of that day he was struck by apoplexy. He refused to stop at Ippenburen, as his attendants wished. His hands fell; his eyes were heavy; but his will was strong. "Osnabruck! Osnabruck!" he exclaimed. His one surviving brother, the prince bishop, had his palace at Osnabruck. The king's voice grew fainter. He murmured in his death-sleep, "C'est fait de moi" (All is over with me). All was over. When the bishop was roused by the gallop of horses in his courtyard at midnight, George, King of Great Britain and Elector of Hanover, was dead. He was buried at Hanover.

Sir Robert Walpole is seated at dinner in his villa at Chelsea on the 14th of June, 1727. An express arrives from Lord Townshend, who has accompanied George I. to the continent as secretary of state. The king is dead. The first commissioner of the treasury is instantly in the saddle on his road to Richmond, where the Prince of Wales is staying. The Prince of Wales has dined and is asleep in his bedchamber, the princess sitting by his side. Sir Robert Walpole must see the prince immediately. At that moment the great minister probably regarded his tenure of power as more uncertain than when the Duchess of Kendal was intriguing with Bolingbroke against him. The prince looked upon his father's chief adviser with suspicion and resentment. "I am come to acquaint your majesty with the death of your father," was Walpole's hasty communication. He then asked certain questions about the king's pleasure as to the council being summoned, and as to other necessary formalities. "Go to Chiswick, and take your directions from Sir Spencer Compton," was the uncourteous reply.* Sir Spencer Compton was treasurer to the Prince of Wales. He was speaker of the House of Commons and paymaster to the army—"a plodding, heavy fellow, with great application but no talents," says Lord Hervey. Walpole told Compton it was clear that the king meant him for his minister. Walpole professed that he had no desire of power for himself—a small office in the household would be sufficient to show that he was not disgraced. The minister expectant, who was "always more concerned for the manner and form in which a thing was to be done than about the propriety or expediency of the thing itself," was charmed with the moderation of the man who had been the ruler of England. He asked Walpole to make for him a draught of a speech to be delivered by the king to the council, while he went to the king at Leicester House. When he returned, the speech was ready. Sir Spencer made a copy of it, and went back to Leicester House. One passage in the speech was objected to by the king; and Sir Spencer, not seeing his way to alter it, requested Sir Robert to see his majesty and implore him to leave it as originally drawn. The shrewd Caroline of Anspach, who was the firm friend of Walpole—"a better judge than her husband of the capacities of the two men, and who had silently watched for a proper moment for overturning the new designations—did not lose a moment in observing to the king how prejudicial it would be to his affairs to prefer a man in whose own judgment his predecessor was the fittest person to execute the office." † The next day, when the son-in-law of Walpole was displaced from his office of master of the robes, all thought the fall of the ministry was certain. The king had been known, in his father's time, to speak of Walpole as a rogue; of his brother Horace as a dirty buffoon; of Newcastle as an impertinent fool; of Townshend as a choleric blockhead. But the king made no decided movement toward a new administration. The courtiers flocked around Sir Spencer; they got out of the way of Sir Robert. The Civil List was to be settled by parliament in a fortnight. The court moved to Kensington, "where the king," says Hervey, "by the audiences that were asked, and the offers that were made to him by the great men of all denominations, found himself set up at auction, and every one bidding for his favor at the expense of the public." Walpole outbid his rivals. He proposed in parliament that the entire revenue of the Civil List should be settled on the king, being an increase of about 130,000*l.*, and that Queen Caroline should receive a jointure of 100,000*l.* Not a voice was raised against the proposal but that of Shippen. Walpole and his party continued in power. Compton was consoled with the presidency of the council and a peerage. Horace Walpole, as well as Lord Hervey, attributing the triumph of Walpole to the strong influence which the queen possessed over her husband, intimate that Walpole's political opponents, and even some of those who acted with him, thought that the prince's favorite mistress, Mrs. Howard (afterward Lady Suffolk) would be the dispenser of court favors in the new reign. "Sir Robert's sagacity discerned that the power would be lodged with the wife, not with the mistress; and he not only devoted himself to the princess, but totally abstained from even visiting Mrs. Howard." ‡ remonstrance of Shippen. He did not even find a seconder to his amendment. The time was not yet ripe for agitating the question of a distinct provision for the eldest son of the king, independent of any allowance the crown might bestow upon him. Frederick was about twenty years of age, was not a resident in England, and was not yet created Prince of Wales. The case of his father was different when he was Prince of Wales. He was thirty-two years of age, he came to England at the accession of George I., and he lived here with his wife and daughters. Unhappily, both on the part of the father and the mother of Frederick, there was a deep-rooted antipathy toward this eldest son—an unhappy circumstance which probably interfered with such an arrangement as would not have left him wholly dependent upon what Lord Hervey terms "the discretion and generosity of his father." George II. was not very discreet, and he was very far from generous. The unkingly passion of avarice was predominant in his most trivial disbursements. But this precise little man had one supreme royal virtue, that of an inflexible love of justice. Personal courage he signally possessed—it is an attribute of his race. He fought under Marlborough at Oudenarde in 1708. He headed the charge of his infantry at Dettingen in 1743. In Queen Caroline, George, for ten years of his reign, had such an adviser and friend as few sovereigns have ever been blessed with. She possessed the rare wisdom—difficult even in private life, but far more difficult in the relations of a king and his consort—of governing her husband without appearing to govern. She never offered an opinion when any matter of state was discussed between the king and his ministers in her presence; but her opinion was ever certain to prevail. Queen Caroline and Robert Walpole perfectly understood the system under which the succession of the house of Brunswick became less and less assailable. Expediency was their great principle—let well enough alone—quieta non movere. Keep the nation as much as possible at peace with its neighbors. Abstain from asserting any prerogative that might appear to interfere with parliamentary government. Secure a majority in parliament, even at the cost of pandering to the cupidity of the dishonest and time-serving. Surrender even what you know to be right, if the danger of popular clamor against a measure be greater than the good which it proposes to accomplish. These are not noble maxims of government; but they were not without their beneficial results upon a nation that had been disturbed by conflicting principles for nearly a century. The consequence of this policy was that there are fewer stirring events in the first fourteen years of the reign of George II. than in any period of like duration in our history. Happy is the family which is reared without any adventures to record beyond the "migrations from the blue bed to the brown." Happy the nation which has little to offer to the notice of the historian, during the period of half a generation, but its steady progress in the arts of industry; its growth of capital; its abundant provision of the funds for sustaining labor; its general contentment, which some silly outbreak of popular prejudice only renders more remarkable; its leisure to examine into social evils, which chiefly affect those masses of the people that politicians have been too apt to neglect till they have become dangerous in their impatience of intolerable abuses.

The foreign policy of England had ceased to be perplexed with apprehensions of insurrection and invasion for restoring the Stuart family. At the accession of George II. there was a momentary hope among the Jacobites that something might be done. Atterbury, who had thrown off all disguise, described to James the spirit of caution and fear which possessed his friends "at home"—how nothing could be expected of them without foreign assistance. The British and French governments were in entire accord. Spain, although still grumbling about Gibraltar, had consented to a peace. All unsettled questions with the emperor and others were to be referred to a congress at Soissons. Eighteen months were the peputies at this congress, pretending to debate about the Pragmatic Sanction,* and other nice points of diplomatic subtlety. "The cooks of the plenipotentiaries," says Lord Hervey, "had much more business there than their secretaries." The ministry of George became tired of a state of things which was neither peace nor war, and, when their patience was worn out by the never-ending discussions of Soissons, they, in conjunction with France and Holland, concluded the Peace of Seville with Spain, leaving the emperor to fight his own battle. Some sixteen months later, by the Treaty of Vienna with Great Britain and Holland, there was obtained a guarantee of the Pragmatic Sanction, by which Charles, the emperor, who had no sons, had provided that the succession to the hereditary estates of Austria should rest in the female line. Spain, shortly after, acceded to the treaty. The disputes as to the Spanish Succession came to an end—"the problem with which creation had groaned for some twenty years past, finally accomplished better or worse."* During the twelve years in which England was at peace with all nations the pretender fell into a state of humiliation which compelled his supporters long to remain in hopeless apathy. There were always scheming priests and unprincipled adventurers about him, to tell him of some party quarrel or some popular discontent in England and Scotland as being propitious to his return. But no man of any mark or influence could now be induced to engage in a dangerous adventure for the cause of a man who was faithless and ungrateful—who had quarrelled with Bolingbroke and Atterbury, and had chosen his advisers from among the weakest and most bigoted of his adherents. James Edward's character was such as to alienate his warmest friends. The cause of the Stuarts they thought was utterly lost unless the grandson of James II. should burst out in a more propitious day, to witch the world with a revival of the heroic attributes claimed for some of Scotland's ancient line of kings.

The year 1728 is chiefly noticeable for the arrival in England of Frederick, now styled Duke of Edinburgh, but afterward Prince of Wales. In the session of parliament which commenced in January, 1729, the Commons congratulated the king upon this arrival—a congratulation which the king could have well dispensed with. At the debate upon the address the prince was present, "to satisfy a laudable curiosity with the manner of proceeding in the House of Commons."† The young heir to the crown was in a somewhat unhappy position—stinted of pecuniary means by his parsimonious father; brought up from his childhood to believe that he was to marry Wilhelmina, the pretty, clever, and accomplished Princess of Prussia, as Friedrich, Crown Prince of Prussia, was to marry the English Princess Royal. This double-marriage project was always liable to wreck upon some political rock ahead, some petty quarrel or jealousy between the royal cousins—the fidgety George, Elector of Hanover, and the fiery Friedrich Wilhelm, King of Prussia; a leaning to French and Spanish alliances on the English part, a clinging to German interests, represented by the emperor, on the Prussian part. The Prince of Wales, who had never seen his destined bride, professed to be madly enamored of her. The princess rather affected indifference, although her mother was set upon the match, and her ladies saluted her as Princess of Wales. An envoy is sent from England in 1730 to settle these nuptial projects at Berlin. Sir Charles Hotham is to insist upon the double marriage; the passionate Friedrich Wilhelm will hear only of one at the present time. The Prince of Wales writes to the envoy to get the affair finished—for he is desperately in love. Though there is much feasting and immoderate libations, the affair will not get finished. Hotham goes back to England to report his ill success. In four years Frederick, Prince of Wales, has another wife provided for him, the clever Wilhelmina having in 1731 been compelled to marry the Prince of Baireuth—a happier fate, probably, than that of keeping a petty court as Princess of Wales, the central point of opposition to the government of her husband's father.‡

In 1730 Lord Townshend and Sir Robert Walpole quarrelled; and the quarrel ending in Townsend's resignation of office, Walpole became supreme in the administration. It is related by Coxe, under the date of 1729, that a personal scuffle took place between the two ministers. The famous quarrel scene of Peachem and Lockit in the "Beggar's Opera" has been held to have been derived from this unseemly exhibition, which Lord Mahon considers to have occurred in 1730, just before Townshend's resignation. Mr. Croker has pointed out that, "as the 'Beggar's Opera' was played on the 29th of January, 1728, it is certain either that the date of the historians is an anachronism, or that Gay alluded to some earlier dispute, or that the story was made from the scene."* Lord Townshend did not conduct himself ungenerously toward his old friend and brother-in-law. He did not join the violent faction by which Walpole was assailed. He retired to the country; and by the encouragement which he gave to the turnip-husbandry he led the way to that system of cultivation which enabled the agricultural production of England to keep pace with her growing population.

The same keen critic who notices the anachronism of the quarrel scene as caricatured by Gay points out that "it is remarkable that Coxe [Life of Walpole] passes, in two lines, the period from May 1730, to January, 1733, as wholly unmarked by any public event;" and that "Lord Hervey's Memoirs make exactly the same leap."† We do not assume that history has nothing to record during this period. It is our duty to notice some matters as public events which those who chiefly deal with the grand affairs called history—rivalries of ministers, intrigues for places and honors, wonderful adjustments of the balance of power—very frequently pass over. If we dilate somewhat upon topics that have more especial reference to the progress of "the people" in material prosperity and in good government, than we have found in the complexities of the Congress of Soissons, of the Peace of Seville, and of the Treaty of Vienna—topics perhaps more useful than a minute inquiry into the equivocal relations of George II. with Lady Suffolk—we must be content to bear the reproach of a school that defines "the people" as "the lower orders." The "eminent hands" of the last century invariably denominated "the people" as "the mob;" and they have successors who divide society into "upper classes" created to govern, and "lower orders" sent into the world to obey.

The alleged leap of two years and a half in the "Memoirs" of Lord Hervey is not strictly correct. He notices, at considerable length, as occurring in the latter end of the summer of 1730, a design "projected among all the dissenters of England to petition the parliament in the next session for the repeal of the Corporation and Test Acts."‡ From Lord Hervey's official position of vice-chamberlain to the king—which he attained in May, 1730, when he left the opposition party of Pulteney, around which he had been hovering, to become the adherent of the minister whose power was now firmly established—he acquired an intimate acquaintance with the inner workings of the court life. The dissenters represented their steady support of the government on revolution principles—their unwavering adherence to the Protestant succession. Walpole could not deny their claims; but he knew the storm that would be raised if he gave them encouragement. The queen was persuaded to send for Hoadley, then Bishop of Salisbury, to persuade him that "all times were not proper to do proper things"—that the bringing forward such a measure as the repeal of the Corporation and Test Acts would still further divide the already divided Whig party—that "as the clergy had hitherto been kept quiet by a promise of everything in their province remaining as it was, so consequently, when that promise was broken, it would set all the turbulent spirits and ill-humors of that body again afloat." Hoadley declared that as he had so often given his opinion as to "the unreasonableness of these laws in a social light, and the profaneness of them theologically considered," he must always support the repeal of them; but that he would nevertheless employ his interest among the dissenters to divert "the immediate trying of this point." A report soon got abroad that the bishop had told the queen that the request of the dissenters was so unreasonable that he could not give them his support. The bishop was indignant, and urged Walpole to allow him to hold out some promise of future relief to the dissenters. Sir Robert was firm, and would give no such assurance. The adroit minister, whose power of management was ready to grapple with every difficulty, got the body of London dissenters to choose a committee. "As the honest gentlemen who composed that committee were all moneyed men of the city, and scriveners, who were absolutely dependent upon Sir Robert, and chosen by his contrivance, they spoke only as he prompted, and acted only as he guided." They were induced to meet the lord chancellor, the speaker of the House of Commons, the two secretaries of state, and Sir Robert; and these great men convinced them that, as there was no prospect of success, the present was an improper time for any application to parliament for their relief. The committee reported their negotiations to a general assembly of the London dissenters especially convened; and that assembly adopted their convictions, and communicated them to all their brethren in England. "In this manner this storm that threatened the administration from the Presbyterian party blew over." Looking at the manœuvre of Walpole, and the subserviency of his committee of dissenters, we must not altogether forget that in 1727 and 1728 acts of indemnity had been passed in favor of those who had not duly qualified for office. In 1729 such an act was intermitted; in 1730 it was renewed; in 1731 it was again intermitted. During the remainder of Walpole's administration this relief was regularly granted. With four other exceptions, in the reign of George II., the indemnity was passed every year, till the repeal of the obnoxious laws in 1828.

The parliamentary records of 1729 and 1730 present us with three reports of the select committee of the House of Commons "on the state of the gaols of this kingdom." These reports contain a minute exposure of as horrible a system of oppression and cruelty as probably ever existed in any civilized country. The inquiry was confined to the three London prisons for debtors—the Fleet, the Marshalsea, and the King's Bench. This exposure was one of the most important steps in the slow march of a just administration of the law—that step which at last arrives at the capacity to discriminate between the criminal and the unfortunate. It was the preparation for that onward progress which counts it wisdom as well as mercy not to drive the criminal out of the pale of humanity. To one man it was principally owing that these terrible abuses were dragged to light. Mr. Oglethorpe, afterward General Oglethorpe—the philanthropist whose "strong benevolence of soul" is eulogized by Pope—the accomplished veteran whose life Johnson desired to write, and for whose earnest commendation of his "London," when he was friendless and unknown, Johnson was ever grateful—was chairman of the committee that penetrated into the dismal recesses of the Fleet prison, personally to examine into the condition of the prisoners. The Fleet was an ancient prison, in which the illegal punishments of the Star Chamber had been administered without control. When that jurisdiction was abolished in the reign of Charles I. it became a prison for debtors, and for those committed for contempts by the Courts of Chancery, Exchequer, and Common Pleas. Although the statutes of the 22d and 23d of Charles II. vested the government of all prisons in the judges of the higher courts, and in justices of the peace, the warden of the Fleet enjoyed a patent office, to be purchased by a large payment to some minister of the crown. John Huggins gave 5000*l.* to Lord Clarendon for his patent; and John Huggins sold his patent for a like sum to Thomas Bambridge and Dougal Cuthbert, esquires. The committee of the House of Commons imputed the evil practices of this prison chiefly "to the venality of the warden's office." The worthy patentees had a tolerably profitable investment. By the payments of the prisoners for lodging, they made 811*l.* 4*s.* per annum; by the commitment and dismission fees, 766*l.* 18*s.* 8*d.*; by liberty of rules, 1500*l.*; by chaplain's fees, which they farmed upon a small payment to the chaplain, 813*l.* 16*s.*; by rents of various premises, 740*l.*; making a total of 4632*l.* 18*s.* 8*d.* per annum. A system of fraud and extortion was laid bare by the inquiries of the committee, which showed how impossible it was for any but the affluent prisoner to obtain the humblest lodging and the coarsest food. Those without money were handed over to "the common side," too happy if disease, engendered by filth and starvation, soon released them from their miseries. Those prisoners who refused to bear their oppressions without remonstrance were put in irons—were confined in damp and loathsome dungeons. The case of Captain John Macpheadris, who had been a flourishing merchant till the South Sea year, when, being surety to the crown for a friend, he failed, is narrated in the report of the committee with a pathos rarely excelled by writers of fiction. Macpheadris furnished a room, but refusing to pay an extravagant price for it, and offering what was legally due, "Bambridge locked the prisoner out of his room, and forced him to lie in the open yard, called the Bare. He sat quietly under his wrongs, and, getting some poor materials, built a little hut, to protect himself, as well as he could, from the injuries of the weather." Bambridge was disgusted at his "unconcernedness." He ordered his officers to pull down the little hut; he would put the culprit who dared to be "easy" into the Strong Room to-morrow. Through a rainy night the wretched man lay on the ground. But this was comfort compared to the Strong Room. Loaded with irons he continued for three weeks, without a bed, in that dungeon. The irons were so closely riveted that his torture nearly brought him to the point of death, and he became lame for life. The report of this case thus concludes: "The prisoner, upon this usage, petitioned the judges; and after several meetings, and a full hearing, the judges reprimanded Mr. Huggins and Bambridge, and declared that a gaoler could not answer the ironing of a man before he was found guilty of a crime; but it being out of term, they could not give the prisoner any relief or satisfaction." Instance upon instance of similar cruelties came before the committee. Huggins and Bambridge, with four of their agents and accomplices, were ordered by the House of Commons to be committed to Newgate, and to be prosecuted by the attorney-general. A bill was subsequently brought in to deprive Bambridge of his office. The inquiry into the prison of the Marshalsea disclosed similar enormities on the part of the keeper, who "hath arbitrarily and unlawfully loaded with irons, tortured, and destroyed, in the most cruel and barbarous manner, prisoners for debt under his care." Thumbscrews and iron skull caps were here the received instruments of torture. But the horrors of "the common side" of the Marshalsea far exceeded those of the Fleet. Three hundred and thirty prisoners were crowded into a few narrow wards; forty or fifty being locked up, through the night, in a room not sixteen feet square. If they escaped the jail distemper, famine destroyed them; for the prison allowance was insufficient to support life, and the donations of the charitable were intercepted by the scoundrels in authority. The committee saw in the women's sick ward many miserable objects lying, perishing with extreme want; and "in the men's sick ward yet much worse." The prison of the King's Bench was found exempt from the most revolting of these abuses. The Lord Chief Justice Raymond did not accept fees or presents from the marshal, and he did hear and redress the complaints of the prisoners.

In the session of parliament which commenced in January, 1731, petitions were presented to the Commons from the magistracy of the North and East Ridings of Yorkshire, complaining "That the obliging grand-jurymen at the sessions of the peace, to make their presentments in a language which few of them understood; and the suffering in any of the proceedings of the courts of justice, or in any of the transactions of the law, whereby the person or property of the subject may be affected, the use of a language not intelligible, and of a character not legible, but by the learned in the law, were great occasions of the delay of justice, and gave room to most dangerous frauds." The ancient practice of using a corrupt Latin for written pleadings had been abolished, with many other legal abuses, in the time of the commonwealth. When the restoration gave back the monarchy, with much of its inherent good and a considerable portion of its trappings of evil, it was held wise and reverential to restore the old law language. During five reigns the people had borne this mischievous absurdity. Lord Chancellor King, the son of an Exeter grocer—one of "the people"—saw the necessity of attending to the prayer of the Yorkshire petitions. He directed a bill to be introduced in the House of Commons to enact "That all proceedings in courts of justice shall be in the English language." The bill was passed, after some opposition, such as is always at hand to resist what is dreaded as "innovation." In the House of Lords the judges, speaking through the lord chief-justice, were decidedly against the change—difficulties would arise in translating the law out of Latin into English; lawsuits would be multiplied, in regard to the interpretation of English words. The Duke of Argyle contended that our prayers were in our native tongue that they might be intelligible, and why should not the laws, wherein our lives and properties are concerned. The complaint came from "the people"—from magistrates, from jurymen. There never was a period in our history, even in the darkest times, in which the remonstrances of the middle classes against prescriptive abuses were not faithfully seconded by some of an aristocracy that did not stand, as a caste, apart from "the people." The bill passed; and the Lords added a clause to provide that records and other documents should be written in a plain legible hand, such as that in which acts of parliament are engrossed. The tenacity with which some minds, even of a high order, cling to custom and precedent, is shown in the lament of Blackstone that the old Law Latin was disused. Lord Campbell adds, "I have heard the late Lord Ellenborough, from the bench, regret the change, on the ground that it has had the tendency to make attorneys illiterate." There were two other complaints in the Yorkshire petitions which required the labor of a century to redress: "That special pleadings, by their intricacy and dilatoriness, rendered the prosecution of the rights of the subject difficult and expensive; that the recovery of small debts, as the law then stood, was impracticable."

The king, in opening the fifth session of parliament in 1732, adverted to the foreign policy by which peace had been secured, and the consequent ease which his subjects enjoyed. "This happy situation of affairs, I promise myself, will inspire you all with such temper and unanimity, and such a seasonable zeal for the public good, as becomes a parliament sensible of the great blessings they enjoy." It was not probable that the royal recommendation of temper and unanimity would have much influence upon the violent spirit of party. There was a strong opposition to the address, in which Pulteney took the lead. The great opponent of Walpole was not likely to be in a placid mood. In the summer of 1731 his name had been struck out of the list of privy councillors by the king's own hand, and he was removed from all commissions of the peace. At that period the war of pamphlets and periodical works was conducted as fiercely by Bolingbroke and Pulteney as in the day when Swift headed the great battle against the Whigs. The organ of Walpole's bitter assailants was "The Craftsman." Pulteney had been visited with the anger of the court, for publishing a private conversation between Walpole and himself, in which the king's minister had spoken very freely of his present master when Prince of Wales. Neither of these rivals hesitated to violate the confidence of familiar intercourse in their party quarrels. In the attacks upon Walpole the license used was such as gentlemen of a later period would disdain to employ. The great minister was nicknamed "Sir Blue String," "Sir Robert Brass," "Iago." Caricatures, issuing from the "Craftsman's" publisher, set forth "Robin's Reign." He was "the harlequin of state"—Satan's minister. Franklin, the printer of the "Craftsman," was convicted of a libel. The mob huzzaed Pulteney, who had attended the trial. Never was such a season of quarrel and scandal. Lord Hervey and Pulteney fought a duel about an article in the "Craftsman," which is gone to the region of all worthless effusions of party spite. Pope libelled Lord Hervey in a character which, for its brutal virulence, must ever be execrated, but which for its concentration of all the powers of satire will never be forgotten. As the supporter of Walpole in the House of Commons—as the confidential intimate of Queen Caroline—Hervey is thus delineated:

> "Whether in florid impotence he speaks,
> And, as the prompter breathes, the puppet squeaks;
> Or, at the ear of Eve, familiar toad,
> Half froth, half venom, spits himself abroad,
> In puns, or politics, or tales, or lies,
> Or spite, or smut, or rhymes, or blasphemies." *

A pleasant world to live in, for statesmen and authors!

The parliamentary history of 1732, imperfectly as the debates are reported, give us some notion not altogether inadequate of the vigor which characterized a British House of Commons, at a period of a strong government encountered by a powerful opposition. To us, who have escaped some of the dangers to the constitution which were then predicted by those whom Walpole contemptuously termed "patriots and boys," denunciations such as those of Pulteney against standing armies may appear trite and juvenile. Nevertheless, we cannot but admire the spirit which called them forth, when we look around, even at this day, upon other states. "The nations around us," said Pulteney, "are already enslaved, and have been enslaved by those very means. By means of their standing armies they have every one lost their liberties." That is true now, as it was true then. But when he goes on to say that "it is impossible that the liberties of the people can be preserved in any country where a numerous standing army is kept up," we ask, How has England preserved its liberties with a standing army? The answer is at hand. England never lost the safeguard of a free expression of public opinion. Vain were the attempts to prevent the publication of proceedings in parliament. In 1729 Mr. Raikes, of Gloucester, was ordered to attend at the bar of the Commons, upon a complaint that he had printed speeches purporting to have been delivered in that house; and it was unanimously resolved, "that it is an indignity to, and a breach of the privileges of, this house, for any person to presume to give, in written or printed newspapers, any account or minutes of the debates, or other proceedings of this house, or of any committee thereof; and that upon the discovery of the authors, printers, or publishers, this house will proceed against the offenders with the utmost severity." In 1738 William Pulteney, whose memory is of small historical value if disconnected with what we have learned of his speeches in parliament, was eager to join in that most solemn resolution against any publication of the debates, which compelled the use of fictitious names in "Debates in the Senate of Great Lilliput"—a device which Johnson made so famous in the "Gentleman's Magazine." The jealousy with which parliamentary privilege was guarded made even "patriots" insensible to the value of a power of influencing public opinion legitimately through the press, instead of by the publication of virulent personal attacks upon the party opposed to them. Pulteney dreaded that the publication of speeches in parliament, even if they were not misrepresented, would look very like making members "accountable without doors for what they say within." The boldness of Sir William Wyndham might have contributed to the eagerness of all parties to debate without publicity. "I don't know but what the people have a right to know what their representatives are doing," said the stanch old Tory.

The financial measures of Walpole—although the sober judgment of later times does not condemn them in the unmeasured manner in which they were denounced by his contemporaries as arbitrary and unjust—had in some cases more regard to the strengthening of his government than to the statesman's obligation to raise supplies in the manner least oppressive to the national industry. His great object was to propitiate the country party. In 1732 he revived the salt duty, which, only two years before, had been held to be injurious, and was abolished by statute. In proposing the revival of a tax, which he contended was the most just because the most general, he made it perfectly understood that the tax to which the poorest laborer would contribute what was deemed a trifle, was to relieve the proprietors of estates from the necessity of paying a land-tax of two shillings in the pound instead of one shilling. He calculated that if the population consisted of eight millions, and the sum of 230,250*l.* were raised by a salt tax, it would not amount to sevenpence a head. There were men in the House of Commons who saw the fallacy of this argument—who told the minister that he was about to injure the agriculture and manufactures of the country by imposing a duty upon an article of essential importance in the operations of industry. Pulteney truly said, "If any of our neighbors can sell but one tenth part of a farthing in a yard cheaper than we can do, they will at last turn us entirely out of the business. This holds as to all our manufactures in general, but as to some particular manufactures, such as glass, leather, earthenware, it is still more grievous. I find it is granted by all, that the making use of salt is an improvement to land." We cannot be surprised that these arguments were of no avail in the days of George II. when we look back upon their fruitless repetition for nearly a century, during which period the importance of salt in the arts had increased a hundredfold. In what condition would be our manufacturing industry if salt were now taxed as it was taxed in the reign of George IV.?

Walpole carried his revived salt duty by a majority of only thirty-eight. The most popular argument against the government was that this measure was a step toward a general excise. "Every excise," said Pulteney, "is a general excise, if the whole body of the people, the poor, the needy, the most wretched, are obliged to contribute thereto. . . . If this be granted, and tamely submitted to by the people, it may be an encouragement to ambitious and wicked ministers in future times to proceed a step farther, and lay another excise upon some other commodity used by the generality of the people; that again will give encouragement to a third attempt, and so on; till at last the people of this country be subjected, as well as some of our neighbors, to a general excise in the most extensive sense; that is, an excise upon every person, and almost every thing that can be converted to the use of man." Walpole certainly could not have calculated what would be the effect of such a cry as this, sent through the country, however imperfect the means of publicity. In the session of parliament which commenced in January, 1733, such a storm was raised by the very name of excise as went nigh to shake the monarchy to its foundations.

The first imposition of a tax known as excise was by the parliament after the commencement of the civil war. Beer, ale, cider, and perry were so taxed in 1645. The Royalists raised money by a similar tax. These duties were continued at the restoration, with additional imposts on the new luxuries of tea and coffee. In the reign of James II. there was a temporary excise upon wine, vinegar, tobacco, and sugar. In the reign of William, salt, malt, and distilled liquors were thus taxed. The customs duties on tobacco, tea, brandy, and wine, although very productive to the revenue, were diminished by frauds of enormous magnitude. A committee of the House of Commons reported, in 1732, that in the article of tobacco alone the government was defrauded of one third of the import duties, by perjury, forgery, and collusion. The smuggling of tea and brandy was conducted with such systematic violence by gangs of armed men that from 1723 to 1732 two hundred and fifty custom-house officers had been beaten and abused, and six had been murdered. The prosecutions of persons concerned in the illicit trade had amounted to two thousand. The plan of Walpole had chiefly in view the prevention of these frauds and outrages. The warehousing system upon goods imported was not then in existence. The merchant had to pay his duties at once at the custom-house upon the arrival of the cargo. Walpole proposed that the duties upon wine and tobacco should be inland duties; that the imports should be warehoused, and removed from time to time by permit, upon due payment; that the retail dealers in the articles so taxed should come under the same excise laws. Before Walpole proposed his scheme an outcry was raised, in parliament and out of parliament, an outcry of which Johnson's celebrated definition of "excise" is a faint echo: "A hateful tax levied upon commodities, and adjudged, not by common judges of property, but by wretches hired by those to whom excise is paid." On the 14th of March Sir Robert brought forward his plan. He denied that he had ever intended a general excise. The shameful frauds upon the revenue with reference to the duties on wine and tobacco had induced him to propose that these duties should come under the laws of excise. The gross produce of the customs upon tobacco was 750,000*l.* The complicated frauds, such as arose out of drawbacks, reduced the net receipts to 160,000*l.* By changing the mode of collection the revenue would be so increased that he should be able wholly to abolish the land-tax. Such a proposal does not appear so tyrannical as to drive a people to madness. The actual duties were not to be increased by their collection as inland duties. Warehouses and shops were to be entered at the Inland Office, and were liable to be searched by the officers of revenue; but the officers of customs possessed a like power of search. Yet Wyndham declared that "in all countries excises of every kind are looked upon as badges of slavery;" and he suggested the warning example of the "two noted ways-and-means men," Empson and Dudley, who administered to the insatiable desire for money of their master, Henry VII., but who met their reward when their master's son took off both their heads when he came to the throne. The allusion was palpable; for the Prince of Wales sat under the gallery. Pulteney exclaimed that the inscription on Sir Robert Walpole's tomb should be, "This is the man who would have enslaved his country by an excise." Round the door of the House of Commons an extraordinary concourse of people was assembled. Walpole intimated that such a multitude had been assembled by the influence of magnates of the city: "Gentlemen may give them what name they think fit; it may be said that they came hither as humble supplicants, but I know whom the law calls sturdy beggars." The imprudent phrase was never forgotten. It was bandied about that night in the lobby; and when Sir Robert was leaving the house, after having carried his motion by a majority of sixty-one, he was roughly assailed, and was saved from injury by the interposition of Mr. Pelham.

For three weeks the Excise Bill was debated fiercely at every stage. The ministerial majority gradually dwindled. The ferment throughout the country, stimulated by pamphlets and ballads, alarmingly increased. Tindal, a looker-on, says, "The public was so heated with papers and pamphlets that matters rose next to a rebellion." There were greater dangers to the government than ordinary riots, which appeared imminent. Lord Scarborough told the queen that he would answer for his regiment against the pretender, but not against the opposers of the excise. The same nobleman said to Walpole, two days before the day appointed for the second reading of the bill, that "the soldiers had got a notion that it would raise the price of tobacco, and upon this notion were so universally set against the scheme that they cursed the administration and the parliament, murmured treason even under the walls of the palace, and were almost as ripe for mutiny as the nation for rebellion." * Lord Hervey relates that Sir Robert, when the clamor was at its height, told the king and queen that there was only one of two courses to be pursued—either that the bill should be dropped or that the author of it should resign. The king and queen both assured their minister that they would never forsake him, and that they would stand or fall together. On the 10th of April the petition of the city was presented to the House of Commons, attended by the citizens in a train of coaches that reached from Temple Bar to Westminster. The petitioners prayed to be heard by counsel against the bill. Such a concession in the matter of a tax before the house was contrary to its rules and orders; yet the demand was rejected only by a majority of seventeen. Walpole felt that this was a defeat. "He stood some time after the house was up, leaning against the table, with his hat pulled over his eyes, some few friends with melancholy countenances round him; while his enemies, with the gayety of so many bridegrooms, seemed as just entering upon the enjoyment of what they had been so long pursuing." † After the debate Sir Robert assembled about a dozen of his friends at supper. He told them gayly, "This dance it will no farther go; and to-morrow I intend to sound a retreat." On the 11th Walpole proposed in the Commons that the second reading of the bill should be deferred for two months. This was carried without a division. As Sir Robert passed through the lobby this night there was a serious scuffle between the multitude and the civil power; and the portly minister had a narrow escape from being trampled to death amid friends and foes. Universal was the rejoicing at the defeat of the government measure. Bonfires and illuminations lighted up every town. Cockades were worn, inscribed "Liberty, property, and no excise." The court and the ministry were revenged upon some of the great household officers, whose connections had voted against the measure, by dismissing the lukewarm friends from their employments. Colonels were deprived of their regiments for their obnoxious votes—a practice unjustifiable, but which was not laid aside even in the reign of George III. In the next session, when the dealers in tea petitioned against the excise regulations of an act of George I., and Pulteney suggested that "the wicked scheme of an honorable gentleman" might not yet be laid aside, Walpole thus replied: "As to the wicked scheme, as the gentleman is pleased to call it, which he would persuade gentlemen is not yet laid aside, I, for my own part, can assure this house, I am not so mad as ever again to engage in anything that looks like an excise, though in my own private opinion I still think it was a scheme that would have tended very much to the interest of the nation."

The last session of the parliament chosen in 1727 was opened by the king on the 17th of January, 1734. The policy of a government anxious to maintain neutrality while other nations were at war, and at the same time to make it understood that a strong desire for peace was no symptom of national weakness, was never more emphatically expressed than in the words which Walpole put into the mouth of George II. A new quarrel had broken out in Europe upon the death, in 1733, of Augustus II., King of Poland. Austria and Russia advocated the succession of his son. France supported the election of Stanislaus, who had been king before Augustus. The war assumed a more general character, and revived some of the old disputes between France, Spain, and Austria. An army of French, Spaniards, and Sardinians overran Austria. Lombardy, Naples, and Sicily were invaded by Don Carlos, Duke of Parma, the son of the Queen of Spain; and the Austrians being unable to resist, he was crowned King of Naples and Sicily as Charles III. On the Rhine the war was conducted by Prince Eugene, still vigorous, against Marshal Berwick. The son of James II. was killed at the siege of Philipsburg. The companion-in-arms of Marlborough held his ground in this campaign, and died two years after. Under the circumstances, which we can only thus briefly indicate, the King of England wisely spoke to his parliament: "The war, which is now begun, and carried on against the emperor, with so much vigor, by the united powers of France, Spain, and Sardinia, is become the object of the care and attention of all Europe; and though I am no ways engaged in it, and have had no part, except by my good offices, in those transactions, which have been declared to be the principal causes and motives of it, I cannot sit regardless of the present events, or be unconcerned for the future consequences, of a war undertaken and supported by so powerful an alliance. . . . The resolutions of the British parliament, in so nice a juncture, are of too great moment not to be carefully attended to, and impatiently expected, by all, and not the least by those who will hope to take advantage from your determinations, whatever they shall be, and to turn them to the prejudice of this kingdom. It must therefore be thought most safe and prudent thoroughly to weigh and consider all circumstances before we come to a final determination. As I shall have, in all my considerations upon this great and important affair, the strictest regard to the honor of my crown and to the good of my people, and be governed by no other views, I can make no doubt but that I may entirely depend on the support and assistance of my parliament, without exposing myself, by any precipitate declarations, to such inconveniences as ought, as far as possible, to be avoided. In the mean time I am persuaded you will make such provisions as shall secure my kingdoms, rights, and possessions, from all dangers and insults, and maintain the respect due to the British nation. Whatever part it may in the end be most reasonable for us to act, it will, in all views, be necessary, when all Europe is preparing for arms, to put ourselves in a proper posture of defence."

The great merit of Sir Robert Walpole, in resolutely maintaining the policy of neutrality, may be better appreciated from the circumstance that the king and queen were opposed to his pacific views. George used daily to tell his minister "that it was with the sword alone he desired to keep the balance of Europe. He could not bear the thought of growing old in peace, and rusting in the cabinet, while other princes were busied in war, and shining in the field." * The observant vice-chamberlain says that the queen, with all her good sense, was as unmanageable as the king. "Wherever the interest of Germany and the honor of the empire were concerned, her thoughts and reasonings were often as German and Imperial as if England had been out of the question." † The perseverance of Walpole had its reward. He was odious at Vienna; but before the end of the summer of 1734 George said to his minister, "I have followed your advice, Walpole, in keeping quiet, contrary often to my own opinion, and sometimes I have thought contrary even to my honor, but I am convinced you advised me well." ‡ The king had discovered that overtures of friendship from all parties had been the result of the pacific policy of his minister; that as a possible mediator he was of more importance than as a rash belligerent. Walpole continuing firm in maintaining the neutrality of England, in conjunction with the States-General, the emperor sent an emissary to London, to intrigue with some members of the opposition against the prime minister. Sir Robert detected the Austrian agent, and the Abbé Strickland, Bishop of Namur, was obliged to depart, although he had been graciously received at court. The pacific minister had an argument for the king and queen, which sounds like insular selfishness, but which insular common-sense will always applaud: "There are fifty thousand men slain this year in Europe, and not one Englishman." Under the mediation of England and Holland, peace was concluded in 1735. By this pacification France added Lorraine to her territory. This acquisition, it has been argued even of late years, "disturbed the balance of Europe to a degree that Europe never has recovered." We are told that "as a general question, it cannot be doubted that Austria is a natural ally of England, because France has been, and always must be, the most formidable enemy to both." §

The repeal of the Septennial Act was the great domestic question of this session. The party that advocated a return to triennial parliaments would possess the superior popularity in the coming elections. No doubt many who now opposed the government upon this measure would be open to the charge of inconsistency; for "Whig patriots," especially Pulteney, had supported the Septennial Act of 1716. Bolingbroke, the arch-enemy of Walpole, was at hand to combat every scruple of conscience, and induce the listeners to his sophistries to believe that political tergiversation was a virtue. The prime minister must be struck down, and for that purpose any weapon was lawful. In the debate upon this constitutional question Sir William Wyndham, the great Tory chief, made an attack upon Walpole, which Walpole treated as the inspiration of Bolingbroke. Over the parliamentary bitterness of adverse factions oblivion mercifully spreads her veil in most cases. But in this case, the portrait of Walpole drawn by Wyndham, and the portrait of Bolingbroke drawn by Walpole, are masterpieces of invective, which take us into the very heart of those days when the right honorable member in the blue ribbon had to endure the taunts of his adversaries with rare equanimity, or to turn upon them like a noble animal at bay, as he did upon this memorable occasion.

There has been a call of the house. The debate has been proceeding during several hours. Sir William Barnard, the Whig member for London, has spoken for the repeal with that strong sense which Walpole always acknowledged as more difficult for him to answer than the declamation of Pulteney, Lyttelton, or Pitt. Sir William Wyndham rises in reply to Sir William Yonge. He goes through all the arguments against the Septennial Act with the adroitness of a ready debater. At the close of his speech he rises to a height of eloquence which scarcely belongs to his parliamentary character: "We have been told, sir, in this house, that no faith is to be given to prophecies, therefore I shall not pretend to prophesy; but I may suppose a case, which, though it has not yet happened, may possibly happen. Let us then suppose, sir, a man abandoned to all notions of virtue or honor, of no great family, and of but a mean fortune, raised to be chief minister of state by the concurrence of many whimsical events; afraid or unwilling to trust any but creatures of his own making, and most of them equally abandoned to all notions of virtue or honor; ignorant of the true history of his country, and consulting nothing but that of enriching and aggrandizing himself and his favorites; in foreign affairs, trusting none but those whose education makes it impossible for them to have such knowledge or such qualifications as can either be of service to their country, or give any weight or credit to their negotiations. Let us suppose the true interest of the nation, by such means, neglected or misunderstood; her honor and credit lost; her trade insulted; her merchants plundered; and her sailors murdered; and all these things overlooked, only for fear his administration should be endangered. Suppose him, next, possessed of great wealth, the plunder of the nation, with a parliament of his own choosing, most of their seats purchased, and their votes bought at the expense of the public treasure. In such a parliament, let us suppose attempts made to inquire into his conduct, or to relieve the nation from the distress he has brought upon it; and when lights proper for attaining those ends are called for, not perhaps for the information of the particular gentlemen who call for them, but because nothing can be done in a parliamentary way, till these things be in a proper way laid before parliament; suppose these lights refused, these reasonable requests rejected, by a corrupt majority of his creatures, whom he retains in daily pay, or engages in his particular interest, by granting them those posts and places which ought never to be given to any but for the good of the public. Upon this scandalous victory, let us suppose this chief minister pluming himself in defiances, because he finds he has got a parliament, like a packed jury, ready to acquit him at all adventures. Let us further suppose him arrived to that degree of insolence and arrogance as to domineer over all the men of ancient families, all the men of sense, figure, or fortune in the nation, and, as he has no virtue of his own, ridiculing it in others, and endeavoring to destroy or corrupt it in all. I am still not prophesying, sir, I am only supposing; and the case I am going to suppose I hope never will happen. But with such a minister and such a parliament, let us suppose a prince upon the throne, either for want of true information or for some other reason, ignorant and unacquainted with the inclinations and the interest of his people; weak, and hurried away by unbounded ambition and insatiable avarice. This case, sir, has never yet happened in this nation. I hope, I say, it will never exist. But as it is possible it may, could there any greater curse happen to a nation than such a prince on the throne, advised, and solely advised, by such a minister, and that minister supported by such a parliament."

Pelham has spoken against the motion, and Pulteney has argued briefly and feebly for it. The speaker, Onslow, calls upon Sir Robert Walpole. All eyes turn eagerly to look upon the man who calmly rises to say that he did not intend to trouble the house in this debate, but as pictures of imaginary persons had been drawn, he hoped he might be allowed to draw a picture in his turn: "Now, sir, let me too suppose, and the house being cleared, I am sure that no one that hears me can come within the description of the person I am to suppose. Let us suppose in this, or in some other unfortunate country, an anti-minister, who thinks himself a person of so great and extensive parts, and of so many eminent qualifications, that he looks upon himself as the only person in the kingdom capable to conduct the public affairs of the nation; and therefore christening every other gentleman who has the honor to be employed in the administration by the name of Blunderer. Suppose this fine gentleman, lucky enough to have gained over to his party some persons really of fine parts, of ancient families, and of great fortunes, and others of desperate views, arising from disappointed and malicious hearts; all these gentlemen, with respect to their political behavior, moved by him, and by him solely; all they say, either in private or public, being only a repetition of the words he has put into their mouths, and a spitting out of that venom which he has infused into them; and yet we may suppose this leader not really liked by any, even of those who so blindly follow him, and hated by all the rest of mankind. We will suppose this anti-minister to be in a country where he really ought not to be, and where he could not have been but by an effect of too much goodness and mercy; yet endeavoring, with all his might and with all his art, to destroy the fountain from whence that mercy flowed. In that country suppose him continually contracting friendships and familiarities with the ambassadors of those princes who at the time happen to be most at enmity with his own; and if at any time it should happen to be for the interest of any of those foreign ministers to have a secret divulged to them, which might be highly prejudicial to his native country, as well as to all its friends; suppose this foreign minister applying to him, and he answering, 'I will get it you; tell me but what you want, I will endeavor to procure it for you.' Upon this he puts a speech or two in the mouths of some of his creatures, or some of his new converts. What he wants is moved for in parliament, and when so very reasonable a request as this is refused, suppose him and his creatures and tools, by his advice, spreading the alarm over the whole nation, and crying out, 'Gentlemen, our country is at present involved in many dangerous difficulties, all of which we would have extricated you from, but a wicked minister and a corrupt majority refused us the proper materials.' And upon this 'scandalous victory,' this minister became so insolent as 'to plume himself in defiances!' Let us further suppose this anti-minister to have travelled, and at every court where he was, thinking himself the greatest minister, and making it his trade to betray the secrets of every court where he had before been; void of all faith or honor, and betraying every master he ever served. I could carry my suppositions a great deal farther, and I may say I mean no person now in being; but if we can suppose such a one, can there be imagined a greater disgrace to human nature than such a wretch as this?"

The session was closed on the 16th of April, and on the 18th the parliament was dissolved. The boldness with which Walpole had stood up against attack had produced a sensible effect upon his adversaries. To Walpole's philippic against Bolingbroke has been attributed the resolution of that most able but dangerous man to leave England and English politics. This view is perhaps overstrained. But he was a disappointed intriguer. He retired to France. "My part is over," he said, "and he who remains on the stage after his part is over deserves to be hissed off."

CHAPTER CLII.

New parliament of 1735—Peace of Vienna—The Gin Act—The Porteous riots—Parliamentary proceedings on these riots—Unpopularity of the king—Marriage of the Prince of Wales—Royal animosities—Birth of a princess—Illness of Queen Caroline—Death of Queen Caroline.

THE first session of the new parliament, which met in January, 1735, was prolonged only till May. The king announced his determination to visit his dominions in Germany, and the queen was appointed regent. George was sorely tempted to engage in the war by an offer of the command of the imperial army on the Rhine. Walpole had foreseen such a possible flattery of the king's military ambition, and had prepared him to say that he could not appear at the head of an army as King of England, and not have an Englishman to fight under him.* The summer passed without any important military operations. On the 22d of October the king returned from Hanover—according to Lord Hervey in very bad temper, and dissatisfied with everything English. His majesty had left a lady in Hanover, Madame Walmoden, to whom he wrote by every post. Soon after his return the preliminaries of a general peace were signed at Vienna. Europe would be at rest again for four years. "The happy turn which the affairs of Europe had taken" was announced at the opening of parliament in January, 1736. The tranquillity of England and Scotland was seriously disturbed in this season of foreign pacification.

On the 20th of February a petition against the excessive use of spirituous liquors was presented to the House of Commons from the justices of peace for Middlesex. The drinking of geneva, it was alleged, had excessively increased, among the people of inferior rank; the constant and excessive use of distilled spirituous liquors had already destroyed thousands, and rendered great numbers of others unfit for labor, debauching their morals, and driving them into every vice. Upon the motion of Sir Joseph Jekyll it was proposed to lay a tax of twenty shillings a gallon upon gin, and to require that every retailer should take out an annual license costing £50. Walpole gave no distinct support to this measure, nor did he oppose it. He saw that a greatly reduced consumption of spirituous liquors would affect the revenue; that a high duty would produce less than a low duty; and he therefore proposed that £70,000 which had been appropriated to the civil list from the smaller duties on spirits should be guaranteed, if the prohibitory rate were adopted. Pulteney opposed the bill altogether, upon the principle that he had heard of sumptuary laws by which certain sorts of apparel had been forbidden to persons of inferior rank, but that he had never before heard of a sumptuary law by which any sort of victuals or drink were forbidden to be made use of by persons of a low degree. Yet the magnitude of the evil certainly warranted some strong legislative measure. It was stated that within the bills of mortality there were twenty thousand houses for retailing spirituous liquors. Sudden deaths from excessive gin-drinking were continually reported in the newspapers. The extent of this vice was too obvious to allow the arguments against the impossibility of preventing evasion of the duties to have much weight. Compliance with the statute was to be enforced by the machinery of the common informer. So the bill was passed, and was to come into operation after the 29th of September. On that day the signs of the liquor-shops were put in mourning. Hooting mobs assembled round the dens where they could no longer get "drunk for a penny and dead-drunk for twopence." The last rag was pawned to carry off a cheap quart or gallon of the beloved liquor. As was foreseen, the act was evaded. Hawkers sold a colored mixture in the streets, and pretended chemists opened shops for the sale of "Cholick-water." Fond, playful names, such as "Tom Row," "Make Shift," "The Ladies' Delight," "The Baulk," attracted customers to the old haunts. Informers were rolled in the mud, or pumped upon, or thrown into the Thames. Gin riots were constantly taking place for several years. "The Fall of Bob" was the theme of ballad and broadside, which connected the minister with "Desolation, or the Fall of Gin."† The impossibility of preventing by prohibitory duties the sale of a commodity in large request was strikingly exemplified in this gin-struggle. It became necessary in 1743, when the consumption of gin had positively increased, to reduce the excessive duty. A ludicrous example of one of the abortive attempts at minute legislation is exhibited in a rejected clause of the act of 1736. In the wish to protect the sugar-colonies by encouraging the consumption of rum, it was proposed to exempt punch-houses from the operation of the Gin Act, provided the agreeable liquor so retailed was made of one third spirit and two thirds water, at the least, so mixed in the presence of the buyer. If the liquor were stronger than what sailors call "two-water grog," the tippler might pay for his bowl by laying an information.

The Porteous tragedy of Edinburgh in 1736 has become the property of romance. One writer appears to think that the function of the historian has been superseded by that of the novelist. "The tale of the Porteous riot scarcely needs telling, for it has been told by Sir Walter Scott in one of the best and most read of the exquisite Waverley novels."* The judicious historian of "England from the Peace of Utrecht" approaches the subject apologetically. "Some years back the real events might have excited interest; but the wand of an enchanter is now waved over us. . . . How dull and lifeless will not the true facts appear when no longer embellished by the touching sorrows of Effie or the heroic virtue of Jeanie Deans!"† Possibly. But "the real events," "the true facts," have a significance which the writer of fiction does not always care to dwell upon. They strikingly illustrate the condition of society. They are essentially connected with the history of public events which preceded them, and of public events which came after. They illustrate the policy of the government and the temper of the governed. We cannot pass them over or deal with them slightingly. They form the subject of very important parliamentary proceedings in 1737, which are necessary to the proper understanding of the relations between England and Scotland. An impartial review in this, as in most other cases, is as much to be aimed at as a picturesque narrative.

Smuggling in England, as we have seen, had been long carried on to an enormous extent. The seafaring population were accustomed to look upon many gainful adventures as lawful and innocent which we now regard as criminal. The slave-trade, with all its odious cruelties, was a regular mercantile undertaking. Buccaneering in the South Seas was a just assertion of the rights of the British flag. The contraband trade in brandy, tea, and tobacco, was a laudable endeavor to sell their countrymen goods at a cheap rate bought in a fair market. But the principle of smuggling was not recognized as a national benefit. The merchant was opposed to it. The wealthy consumer had conscientious scruples against encouraging it. In Scotland the nation, with the exception of a few flourishing trading communities, abetted smuggling, and regarded smugglers as useful members of society. In a report attributed to Duncan Forbes, it is said, "The smuggler was the favorite. His prohibited or high-duty goods were run ashore by the boats of whatever part of the coast he came near. When ashore, they were guarded by the country from the custom-house officer. If seized, they were rescued; and if any seizure was returned, and tried, the juries seldom failed to find for the defendant."‡ Mr. Burton points out the difference in the circumstances of England and Scotland which made the principle of equality of taxation odious; and emphatically says, "For more than half a century after the union, English fiscal burdens were as unbearable to the Scots as they would be to the Norwegians at the present day." Mr. Patrick Lyndsay, the member for Edinburgh, in a remarkable speech in the House of Commons on the subject of the Porteous riot, said, "I must beg leave to explain the source of these late disorders that have given so much trouble to the legislature. The pernicious practice of smuggling, prejudicial to the fair trader, and so hurtful to the common and general good of the nation, has prevailed but too much in that country, as well as in this. Whoever may be the importers and proprietors of run goods, it is most certain that the lowest class of men, the dregs of the people, those persons who compose mobs, are the persons employed in the running of these goods; and they get so much more by their illicit trade than they can by honest labor, that they neglect their labor for the sake of this vile and destructive trade."§ Mr. Lyndsay did not hesitate to say—for which boldness he was called to account by a portion of his constituents—that some high-church Presbyterians, "who assert and maintain an absolute independency on the civil power," and taught that any statute "is iniquity established by law," indirectly encouraged the outrages of "men of weak understanding and strong passions."

The small seaports on the coast of Fife were more remarkable than any other districts of the wide and ill-defended seaboard of Scotland, as the haunts of the most daring bands of systematic smugglers. Two such persons, named Wilson and Robertson, having had some goods seized by the officers of revenue, entered with two associates the custom-house of Pittenween, and when the collector fled, carried off a large sum of money. Wilson and Robertson were apprehended, were tried, and were sentenced to death. Mr. Lyndsay related that Wilson maintained, to the last moment, that he was unjustly condemned. "He admitted," to one of the reverend ministers of Edinburgh, "that he had taken money from a collector of the revenue by violence; that he did it because he knew no other way of coming at it; that the officers of the revenue had by their practice taught him this was lawful, for they had often seized and carried off his goods by violence; and so long as they had goods of greater value in their hands than all the money he took from them, they were still in his debt, and he had done no wrong." * There can be no doubt that the mob of Edinburgh, and many above the mob, took the same view of Wilson's offence, and held the same opinion about revenue laws.

The attempt of Wilson and Robertson to escape from the Tolbooth of Edinburgh, when Wilson, a bulky man, stuck fast in the iron bars of his cell, is as well known as any of the adventures of Jack Sheppard. His generous effort to save his comrade after the condemned sermon in the Tolbooth church has redeemed his memory from the ignominy of the common malefactor. Surrounded by four keepers, Wilson held two with his hands and a third with his teeth, while Robertson knocked down the fourth and escaped. This heroism made Wilson's own fate certain. He was executed on the 14th of April, while the populace looked on with stern compassion. No attempt at rescue was made, for the place of execution was not only surrounded by the city guard but by a detachment of the Welsh fusiliers. After the body was taken down a rush was made to seize it from the hangman. The populace then attacked the city guard, who were under the command of John Porteous, their captain. Porteous was a man of strong passions, very often brought into conflict with the blackguards of the city, and now in peculiarly ill-temper from his dignity being interfered with by the unusual presence of a military force called to assist in keeping the peace. He is said to have fired himself; he certainly ordered his gendarmerie to fire upon the people. Several persons were killed or wounded. The fusiliers also fired; but in firing above the heads of the mob they hit several who were lookers-on from the adjacent windows. Porteous was brought to trial in July, before the High Court of Justiciary, on a charge of murder, for having caused the death of citizens without authority from the civil magistrate. He was convicted, and sentenced to capital punishment; but his conduct being considered by the council of regency in London as an act of self-defence, he was reprieved by the English secretary of state. His execution had been fixed by the authorities of Edinburgh for the 8th of September. The news of the reprieve produced a sensation that foreboded mischief.

The 8th of September fell on a Wednesday. A report had gone forth that some tumult would take place on that day, when the populace, being disappointed of a legal sacrifice to their revenge, would attempt some daring act against Porteous. This was deemed a foolish story; but the Lord Provost of Edinburgh took some precautions to resist any outrage on that Wednesday.† Porteous himself had no fears. A Scottish clergyman, Mr. Yates, had preached in the Tolbooth church, Porteous being present, on Sunday, the 5th; and he afterward saw Porteous, and told him of the report, and advised him to be cautious about admitting persons to his room. Porteous slighted his information, and said, "were he once at liberty, he was so little apprehensive of the people that he would not fear to walk at the cross of Edinburgh with only his cane in his hand as usual." ‡

The Tolbooth of the Scottish capital, like most other places of confinement, had its feasts for those who could pay, and its starvation for those who were destitute. On the evening of Tuesday, the 7th of September, Porteous was surrounded by a jolly party, draining the punch-bowl in toasting the speedy liberation of their friend. There was another remarkable festal assembly in Edinburgh that night. Mr. Lind, captain of the city guard, deposed that, "being informed that the mob was gathering, he went to Clark's tavern, where the provost was drinking with Mr. Bur and other officers of his majesty's ship the Dreadnought, then stationed in the road of Leith; and upon acquainting him with the danger, the provost desired him to go immediately back, and draw out his men, and that he would instantly follow him, and put himself at the head of the guard to face the mob." * The mob was quicker than the provost or his captain. They had disarmed the guard, had taken possession of the guard-house, and were arming themselves with muskets, halberds, and Lochaber axes, which they there found. Edinburgh had suddenly fallen into the complete possession of a lawless multitude. The city walls on the east and south sides had gates, which, after sunset, were shut and guarded. The mob had secured the Westport, the Cowgate, and the Netherbow-port, nailing them up, and barricading them, to prevent military aid coming from the suburbs. A loch closed the city on the north. On the west was the castle, from which the garrison might have descended upon the high street. In the Canongate was a regiment under the command of Major-General Moyle. It was given in evidence that the provost, when he sallied forth from his tavern, requested Mr. Lyndsay to carry a verbal order to Major-General Moyle to send a force to his aid. The member for Edinburgh executed his commission, but the general, seeing how a jury of Edinburgh had convicted a military officer of murder, when he acted without explicit orders from the civil magistrate, refused to move upon receiving only a verbal message. The governor of the castle did not choose to act on his own responsibility. Thus secure, the multitude went about their work with a calm resolution which was long attributed to an organization proceeding from leaders much above the ordinary directors of mobs. No point was neglected. Magistrates rushed out to ring the alarm bell; the tower in which the bell hung was in the possession of the insurgents. Onward they marched, in numbers rapidly increasing, to the Tolbooth. Here they make a solemn demand that Captain John Porteous should be delivered up to them. Being refused, as they expected, they proceeded to batter the outer gate. Crowbars and sledge-hammers were employed in vain. Fire accomplished what bodily strength could not effect. The rioters rushed to the apartment of the unhappy man. He was concealed in the chimney; but they dragged him down, and bade him prepare for death. Struggling ineffectually, he was carried to the Grass-market, the usual place of execution. He was carried on men's hands, as two boys carry a third, by grasping each other's wrists. This stern multitude went on in silence, the glare of torches lighting up their lowering brows and the pallid features of their victim. Near the spot where the gallows had stood on which Wilson was hanged, a pole projected from a dyer's shop. A rope was fastened round the neck of Porteous; and then the subordination of the rioters to some recognized authority was manifest. "Walker, the town-officer, whom the mob had so pelted that he was obliged to throw off his livery coat, declared he was by when they murdered Porteous; and that one more forward than the rest was checked by the others, and desired to wait for orders; that he thereupon quitted the end of the rope, which by this time being about Porteous's neck, he was ready to have hoisted him up, and went about to another, who very composedly gave him orders; and that he returned and drew the rope up and hanged Porteous." † He was not hanged quickly. There was a terrible scene of butchery. Mr. Lyndsay gave in evidence that he returned [from Major-General Moyle's house] about five in the morning; and, with several who had been with the provost all night, went to the Grass-market, where the body of Porteous yet hung, and a number of people standing about it. But he further declared that, as he returned from his fruitless mission, "the mob was pouring in vast shoals out of the town into the country; and that he did not remember any one face of the many hundreds he met with, though he had lived and borne the highest offices in the city for many years." * The organizers of this daring act were never discovered, after the most rigid investigation. Duncan Forbes, who had conducted an inquiry, as lord advocate, into the circumstances of the case, could fix upon no leader of the rioters, and he ascribed the deed to the impulse of one of "the headstrong mobs" with which Scotland was formerly too well acquainted. General Wade, who had been sent down to assist Forbes in the inquiry, stated in his place in parliament that the servant of an artisan in Edinburgh had been told, three or four days before the murder, that Tuesday night was appointed for revenging innocent blood, and he was to attend when he heard "the ruff of a drum." General Wade maintained that there was nothing in the whole proceeding that looked like the precipitate measures of a giddy mob; and that he never saw, or ever heard of, any military disposition better laid down, or more resolutely executed, than the murderous plan of these rioters. It would appear that the Porteous mob were not without precedents for their guidance. Major-General Moyle, in relating the circumstances to the Duke of Newcastle, thus wrote: "I cannot but mention to your grace that this is the third prisoner, within the memory of man, that has been taken out of a tolbooth here, and barbarously murdered by the mob." Mr. Patrick Lyndsay combated the notion that any above the lowest class of the people were concerned in the Porteous murder, or looked with approbation upon it. He drew a distinction between an English and a Scotch mob. The English did not "do mischief with their eyes open." The lowest class of people in Scotland, he said, "have generally speaking a turn to enthusiasm; and so strong is the influence, such is the force of delusion, that they can work themselves up to a firm persuasion and thorough belief that any mischief they are to do is not only lawful but laudable; that it is their duty to do it; and, from a religious principle, to do it at any risk, even at the risk of their lives." † The Earl of Isla reported to Walpole that "all the lower ranks of the people who had distinguished themselves by pretences to a superior sanctity, talk of the murder as the hand of God doing justice."

The Porteous outrage took place while Queen Caroline was regent in the absence of the king. She felt it as an insult to her authority, and the ministry were inclined to visit the apparent neglect of the magistracy of Edinburgh with serious humiliation. A bill was brought in for disabling the lord provost from ever holding office, and for imprisoning him; for abolishing the town-guard of Edinburgh; for taking away the gates of the Netherbow-port. The Scottish peers and the Scottish members of the Commons fired up at this supposed assault upon the national honor. In the course of the parliamentary inquiry the Scottish judges were summoned to give evidence upon some legal points. It was contended by the Duke of Argyle and other peers that these judges ought to sit on the woolsack as do the English judges, when their presence is wanted in the House of Peers. There was no precedence for such a course, and the Scottish judges were required to stand at the bar. Scotland was outraged by this distinction. The debate in both houses upon the proposed measure of pains and penalties assumed the character of a national controversy. "Unequal dealing," "partial procedure," "oppression to be resisted," and an independent nation "forced back into a state of enmity," were expressions which showed the danger to which this affair was tending. Walpole hinted that when the bill was committed he should not object to amendments founded on reason and equity. When it finally went to the Lords it merely disqualified the lord provost from holding office, and imposed a fine upon the city of Edinburgh of £2000, for the benefit of the widow of Porteous. The impartial author of the modern "History of Scotland" has remarked that "no one can read these debates without seeing reasons why the conduct of Scotland was so different from that of England in the insurrection which broke out eight years afterward." ‡ Although the modified statute upon the Porteous riot could scarcely be a reasonable cause for national irritation, a supplementary measure produced a violent opposition from the Presbyterian clergy. It was enacted that they should read from their pulpits, once a month, a proclamation for discovering the murderers of Captain Porteous. This was held to be an Erastian measure, interfering with the spiritual authority of the Kirk. That proclamation also contained the offensive words, "The Lords spiritual in parliament assembled." This was held to be a recognition of that church government which Scotland had rejected. At this period there was a schism among the Scottish clergy, and this measure had not a healing tendency. Some read the proclamation; some refused to do so. Compliance with the order of the government was held to be faithlessness to the Church.

The state of popular feeling in regard to the highest personages in the realm was, in 1736, seriously alarming. The king during the whole summer and autumn had remained in Germany. The queen was little seen as the winter advanced, for she lived a retired life at Kensington; and, strange as it may seem, we find in a letter from Lord Hervey to his mother, written in November, that the road between London and Kensington "is grown so infamously bad that we live here in the same solitude as we should do if cast on a rock in the middle of the ocean." * The roads to Kensington through the park were equally impassable. People of all ranks were indignant at the king's long stay in Germany. The national ill-humor was expressed in pasquinades. On the gate of St. James's Palace this notice was stuck up: "Lost or strayed out of this house, a man who has left a wife and six children on the parish. Whoever will give any tidings of him to the churchwardens of St. James's parish, so as he may be got again, shall receive four shillings and sixpence reward. N.B. This reward will not be increased, nobody judging him to deserve a crown." † The Prince of Wales was a favorite of the people. It was well known that he was disliked by the king and queen, and that was enough to make him popular. He had been disappointed in the Prussian match, and at the beginning of 1736, being impatient to marry, he had been told that a bride would be found for him in the person of the Princess of Saxe Gotha. The lady arrived in England on the 25th of April, and was married two days after. She was only seventeen years of age, could speak no English, and little French; but she had good sense, and in the difficult circumstances of her subsequent life had to exercise much prudence and sagacity. On the prince's marriage the houses of parliament addressed the king. On this occasion an orator, who is mentioned by Lord Hervey as "Cornet Pitt," contrived, in his first speech, to throw so much covert sarcasm into his praise of the king for consenting to the prince's demand that a wife should be found for him, that "Cornet Pitt" was broke at the end of the session. The prince became "parliamentary fireship to his majesty's opposition." ‡ He was beloved in the city and hated at St. James's. His good deeds won no favor from his family. There was a fire in the Temple, and he worked all night in helping to put it out. The court said he was of no use there, and that he only pretended to have been struck on the head by a falling beam. He was liberal to public charities. This, it was held, was not benevolence but popularity-hunting. He was certainly a weak young man; he had been notoriously dissolute. But he advantageously contrasted with his father, whose irregularities of life were not controlled by his advancing years. In December the king came home, after the public hopes rather than fears had been excited by the belief that he was at sea during a terrible storm in which many ships were wrecked. The differences between the Prince of Wales and his father soon became notorious. The allowance which the king made to the prince was £50,000 per annum. Private advisers of the prince called this allowance mean, and recommended him to apply boldly to parliament for an annual grant of £100,000 out of the king's civil list, and be no longer dependent on his father. Some wiser persons earnestly counselled forbearance. But the prince was obstinate, and he had the indelicacy to make promises to peers and commoners of what he would do for them when he came to the throne, if they would support him now. One of the most intriguing of politicians has left a minute account of his own share in this affair. § He took great credit for having labored to dissuade the prince from persevering in his rash course, and really seems to have honestly set forth the danger of a family quarrel, and the alternative to which Frederick was driving both houses of parliament—that of supporting the prince who wore the crown, or of siding with the heir-apparent. The Prince of Wales was obstinate. Contrary to expectation, the ministry had a majority of thirty in the Commons. The question was subsequently tried in the Lords, and there also the prince failed.

Such a rupture between a passionate father and a flighty son could not pass off without some lasting effects. The king wanted to turn the prince and his household out of St. James's, but Walpole dissuaded his majesty from that step. At last, one of the most extraordinary events in the private annals of royal houses separated the king and his son for years. The Prince and Princess of Wales were residing with the king and queen at Hampton Court, the princess being far advanced in pregnancy. The royal family had dined together in public on Sunday, the 31st of July. In the evening the princess was taken ill. The prince, against all remonstrance, insisted that his wife should not be confined at Hampton Court. She was forced into a coach, with the prince and three ladies; was driven at full gallop to St. James's; and there gave birth to a girl within an hour of her arrival. Only two of the great officers of state were present. The king and queen at Hampton Court went to bed, in entire ignorance of the piece of insanity which their son had perpetrated. They were awakened by a messenger from London about two o'clock; and by four the queen was at St. James's. No apology was then made by the prince—no explanation given. Horace Walpole very sensibly asks, "Had he no way of affronting his parents but by venturing to kill his wife and the heir to the crown?" A correspondence ensued between George II. and his rash son; of which the issue was, that although the prince confessed that he had been in the wrong, the harsh father issued this peremptory command to him: "It is my pleasure that you leave St. James's, with all your family." Frederick quitted the palace, and took up his residence at Norfolk House, in St. James's Square. The people rejoiced in the birth of a princess; for they said, "If ever she came to the crown, what had been so much wished ever since the Hanover family came to the throne, by every one who understood and wished the interest of England must happen—which was the disjoining the Electorate of Hanover from the crown of England." *

In his quarrel with the king and queen, the Prince of Wales managed to add to his own popularity. The general dislike toward the father made the son who opposed him a public favorite. The prince, however, contrived to make it appear that not to the sovereign, but to the chief minister, what he considered as injustice was to be imputed. When the lord mayor and aldermen of London addressed their congratulations to him on the birth of a princess, Frederick said he knew the value of their friendship, and should never look upon them as "beggars." The "sturdy beggars" of Walpole's rash speech in the excise year was never to be forgotten. The prince went to the performance of "Cato." At the lines the audience huzzaed, and the prince joined in the applause in a very marked manner. In the midst of these unseemly exhibitions Queen Caroline was taken dangerously ill, on the 9th of November. She had long been afflicted with a serious complaint, which she bore with heroic fortitude, concealing from every one, even from her physicians, the real nature of her malady. The Prince of Wales expressed great anxiety to see his mother. He was forbidden by the king to come to St. James's. The queen herself said to the king, according to Lord Hervey, "I am so far from desiring to see him, that nothing but your absolute commands should ever make me consent to it." This was on the second day of her serious illness. On the third day the king, who for fourteen years had been aware of her dangerous affliction, but who had promised never to mention it, thought it his duty to send for a surgeon and disclose what was so repugnant to the queen's false delicacy. It was soon found that the disease had gone too far to allow of hope. On the 14th Sir Robert Walpole arrived from Houghton. He was conducted by the king to her majesty's bedside. "The interview was short, but what the queen said was material, for these were her words: 'My good Sir Robert, you see me in a very indifferent situation. I have nothing to say to you, but to recommend the king, my children, and the kingdom, to your care.'" * Horace Walpole says, "As the king and Sir Robert were alone, standing by her bedside, she pathetically recommended, not the minister to the sovereign, but the master to the servant. Sir Robert was alarmed, and feared the recommendation must have left a fatal impression; but, a short time after, the king, reading with Sir Robert some intercepted letters from Germany, which said, that now the queen was gone Sir Robert would have no protection—'On the contrary,' said the king, 'you know she recommended me to you.'" † Lord Hervey relates a curious conversation between the great minister and himself, one night as they were hovering round this death-bed: "Oh, my lord," said Sir Robert, "if this woman should die, what a scene of confusion will here be! Who can tell into what hands the king will fall? or who will have the management of him? I defy the ablest person in this kingdom to foresee what will be the consequence of this great event." "For my own part," replied Lord Hervey, "I have not the least doubt how it will be. He will cry for her for a fortnight, forget her in a month, have two or three women that he will pass his time with; but while they have most of his time, a little of his money, less of his confidence, and no power, you will have all the credit, more power than ever you had, and govern him more absolutely than ever you did. Your credit before was through the medium of the queen, and all power through a medium must be weaker than when it operates directly. Besides, sir, all princes must now and then be deceived by their ministers, and as the king is much easier deceived than the queen, so your task, whenever that task is deceiving, will be much less difficult than it was before. In the first place, because the king is naturally much less suspicious than the queen; in the next, because he is less penetrating; and lastly, because he cares much less to converse with different people, and will hear nobody talk to him of business but yourself." "Oh, my lord," interrupted Sir Robert, "though he will hear nobody but me, you do not know how often he refuses to hear me when it is on a subject he does not like; but by the queen I can with time fetch him round to those subjects again; she can make him do the same thing in another shape, and when I give her her lesson, can make him propose the very thing as his own opinion which a week before he had rejected as mine." ‡

> "When vice prevails, and impious men bear sway,
> The post of honor is a private station,"

On Sunday night, the 20th of November, Caroline lay expecting a speedy relief to her sufferings. The king was asleep at the bed-foot; the Princess Emily also sleeping on a couch. Suddenly an attendant exclaimed that the queen was dying. All started up. "Open the window!" the queen exclaimed, and then said, "Pray." The Princess Emily began to read a prayer, but before she repeated ten words all was over. The king, with all his silliness about mistresses—a silliness which he avowed even to his dying wife in well-known words, indicative of the loose morality of the period—loved and respected Caroline. "The grief he felt for the queen, as it was universally known, and showed a tenderness of which the world thought him before utterly incapable, made him for some time more popular and better spoken of than he had ever been before this incident." § Truly does Mr. Carlyle say, "There is something stoically tragic in the history of Caroline, with her flighty vaporing little king: seldom had foolish husband so wise a wife." The one dark shade upon her character was her persevering dislike of her eldest son—a dislike almost approaching to hatred, and so opposed to the calm sense which was the usual guide of her actions. Her contemporaries saw this blot. The irony of Pope expressed it:

> "Hang the sad verse on Carolina's urn,
> And hail her passage to the realms of rest,
> All parts performed, and all her children blest."

In this aversion of the queen, as well as of the king, there was possibly some stronger motive than posterity will now ever know. The Memoirs of Lord Hervey would probably have revealed, as was hinted in 1778, the origin of the antipathy of his parents to Prince Frederick. But under the will of Lord Hervey's son, the Earl of Bristol, those Memoirs were not to be published till after the death of George III. The mystery was not solved when the Memoirs were published in 1848; for the nephew of the Earl of Bristol caused many mutilations to be made in the manuscript which came into his possession. "It is evident," says a reviewer of these Memoirs, "that the alienation between Prince Frederick and, not only his father but his mother, was strong and decided while he was yet in his early youth—years before he ever saw England."*

Act for Licensing Plays—Birth of a prince, afterward George III.—Commercial disputes with Spain—Popular war-cry—Jenkins' ear—A convention with Spain denounced in parliament—Walpole is driven into war—His struggles to retain power—Capture of Porto Bello—Attack upon Carthagena—Anson and Byron—Extension of the field of war—Motion to remove Walpole from the king's councils—Walpole resigns—He is created Earl of Orford—Parliamentary inquiry into his administration.

THERE never, probably, was a minister who was the object of so much personal satire as Walpole. As his master hated "boets and bainters," Walpole despised journalists and pamphleteers. He was no patron of letters. He did not look out for young men who had written university prize-poems, to make them envoys and secretaries. He left authors to rise or fall by their profession; to grow rich like Pope, or to starve like Savage. What the minister did in the way of purchasing literary aid was worse than nothing. Smollett says, "He either wanted judgment to distinguish men of genius, or could find none that would engage in his service; he therefore employed a set of wretched authors, void of understanding and ingenuity." Tindal, a more impartial chronicler, has a similar testimony to this common mistake of statesmen. "No man ever set the press to work with so little judgment as he did. He looked upon writing to be a mechanical kind of business; and he took up with the first pen that he could find in public offices, or whom he could oblige by private liberality." When Bolingbroke and Pulteney had worked "The Craftsman" as far as such machinery would go, a new set of assailants appeared in the most popular of all forms of attack. The Stage became political. Gay, in his "Polly," going far beyond the personal allusions of "The Beggar's Opera," the lord chamberlain revived his obnoxious power, and the representation of "Polly" was forbidden. In 1735, when Sir John Bernard brought in a bill "to restrain the number of houses for playing interludes, and for the better regulating of common players of interludes," Walpole proposed to introduce a clause to confirm and enlarge the power of the lord chamberlain in reference to plays. Sir John Bernard objected to the clause, and withdrew his bill. In 1737 Henry Fielding produced "Pasquin" at the theatre in the Haymarket. Colley Cibber ascribes to this piece the enactment for licensing plays which Walpole brought forward in that year: "Religion, laws, government, priests, judges, and ministers, were laid flat at the feet of the Herculean satirist, this Drawcansir in wit, who spared neither friend nor foe; who, to make his fame immortal, like another Erostratus, set fire to his stage by writing up to an act of parliament to demolish it." Walpole made no direct attack upon "Pasquin;" but having obtained, from the manager of Goodman's Fields Theatre, the manuscript of a farce called "The Golden Rump," which, says Smollett, "was fraught with treason and abuse upon the government," the adroit minister read the most obnoxious passages to the House of Commons, and then moved an amendment to the Vagrant Act, as far as related "to the common players of interludes." Two clauses were introduced, by which the customary privilege of the lord chamberlain to interfere with theatrical representations was made a legal power. Under this bill the lord chamberlain might prohibit the representation of plays; and copies of all new plays, additions to old plays, prologues and epilogues, were to be submitted to that officer for the purpose of being licensed. Smollett implies that there was a "vigorous opposition" to this measure. One speech only remains to us, that of Lord Chesterfield, to indicate that there was any opposition at all. This was considered one of the most brilliant efforts of the great wit and accomplished orator. His prediction that this bill was a step for introducing arbitrary power, "for removing or hoodwinking, one after another, those sentries who are posted by the constitution of a free country for warning the people of their danger," may be regarded as the exaggeration of party. The Bill for Licensing Plays was not to be a precedent "to lay the press under a general license." From that period the freedom of the press has been surrounded by multiplied safeguards, which the declaimers for its liberty in that day would have regarded with horror. The Act for Licensing Plays still subsists among us. There have been many abuses of the power of the licenser—in most cases silly abuses. But no friend to the liberty of thought, of speech, and of writing, can wish these restraints upon the theatre wholly removed. There is a manifest distinction between the profaneness and indecency that is written and the profaneness and indecency that is spoken. The moral corruption of an audience is like the spread of a contagious disease. The reader who gloats over a dangerous book indulges in a secret vice which shuns companionship. The improved education of all classes, and the general elevation of the condition and character of writers for the stage, as well as of all other writers, have made the office of the licenser almost unnecessary. But the lofty tone of patronage in which Lord Chesterfield speaks of "the poor author" is a sufficient intimation of the existence at that time of a wretched and perhaps unscrupulous class of caterers for public amusement: "Wit, my lords, is a sort of property; it is the property of those who have it, and too often the only property they have to depend on. It is, indeed, but a precarious dependence. Thank God, we, my lords, have a dependence of another kind. . . . I must own I cannot easily agree to the laying of any tax upon wit; but by this bill it is to be heavily taxed; it is to be excised; for if this bill passes it cannot be retailed in a proper way without a permit; and the lord chamberlain is to have the honor of being chief gauger, supervisor, commissioner, judge, and jury: but what is still more hard, though the poor author, the proprietor, I should say, cannot perhaps dine till he has found out and agreed with a purchaser, yet before he can prepare to seek for a purchaser he must patiently submit to have his goods rummaged at this new excise-office." Thanks to the example of the "poor author" who threw the tardy patronage of Lord Chesterfield in his face, the class with the "precarious dependence" of "one property only" have learned to struggle bravely till they have tested its value; certainly they have learned not to waste life in lamentations that they have not "a dependence of another kind."

The year 1738 was marked by an event which to many of the present day, still in life's "middle chamber," appears to be the link connecting them with generations long passed away. On the 24th of May, old style—June 4th, new style—was born George Augustus, son of the Prince of Wales—the George the Third who came to the throne in 1760; who lived to 1820. When we arrive at such an historical epoch we feel how intimately the past and the present become interlaced, and how every retrospect of public affairs involves something prospective. The birth of a grandson of George II. was an occasion of national rejoicing. It probably increased the reigning king's jealousy of his son. A notice from the lord chamberlain was inserted in the London "Gazette," that no visitor of the prince should be admitted to the Court of St. James's. The opposition gathered more and more round the prince. The "terrible Cornet of Horse," as William Pitt was named, became one of the gentlemen of his bedchamber. The rival establishments—St. James's at one end of Pall Mall, and Carlton House at the other end—kept the town well amused.

In 1739 the foreign policy of Great Britain was driven by parliamentary faction, seconded by popular ignorance, upon a lamentable change from peace to war. For twelve years Sir Robert Walpole had kept the country at peace. He had effected this great good without any compromise of the country's honor; with an accumulation of the country's resources, which made other powers respect her strength. The ambition of kings, the lust of conquest, the intrigues of ministers, the blunders of diplomatists—these are the causes ordinarily assigned when a nation is precipitated into a war, in which vast interests are endangered, and the beginners of the fray are not "thrice armed" in having their "quarrel just." Walpole was driven into a war with Spain, which quickly became a general war by mercantile cupidity and mock patriotism. Walpole ought to have resigned his power rather than have thrown aside his principles. But he valued office more than consistency; and he consented to imperil his country, with the perfect conviction that her safety and prosperity depended upon a totally opposite policy than that which was forced upon him. He did the worst thing which a minister can do. He suffered others to conduct the war inefficiently, because he himself disliked the war. In yielding to the clamor of his political enemies he did not propitiate them; and when he falls, "never to rise again," we lose somewhat of our respect for the hero of many a well-foughten field of party, who ought to have stood to his own convictions, even though his adversaries had moved to a triumph over him with the "two-handed engine" ready to strike.

For a century and a half England and Spain had been more than commercial rivals—they had been commercial enemies. The trade of Spain with her vast possessions in South America was essentially a monopoly. Every English sailor, from the days of Drake, had been eager to break up the monopoly in the most effectual way, by a dash at the Spanish treasure-ships and richly freighted merchantmen. A regular participation in the trade with her colonies was jealously guarded against in every treaty of Spain with England. The right of searching merchant-vessels sailing near Spanish colonial ports was always insisted upon; and the right was rarely suffered to be evaded, for guard-ships (guarda costas) were always maintained in full activity. By the Treaty of Utrecht, as we have seen, the expectation of a free trade with the Spanish coasts of South America was only realized in the permission to send one ship annually. The Treaty of Seville, in 1729, did not provide for any relaxation of this restriction, or of any of the earlier prohibitions. The rapidly increasing importance of the British colonies of North America rendered it impossible that the commerce of the settlements of the new world with Europe, or with each other, the North with the South, could remain upon the exclusive footing established by the treaties of 1667 and 1670. If the Spanish government would not relax its narrow policy, English adventurers would not scruple to evade it. When the annual South Sea ship sailed with its cargo, other vessels followed in its wake; and the cargo of the one ship became almost inexhaustible. Ships driven by stress of weather into Spanish ports might refit and refresh their crews. The inconstant wind was very favorable to a little honest trading. When a population wants to buy, and ships are at hand to sell, prohibitory decrees are weapons "hung by the wall." Smuggling was carried on without much concealment, by pleasant trips of shore-boats to English vessels, and to North American vessels, lying off the harbors which they could not enter. The English merchants grew bolder with success, and the Spanish government more angry and violent. The right of search on the high seas was asserted by the Spanish guarda costas. Ships were often illegally detained, and their crews sometimes treated with severity. The British people, generally, heard only of the cruel tyranny of the Don, and knew little of the systematic offences against the Don's commercial jealousy which so moved his wrath. Walpole had been denounced of old by Atterbury as "the cur-dog of Britain and spaniel of Spain;" and when Walpole, in 1738, was successful in asserting his pacific policy by a parliamentary majority, the opposition appeared more and more determined to drive him into a war with Spain. The minister admitted that English merchants and seamen were unjustly and inhumanly treated by the Spanish guarda costas, and that the honor and interest of the country required that there should be reparation for the past and security for the future. He was negotiating to obtain redress in a peaceable manner, and he therefore resisted the motion for the production of papers which would embarrass this endeavor. In the House of Lords an address to the crown of a very warlike tendency was carried. Petitions from merchants of various ports, complaining of Spanish outrages, were daily presented to the Commons. Captains and seamen were examined at the bar of the house, and related grievous stories of cruelties and oppressions exercised upon British crews. One narrator of a grievance, which dated back seven years, stirred the parliament and the people into a rage which Pulteney could not increase, and which Walpole could not control. On the 16th of March it is ordered by the Commons that "Captain Robert Jenkins do attend this house immediately;" and by a second order "that Captain Robert Jenkins do attend on Tuesday morning."

The English newspapers of June, 1731, had related that Captain Jenkins, with his owners, had been to Hampton Court, to lay before the Duke of Newcastle a statement of the wrongs which he had received from the Spaniards. He was homeward bound with a cargo from Jamaica, and on the 20th of April, not far from the Havana, was boarded by a guarda costa and rigorously searched. No contraband goods could be found. He was threatened with death if he did not confess where his gold and his unlawful merchandise were hidden. He had no contraband goods, he again and again averred. The Spaniards slashed him with their cutlasses; they hung him up to the yard-arm. Before he was quite exhausted they let him down, and again bade him confess. He spoke of his Britannic Majesty's flag—of the high seas—in a mild assertion of the injustice he was receiving. His ear had been half cut off when the ship was boarded; and now the miscreants tore the ear out of his head, exclaiming, "Carry that to your king." Poor Jenkins got no redress from the Duke of Newcastle in 1731. On Tuesday, the 21st of March, 1738, when the captain stood at the bar of the House of Commons, he produced his ear out of a box in which he always carried it about him, wrapped up in cotton. "Ridiculous story," cries the biographer of Walpole. "The fable of Jenkins' ear," says the author of "A Regicide Peace." "He lost his ear in the pillory," exclaim official sceptics. "The ear of Jenkins is a singular thing. Might have mounted to be a constellation, like Berenice's hair," observes Mr. Carlyle, "had the English people been of poetic turn." Pope has given a couplet to the famous ear:

> "The Spaniards own they did a waggish thing,
> Who crop't our ears and sent them to the king."

Whether a truth or a myth, the ear of Jenkins drove England to war.

In opening the session of parliament in February, 1739, the king announced that, supported by the resolutions of parliament, he had made such representations to Spain of the hardships and injuries sustained by his trading subjects in America, and had so strongly demanded reparation and security, that he had been enabled to conclude a convention, under which a payment would be made to compensate his subjects for losses, and all matters in dispute would be settled by plenipotentiaries as regarded the future. Violent were the debates in both houses. All the papers connected with these negotiations were demanded to be laid upon the table; and the demand was of course resisted. Smollett, who rarely admits any merit in the administration of Walpole, very justly says that "no government could act, either in external or domestic affairs, with proper influence, dignity, and dispatch, if every letter and instruction relative to an unfinished negotiation should be exposed to the view of such a numerous assembly, composed of individuals actuated by motives in themselves diametrically opposite." All historical experience—the experience even of the passing hour—shows how embarrassing is the task of the ministers of a mixed monarchy to conduct delicate negotiations with absolute governments. The freedom of speech in a British parliament is embarrassing enough; but perfect unreserve on the part of an administration is absolutely impossible. It is come to be understood by all practical and judicious representatives of the people that a large confidence must be placed in ministerial responsibility. Walpole had a majority in refusing to produce the papers moved for. But when the convention was laid before parliament, and was published to the nation, an outcry burst forth—against the amount of indemnity to be paid to Spain—against the omission of any mention of the right of search, referring that and other questions to subsequent negotiation—against the non-punishment of the captains and crews of the guarda costas—which must have overthrown the ministry in the storm, had the ministry been typified by the oak instead of by the willow. Lyttleton and Pitt put forth all their oratorical strength against the convention. The surpassing fame of Pitt may be dated from his effort on that 8th of March. He concluded his speech by describing the convention as a stipulation for national ignominy; an illusory expedient to baffle the resentment of the nation; a truce, without a suspension of hostilities on the part of Spain; a surrender of the rights and trade of England to the mercy of plenipotentiaries. "The complaints of your despairing merchants, the voice of England, have condemned it. Be the guilt of it upon the head of the adviser." But the eloquence of Pitt produced no effect upon the nation comparable with the war-cry of Sir Thomas Sanderson. "The court of Spain, being resolved to grant nothing that might any way contribute to our future security, resolved not to allow the word satisfaction to be so much as once mentioned in this treaty; even the Spanish pirate who cut off Captain Jenkins' ear making use at the same time of the most insulting expression toward the person of our king—an expression which no British subject can decently repeat, an expression which no man who has a regard for his sovereign can ever forgive; even this fellow, I say, is to live to enjoy the fruits of his rapine, and remain a living testimony of the cowardly tameness and mean submission of Great Britain, and of the triumphant pride and stubborn haughtiness of Spain." The ministerial majority was only twenty-eight—260 against 232. Walpole stood up for some time against the parliamentary opposition and the popular outcry. The great philosophical politician of the generation which succeeded Walpole says, "I have seen, and with some care examined, the original documents concerning certain important transactions of those times. They perfectly satisfied me of the extreme injustice of that war, and of the falsehood of the colors which Walpole, to his ruin, and guided by a mistaken policy, suffered to be daubed over that measure. Some years after it was my fortune to converse with many of the principal actors against that minister, and with those who principally excited that clamor. None of them—no, not one—did in the least defend the measure, or attempt to justify their conduct. They condemned it as freely as they would have done in commenting upon any proceeding in history in which they were totally unconcerned." *

The majority of the government, small as it was, induced a change of tactics in some of the leading members of the opposition. On bringing up the report upon the resolution which the ministers had carried, there was another division, which was also in favor of the ministerial measures, the majority being twenty-eight. Sir William Wyndham then announced the determination of himself and his friends to secede in a body from the House of Commons. "I here, sir, bid a final adieu to this parliament. Perhaps when another parliament shall succeed, I may again be at liberty to serve my country in this capacity. . . . Meantime I conclude with doing that duty to my country which I am still at liberty to perform, to pray for its preservation: may, therefore, that Power, which has so often and so visibly interfered in behalf of the rights and liberties of this nation, continue its care over us at this worst and most dangerous juncture, while the insolence of enemies without and the influence of corruption within threaten the ruin of her constitution." Wyndham, as the consistent adherent of the Jacobite party, was not an adequate representative of the opinions of those who were honestly opposed to Walpole's system of government, but were not desirous to replace it by bringing back the Stuart dynasty. He exposed himself to the bitter reproof of the minister, that, as the mouthpiece of a faction that never sat in the house but to distress the government and serve a popish interest, "he was looked upon as the head of those traitors who, twenty-five years ago, conspired the destruction of their country, and of the royal family, to set a popish pretender on the throne." Walpole added, "I am only afraid that they will not be as good as their word." Sixty members seceded with Wyndham; and the secession left the minister at his ease for the rest of the session. Walpole was thus enabled to carry a very questionable measure—that of subsidizing Denmark for a Hanoverian object instead of for the interest of Great Britain. The parliament was prorogued on the 14th of June.

The plenipotentiaries under the convention had met; but the Spaniards had been moved by the threatening denunciations of the English parliament to make a stand upon what they thought their national honor. There was a dispute about a trumpery money payment of ninety thousand pounds. Cardinal Fleury offered to guarantee the payment, provided an English squadron was withdrawn from the Mediterranean. The public temper was for war. The king was for war. Walpole was urged to demand an express renunciation of the right of search, and an acknowledgment of the British claims to disputed territory in North America. Spain unceremoniously rejected the demands, and on the 19th of October a declaration of war against Spain was proclaimed in London. When the heralds rode into the city to declare the war, the Prince of Wales and a numerous body of opposition leaders accompanied them; and while every steeple sent forth a joyous peal, the prince stopped at a tavern at Temple Bar, and set the multitude huzzaing by calling for a tankard and drinking "success to the war." Walpole heard the peal of the bells, and exclaimed, "They may ring the bells now; they will soon be wringing their hands."

When the parliament met on the 15th of November, 1739, the king said, "I have, in all my proceedings with the court of Spain, acted agreeably to the sense of both houses of parliament, and therefore I can make no doubt but I shall meet with a ready and vigorous support to this just and necessary war." "Just and necessary" are the epithets which every government applies to every war into which it rushes. The seceders from parliament had returned. The altered policy of Walpole had failed to secure him popularity with the people or adequate support from their representatives. He was regarded, truly enough, as the secret friend of peace. He had now to bear all the odium of the increased taxation which is the inevitable result of war. When he wished to conduct war with the necessary vigor, he was opposed. The royal navy was short of seamen. Walpole proposed that there should be a general registry of seamen serving on board merchant-vessels, that they might be called upon in a case of emergency. This was held to be despotism, and he abandoned his measure. That real power which he derived from being firm to his own principles was gone. Old friends and enemies, new friends and enemies, saw that the commanding superiority of the man who had carried the vessel of the state through many a troubled sea was dwindling away. The Duke of Argyle deserted him. The great Scottish chief was dismissed from his employments. Walpole had been dared by Pulteney to strip of his posts "one military person great in his character, great in his capacity, great in the important offices he has discharged;" but he did dare. "Mr. Keith, a Jacobite, was with the duke when this dismission came. 'Mr. Keith,' the duke said, 'fall flat, fall edge, we must get rid of these people,' which Mr. Keith interpreted might imply both master and man."* Wyndham ceased to trouble Walpole. He died in 1740. But Pulteney was still ready to do battle against him; and "the terrible Cornet of Horse" was prepared for any onslaught. There were divisions in the cabinet. The Duke of Newcastle, whose name Walpole afterward declared was synonymous with "perfidy," was growing jealous of the man who had so long treated him as a subordinate. Newcastle complained that measures were agreed upon before others were allowed to give an opinion. "What do you mean?" cried Walpole; "the war is yours. You have had the conduct of it. I wish you joy of it." They differed about ships being sent to America. Walpole objected to leaving our own coasts defenceless. Newcastle maintained his own view, and Walpole exclaimed, "I oppose nothing; I give in to everything; am said to do everything; and to answer for everything; and yet, God knows, I dare not do what I think right. I am of opinion for having more ships of the squadron left behind; but I dare not, I will not, make any alteration. Let them go! Let them go!" †

KNIGHT'S POPULAR HISTORY OF ENGLAND.

VOLUME VI.

On the 17th of March, 1740, both houses went up with an address of congratulation to the king, "on the glorious success of your majesty's arms in the West Indies, under the command of Vice-Admiral Vernon, by entering the port and taking the town of Porto Bello, and demolishing and levelling all the ports and castles belonging thereto, with six men-of-war only." Vernon, a member of parliament, was strongly opposed to the administration of Walpole; but the principle of concession procured his appointment to the command of the expedition, whose success was popularly reckoned as a wonderful triumph. The "six men-of-war only" was a phrase carried by the opposition in the Commons, to mark what could be done by a resolute commander. Admiral Hosier had hesitated to attack the same place with twenty ships in 1726. The famous ballad of "Admiral Hosier's Ghost" was written by Glover to point this contrast, and to insinuate that Vernon, as he had informed his friends, was not properly seconded at home. The forced inactivity of Hosier enabled the government to avert a war. Yet the patriotic ballad of the author of "Leonidas," true to the politics of its time, sees no honor and safety but in fighting. The shade of Hosier thus apostrophizes Vernon:

"I, by twenty sail attended,
Did this Spanish town affright.
Nothing then its wealth defended
But my orders not to fight.
Oh! that in this rolling ocean
I had cast them with disdain,
And obey'd my heart's warm motion,
To have quell'd the pride of Spain."

The ministry determined to let Vernon, the popular hero, have a fair opportunity to obey his "heart's warm motion." In the course of the summer and autumn they sent out an armament to join the popular admiral at Jamaica. Some great attack was to be made upon the Spanish possessions; but the precise destination of the expedition was to be determined by a council of war. The whole force consisted of 115 ships, 15,000 sailors, and 12,000 soldiers. It was resolved, upon the advice of Vernon, to attack Carthagena, the strongest fortified place in Spanish America. The command of the land forces had devolved upon General Wentworth; for Lord Cathcart, an experienced officer, had died on the passage. Smollett, the historian, has related the assault upon Carthagena with the vague generality which was once considered to be the only proper historical style. Smollett, the novelist, who at the age of twenty was serving in one of Admiral Vernon's ships as a surgeon's mate, has brought the scene before our eyes in far more vivid colors. After various delays, the fleet was before Carthagena. The one narrow entrance to the harbor, called the Boca Chica, was defended by several forts and batteries, one principal fort being known as the castle. The troops had been landed, and had erected batteries to fire upon this castle on one side, while the large ships should attack it on the other side. The signal, says the surgeon's mate, was given for his ship to engage. "Our ship, with others destined for this service, immediately weighed, and in less than half an hour came to an anchor before the castle of Boca Chica, with a spring upon our cable; and the cannonading (which, indeed, was terrible) began. The surgeon, after having crossed himself, fell flat on the deck; and the chaplain and purser, who were stationed with us in quality of assistants, followed his example, while the Welshman and I sat upon a chest looking at one another with great discomposure, scarce able to refrain from the like prostration. And, that the reader may know it was not a common occasion that alarmed us thus, I must inform him of the particulars of this dreadful din that astounded us. The fire of the Spaniards proceeded from eighty-four great guns, besides a mortar and small arms, in Boca Chica, thirty-six in Fort St. Joseph, twenty in two fascine batteries, and four men-of-war mounting sixty-four guns each. This was answered by our land battery, mounted with twenty-one cannon, two mortars, and twenty-four cohorns, and five great ships of seventy or eighty guns, that fired without intermission." A sailor whose hand was shattered by a grapeshot is brought down to the cockpit: "While I was employed in dressing the stump, I asked Jack's opinion of the battle, who, shaking his head, frankly told me he believed we should do no good. 'For why? because instead of dropping anchor close under shore, where we should have had to deal with one corner of Boca Chica, we had opened the harbor, and exposed ourselves to the whole fire of the enemy from their shipping and Fort St. Joseph, as well as from the castle we intended to cannonade; that, besides, we lay at too great a distance to damage the walls, and three parts in four of our shot did not take place; for there was scarce anybody on board who understood the pointing of a gun.'" The Boca Chica is at length abandoned by the Spaniards, and the men-of-war enter the outward harbor. Vernon wrote home to announce his "wonderful success." Carthagena was held to have fallen; and, as Voltaire states, a medal was struck in honor of "the avenger of his country"—of the gallant Vernon—who had made himself master of the rich city hitherto deemed impregnable. The fleet tardily overcame the obstacle of sunk ships, and penetrated to the inner harbor. The author of "Roderick Random" again throws interest into the usual dry narrative: "After having put garrisons into the forts we had taken, and re-embarked our soldiers and artillery, a piece of service that detained us more than a week, we ventured up to the mouth of the inner harbor, guarded by a large fortification on one side and a small redoubt on the other, both of which were deserted before our approach, and the entrance of the harbor blocked up by several old galleons and two men-of-war that the enemy had sunk in the channel. We made shift, however, to open a passage for some ships that favored a second landing of our troops, at a place called La Quinta, not far from the town, where, after a faint resistance from a body of Spaniards who opposed their disembarkation, they encamped with a design of besieging the castle of St. Lazar, which overlooked and commanded the city. Whether our renowned general had nobody in his army who knew how to approach it in form, or that he trusted entirely to the fame of his arms, I shall not determine; but, certain it is, a resolution was taken in a council of war to attack the place with musketry only. This was put in execution, and succeeded accordingly, the enemy giving them such a hearty reception that the greatest part of the detachment took up their everlasting residence on the spot. Our chief, not relishing this kind of complaisance in the Spaniards, was wise enough to retreat on board with the remains of his army, which from eight thousand able men landed on the beach near Boca Chica, was now reduced to fifteen hundred fit for service." In all these operations there was no cordial union between the admiral and the general. They had separate commands. Vernon, a vain man, was indifferent to any success in which he should not have the chief honor. He sent no assistance to Wentworth in the attack upon Fort San Lazaro until the failure was irretrievable. The wet season had begun; the fleet and army were ill-provisioned; an epidemic fever raged. On the 24th of April it was determined to abandon the assault of Carthagena. The one success was paraded by Vernon in a dispatch: "I believe even the Spaniards will give us a certificate that we have effectually destroyed all their castles." The fortifications were demolished. The shades of the brave men whose "carcasses floated in the harbor until they were devoured by sharks and carrion-crows," might have repeated the words of Hosier's "sad troop of ghosts:"

"Sent in this foul clime to languish, Think what thousands fell in vain."

Another expedition, dispatched from England in September, 1740, has furnished the materials for two of the most interesting relations in our language. Walter's narrative of Lord Anson's voyage and Byron's narrative of his adventures in the ship Wager offer as many stirring examples of courage and fortitude as any of the most exciting records of naval victories. In the qualities which these captains displayed, under severe privations and sufferings which almost forbade hope, we see upon what foundations of national character our maritime greatness has been built. When we read Smollett's description of the brutal and the effeminate commanders under whom he served, we must not forget that the same age produced George Anson and John Byron. The squadron of six vessels under Commodore Anson was to attack the shores of Peru, sailing round Cape Horn. It almost surpasses belief, that the only land troops which these vessels carried consisted of out-pensioners of Chelsea, old men, some wounded, all feeble. Five hundred of these were to have incumbered the squadron. Only about half sailed, the rest having deserted. In the spring of 1741, in attempting to double Cape Horn, the ships were encountered by violent hurricanes, and the Centurion, Anson's ship, was separated from her companions. To understand what were the dangers of the sea a century ago we must turn to the fearful relation of the ravages produced in the Centurion by the scurvy. Anson had determined, under stress of weather, to make for the uninhabited island of Juan Fernandez. Before he reached this refuge on the 10th of June two hundred of his crew had died. The trial sloop arrived at the island, having lost two thirds of her crew. Both ships were soon relieved of the poor out-pensioners of Chelsea, who were the first to sink under the fatal disease, which destroyed far more on ship-board than storm or battle. The Pearl and Severn, two large ships, had put back to the Brazils. The Wager was wrecked on a small desert island. Her crew were saved from drowning, but the prospect of the more terrible death of famine rendered them desperate. Byron, a stern commander, had not the one great quality of kindness by which violent men in seasons of suffering are more controlled than by harshness. They mutinied, seized the long-boat, and left their captain, with the lieutenant, the surgeon, and two midshipmen, on the desert island where the wreck took place. One of these five died. The adventures of the other four will always be read with deep interest by a maritime people. Anson remained at Juan Fernandez, with three vessels, till the autumn. His men were refreshed, his ships refitted, and he was ready for some exploit. In September they sallied forth and secured a valuable prize. Other prizes were made as they cruised about the island. The town of Paita was attacked by a boat's crew, and a large amount of public treasure was obtained. Anson, in the barbarous spirit of earlier times, suffered his sailors to rifle private houses, and even churches, and finally burned the town. When he took prisoners at sea he was courteous, especially to ladies. Captain Basil Hall records that after the lapse of eighty years the kindness of Anson to his Spanish prisoners was remembered at Paita, while his wanton destruction of the town was scarcely dwelled upon. Affliction came again upon the little squadron. The scurvy again broke out. The ships became leaky. The commodore could not man his prizes, and he destroyed them. The fifty-gun ship, the Gloucester, sprung a leak, and there were not hands aboard to work the pumps effectually. The crew were removed to the Centurion, and the doomed vessel was set on fire. Anson was now companionless with his good ship. After a long sojourn in Tinian, one of the Ladrone Islands, where fresh meat and the fruit of the bread-tree restored his crew to health, he again sailed forth in the spring of 1743 to look for Spanish galleons. On the 20th of June the Centurion met with one of these great treasure-ships. After a severe action she carried her prize into Canton, with a million and a half of dollars. Anson returned to Spithead in June, 1744, when England was thinking of more serious matters than his losses or gains.

When Walpole, in 1738, was using all the influence of his experience to prevent England being driven into a war with Spain, he said, in the great debate upon the alleged Spanish depredations, "No man can prudently give his advice for declaring war without knowing the whole system of the affairs of Europe as they stand at present, and how the several potentates of Europe now stand affected toward one another. It is not the power of Spain, and the power of this nation only, that we ought in such a case to consider and compare; we ought likewise to know what allies our enemies may have, and what assistance we may expect from our friends." The orators were too strong for the statesman; but the statesman saw farther than the orators. When the king opened the session of parliament in November, 1740, he inferred that the court of Spain "began to be sensible that they should be no longer able, alone, to defend themselves against the efforts of the British nation." He alluded to "some late extraordinary proceedings." He said, "If any other power should interfere, and attempt to prescribe or limit the operations of the war against my declared enemies, the honor and interest of my crown and kingdoms must call upon us to lose no time in putting ourselves into such a condition as may enable us to repel any insults." Walpole knew, in 1738, that a war with Spain would eventually involve a war with France. The two branches of the house of Bourbon would again be in alliance. France and Spain, as he foresaw, formed a family compact. But there were other complications at the end of 1740 which were also threatening a general European conflict. To these the speech from the throne referred: "The great and unhappy event of the death of the late emperor opens a new scene in the affairs of Europe, in which all the principal powers may be immediately or consequentially concerned." Charles VI. died on the 20th of October. The question of the Pragmatic Sanction was now to be regarded as little more than a parchment edict, even by those who had guaranteed it. Maria Theresa, the daughter of the emperor, became the heiress of his hereditary states. The Queen of Hungary, as she was styled, would have formidable rivals to the succession. A claimant to a considerable portion of her dominions would start up in the person of the prince who, on the death of Frederick William, King of Prussia, on the 31st of May of this same year, became Frederick II. We reserve for another chapter the consideration of the events that gave the first indication that England would be forced into a long and exhausting war—a war not so capable of adjustment as her commercial disputes with Spain would have been if those differences had been managed with temper and common-sense.

The threatening aspect of European affairs produced no moderation in the conduct of parties. Agreeing very slightly upon principles of government, or utterly disagreeing, there was one bond of union for some men of all sides—hatred of Walpole. Notice was given to Sir Robert by Mr. Sandys, a member of no great mark, that he intended to bring forward articles of accusation against him. On the 13th of February the motion of Mr. Sandys, for an address to the king to remove Sir Robert Walpole from his majesty's presence and councils forever, was prefaced by a speech in which the whole course of his administration, for a long series of years, was animadverted upon as a series of national calamities. The mover said that he imputed every public evil to one person, because that one person had grasped in his own hands every branch of government; had attained the sole direction of affairs; monopolized all the favors of the crown; was the dispenser of all honors and preferments. It was proposed that during the debate Sir Robert should retire from the house. The unfair attempt was overruled. Walpole was bitterly attacked by some; was sincerely but feebly defended by others. Shippen, his old Jacobite adversary, said this motion was only a pretence for turning out one minister and bringing in another—he should not trouble himself with such a matter. He left the house, followed by a strong body of his friends. Walpole spoke last, and he spoke admirably. Some of the expressions of his bitter contempt of his adversaries have been preserved: "Gentlemen have talked a great deal of patriotism. A venerable word, when duly practised. I am sorry to say that of late it has been so much hackneyed about that it is in danger of falling into disgrace. The very idea of true patriotism is lost, and the term has been prostituted to the very worst of purposes. A patriot, sir! Why, patriots spring up like mushrooms! I could raise fifty of them within the four-and-twenty hours. I have raised many of them in one night. It is but refusing to gratify an unreasonable or an insolent demand, and up starts a patriot. I have never been afraid of making patriots; but I disdain and despise all their efforts. This pretended virtue proceeds from personal malice and disappointed ambition. There is not a man among them whose particular aim I am not able to ascertain, and from what motive they have entered into the lists of opposition." He went, step by step, through the various charges against him. More impartial judges than his accusers—those who calmly review the history of their country after a century has intervened—will acknowledge that the great merit which, in the conclusion of his speech, he claimed for himself, is justly his due: "If my whole administration is to be scrutinized and arraigned, why are the most favorable parts to be omitted? If facts are to be accumulated on one side, why not on the other? And why may not I be permitted to speak in my own favor? Was I not called by the voice of the king and the nation to remedy the fatal effects of the South Sea project, and to support declining credit? Was I not placed at the head of the treasury when the revenues were in the greatest confusion? Is credit revived, and does it now flourish? Is it not at an incredible height, and if so, to whom must that circumstance be attributed? Has not tranquillity been preserved both at home and abroad, notwithstanding a most unreasonable and violent opposition? Has the true interest of the nation been pursued, or has trade flourished?" The motion of Mr. Sandys was negatived by a majority of 290 against 106. A similar motion made by Lord Carteret in the House of Lords was also rejected.

The parliament was approaching its natural termination under the Septennial Act. Before it was dissolved a subsidy had been granted to the Queen of Hungary, the determination having been distinctly avowed that his Britannic Majesty would support his guarantee of the Pragmatic Sanction. The measure was not unpopular in England; but Walpole's unpopularity went on rapidly increasing. Upon him was thrown the blame of the failure at Carthagena. The king had gone to Hanover, and without the knowledge of his English ministers had entered into a treaty of neutrality for his German states for one year, alarmed at those successes of Prussia against Austria which we shall have to relate. Walpole had to bear the blame of every event that appeared pregnant with danger. The ministry decidedly lost ground in the elections for the new parliament. If we may judge from a passage in a letter of Horace Walpole, his father was sadly changed: "He who at dinner always forgot he was minister, and was more gay and thoughtless than all his company, now sits without speaking, and with his eyes fixed for an hour together." * The parliament met on the 4th of December. Night after night were the old attacks renewed. The ministerial majority dwindled away. In one struggle upon an election petition there was only a majority of seven for the government. Walpole was pressed by his friends to resign. But he held on After a great debate on the 18th of January he had only a majority of three, in the fullest house ever known. On the 28th of January, after another battle, he had only a majority of one. Sir Robert Walpole resigned on the 1st of February, 1742.

Immediately after his resignation Walpole was created Earl of Orford. His fall from power did not abate the hostility of his enemies. When, in December, 1741, the ministerial majority was dwindling away, Horace Walpole wrote to Mann, "I look upon it now that the question is Downing Street or the Tower." Downing Street had been evacuated after a tenancy of twenty years; and a lodging was to be provided, where, said Horace, "there are a thousand pretty things to amuse you—the lions, the armory, the crown, and the axe that beheaded Anna Bullen." On the 9th of March, 1742, a motion for a secret committee to inquire into the administration of Sir Robert Walpole during the past twenty years was made by Lord Limerick. It was rejected by a majority of two. A second motion, to limit the inquiry to the previous ten years, was carried. There was doubtless some difficulty in obtaining evidence; but the wholesale corruption and misappropriation of the public money which had been alleged against Walpole was not substantiated by the testimony before the committee. No charge could be brought against the minister that he was himself venal. In his great defence he exclaimed, "Have I ever been suspected of being corrupted? A strange phenomenon. A corrupter, himself not corrupt!" Secret and special services had amounted in ten years to nearly a million and a half sterling. The committee admit, "that no form of government can subsist without a power of employing public money for services which are in their nature secret, and ought always to remain so." But, with one exception, the application of this amount of a hundred and fifty thousand pounds per annum could not be traced so as to bring home the dealings of the treasury with "the venal tribe" in parliament. As to another species of venality, the evidence was clear enough. During the ten years there had been paid by Mr. Lowther, "no less a sum than £50,079 18*s.* 0*d.* to authors and printers of newspapers, such as 'Free Briton,' 'Daily Courant,' 'Persuasive to Candor and Impartiality,' 'Corn-cutter's Journal,' gazetteers, and other political papers. Your committee leave it to the judgment of the house whether this particular sum was less under the direction of the Earl of Orford than if it had passed through his own hands." * If Walpole ever took the trouble to compare the thing thus bought with the price thus given he must have felt that the folly of his agents was quite on a par with the stupidity of his hacks. The report of the secret committee was received with public contempt, according to Tindal. No proceedings were taken upon it. Lord Orford sat quietly in the House of Lords, where his great rival, Pulteney, soon afterward sat, as Earl of Bath. When they met in that house Orford walked up to Bath, and thus congratulated him on his elevation: "Here we are, my lord; the two most insignificant fellows in England."

Maria Theresa, Queen of Hungary, is wedded to Francis, Grand Duke of Tuscany. The heiress of Charles VI. is twenty-three years of age. Her subjects cheerfully acknowledge the validity of her title, guaranteed as it had been by nearly all the European powers. The Elector of Bavaria first disputed the succession of the young queen. He had a prior claim, he maintained, under the will of the emperor Ferdinand I.—a somewhat antiquated document. France and Spain supported this claim, happy in a chance of lowering the house of Austria. England and Holland adhered to the guarantee which they had given to the late emperor. The German electors were compared to the humbler English electors—they thought it a proper opportunity to make the most of their votes. While other sovereign princes were devising some decent pretext for breaking up the peace of the world, that they might each clutch something in the affray, one prince, stronger and bolder than the rest, dashed into hostilities. Frederick II., King of Prussia, according to most historians, "availed himself of the emperor's death to revive some obsolete claims to certain duchies and lordships of Silesia." † The King of Prussia "demanded of the court of Vienna part of Silesia, by virtue of old treaties of cofraternity which were either obsolete or annulled." ‡ The claim was a somewhat "obsolete" one, dating from the time of the Thirty Years' War, when certain territories, including the castle of Jägerndorf, were seized by Ferdinand II.; and no subsequent kaiser "would let go the hold." § The claim was attempted to be "annulled" in 1686, by "a plan actually not unlike that of swindling money-lenders to a young gentleman in difficulties and of manageable turn who has got into their hands,"* The father of Frederick II. growled over the thought of his ravished territory. The "sharp little man, little in stature, but large in faculty and renown"—who found himself, in 1740, something higher than a crown prince who had endured manifold beatings in the hope that his own good time was coming—opened the strong boxes that had been filled during twenty-eight years of royal savings, and led thirty thousand of the well-drilled Prussian grenadiers to the invasion of Silesia. It was not a very chivalrous movement. He proposed to Maria Theresa that he would support her claim to the succession generally if she would cede to him the one province which had been taken from his ancestors. While a Prussian soldier is on Silesian ground, replied the spirited queen, I will enter upon no terms. Frederick knew that he should not be without friends in an attack upon the Austrian power. He took the cool view of his position which was to be expected from his nature and his rough training in kingship. To the French ambassador at Berlin he said (if Voltaire reports him rightly) as he set out with his invading army, "I am going, I believe, to play your game; and if I should throw doublets we will share the stakes." The royal philosopher who thus knows his trade at twenty-eight will certainly keep the world stirring in his time, for good or for evil.

Frederick encountered little opposition in Silesia. The Austrian troops retreated into Moravia, while the Prussians had secured the greater part of the territory which they invaded, with the exception of three fortified towns. The Austrian general, Neipperg, returned to Silesia with an army of twenty-four thousand men. On the 10th of April, 1741, a great battle was fought at Molwitz, near the fortified town of Brierg. The Austrian cavalry routed the Prussian cavalry, and Frederick himself was driven far beyond the field of action. A charge of cowardice has been raised against the King of Prussia for his conduct on this occasion. It rests upon a relation of Maupertuis, the French mathematician, who was in his suite. When his attendants seemed in danger from the attack of an Austrian outpost, he rode off, exclaiming, "Farewell, my friends, I am better mounted than you all are." The Prussian infantry redeemed the temporary defeat, and won the battle. Frederick, in his own history of his time, says that Molwitz was the school of himself and his troops, and that he afterward reflected deeply upon the errors which he had committed. He said that Neipperg and himself had been trying which could commit the most faults. But Prussia had won; and France was now ready to make common cause with the victor. England, as we have seen, abided by its old engagements, and voted a subsidy to the Queen of Hungary. But Walpole still tried the effect of negotiations; and the Elector of Hanover, disregarding the feeling of the English parliament, tried the effect of neutrality. Two French armies joined the forces of the Elector of Bavaria, and were moving upon Vienna. Maria Theresa fled into Hungary. At Presburg the diet was assembled, and the beautiful queen, with her infant son in her arms, appealed to the hereditary valor of the Hungarian states to protect her. She spoke not the language of their country, but she spoke Latin, which had not yet ceased to be the language of the high-born and the learned, and which was well understood in Hungary. "We will die for our king, Maria Theresa," was the shout of the assembly. The woman-king roused the people as effectually as the cry in our own day would be for "our queen and governor." From the most distant provinces of that interesting country the people assembled in arms. They forgot the miseries they had endured from their Austrian rulers. They recollected that at her coronation in the previous June she had taken the oath, which previous Austrian sovereigns had abolished, to maintain the ancient privileges of their nation. The Elector of Bavaria, with his French allies, did not attack Vienna, which the husband of Maria Theresa remained to defend. The elector entered Bohemia, and took Prague by surprise on the 25th of November. Here he was crowned King of Bohemia; and he next reached the summit of ambition by being chosen Emperor of Germany, as Charles VII. But the great quarrel of the Austrian succession was not determined by this success. In 1742 the levies of Maria Theresa, under the command of Prince Charles of Lorraine, held the French in check in Bohemia, and another army defeated the French and Bavarians at Linz. The Austrians entered Bavaria; and Munich, the capital city of the elector, was occupied by his adversaries on the day that he was chosen emperor at Frankfort. The struggle continued with various successes and reverses on either side. Frederick saw that his business was again to press for the cession of Silesia. He again negotiated, and again could not obtain his demand. His army, powerful enough to turn the scale in such a contest as was going forward, took the field; and he defeated the Austrians in Bohemia, on the 17th of May, 1742. On the 15th of July King George, in closing the session, exulted in the success of his endeavors "to bring about an accommodation between those princes whose union was most necessary in this critical conjuncture. The treaty lately concluded between the Queen of Hungary and the King of Prussia, under my mediation, and so highly to the honor of Great Britain, must undoubtedly produce the best consequences to the common cause." That treaty gave Prussia Silesia. It was the first step in the career of Frederick II. toward raising his small kingdom into the position of one of the greater European states—in time to become one of the greatest.

The fall of Walpole was followed by a shifting of some of the officers of government. The people looked on, and saw that nothing else was changed. They had joined the cry of a parliamentary faction to hunt down one man. They looked in vain for any bettering of their domestic condition—for any signal display of national greatness. Some violent demagogues had talked of the scaffold for the minister who had governed the nation without bloodshed or proscription, at a period when a less firm hand would have encouraged the Jacobites, and a less merciful hand would have hunted them into desperation. The mob carried about his effigy. "Satan" and "Bob" figured together in caricatures. The excitement was soon over. Walpole's ascendency was the real keystone of the opposition arch, itself composed of very loose materials. The keystone was displaced, and the arch fell to pieces. Some of the opposition got places, others got none. The only change which could be popularly understood was that an apparent reconciliation took place between the king and the Prince of Wales. The prince went to court, and the king asked his royal highness after the health of the princess. The Duke of Argyle desired to form a coalition ministry—what was then first termed "a broad bottom." The plan would not succeed, and the duke retired in disgust. The king would have nothing to say to the Tories. Instead of a minute relation of the rivalries and jealousies of this period, a clever story, told by Horace Walpole, may stand in the place of graver history. The Duke of Newcastle gave a great dinner at Claremont to his new colleagues. The servants, as was customary at this period, all got drunk. At the inn near the gate of Richmond Park, of which Walpole was ranger, the coachman who was driving Lord Bath [Pulteney], Lord Carteret, Lord Limerick, and Mr. Furness, tumbled off the box—he alone being left of the liveried troop. The innkeeper was asked if he could convey them to town. No, not he; perhaps he could get Lord Orford's coachman to drive them. They accepted the offer. Horace tells the sequel: "Lord Orford has been at court again to-day. Lord Carteret came up to thank him for his coachman, the Duke of Newcastle standing by. My father said, 'My lord, when the duke is near overturning you, you have nothing to do but to send for me, and I will save you.'" A ballad was sung in the streets to the burden of Derry Down, in which this event had its moral:

> "Learn hence, honest Britons, in spite of your pains, > That Orford, old coachman, still governs the reins."*

Lord Carteret was the only member of the cabinet who possessed high ability. Pitt was not called to office. His exclusion was no doubt owing to the personal dislike of the king. Neither had Chesterfield or Lyttleton places. Carteret was a favorite of George and of his son. He was a general favorite, from his wit, his accomplishments, his gay humor. But he was a very indifferent substitute for the keen and painstaking Walpole, who, like all really great men, did not despise petty things, or think it beneath him to attend to the small details of public affairs. Carteret was satisfied to lead the king, by entering into his majesty's aspirations to hold the scales of European policy, and to command armies. He was asked by the chief justice to make an appointment to some office. "What is it to me," exclaimed the dashing minister, "who is a judge and who is a bishop? It is my business to make kings and emperors, and to maintain the balance of Europe." The balance was to be held by taking sixteen thousand Hanoverian troops into English pay. When the king opened the session on the 16th of November, 1742, and mentioned "sixteen thousand of my electoral troops," as sent to the Low Countries, "with the Hessians in the British pay," it was felt that England was getting mixed up with Hanover in a way that Walpole would have scarcely dared to attempt. A grant of 657,000*l.* was proposed by the secretary of war to defray the cost of these troops. Then the national jealousy of foreign mercenaries, which the genius of William III. was unable to stand up against, burst forth in contemptuous disregard of the king's relations with his hereditary state. Sir John St. Aubyn said that undoubtedly his majesty had a most passionate love for his native country—a passion which arises from virtue. "I wish that those who have the honor to be of his councils would imitate his royal example, and show a passion for their native country too; that they would faithfully stand forth and say, that as king of this country, whatever interests may interfere with it, this country is to be his first, his principal care; that in the Act of Settlement this is an express condition." Pitt was even bolder: "It is now too apparent that this great, this powerful, this formidable kingdom, is considered only as a province to a despicable electorate." The ministers commanded a majority. But such invectives went deep into the heart of the nation. It must be borne in mind that England was really not engaged in war with France, though she was paying troops to fight against the cause which France supported. She sent auxiliaries to the house of Austria, and these auxiliaries would necessarily come into conflict with the auxiliaries which France sent against the house of Austria. The absurdity of the situation was well expressed by Horace Walpole: "We have the name of war with Spain without the thing, and war with France without the name."

Twenty-one years have passed since Great Britain was agitated by rumors of Jacobite plots and insurrections. The execution of Layer and the banishment of Atterbury had gradually gone out of the popular mind; and it appeared to be forgotten that the Stuart, who had been hailed as king at Scone in 1716, was residing at Rome, and that he had two sons growing into manhood. As long as Britain was at peace there was little to be apprehended from James Edward or Charles Edward. The son of James II. lived a retired life, although he was treated by the papal court with the homage due to a reigning sovereign. His consort had died in 1735. The two young men, who were called Prince of Wales and Duke of York, had been very imperfectly educated, had displayed no marked abilities, and knew little of the history and real condition of the country which they were sedulously taught was their absolute inheritance, from which an usurper must be some day driven. There were always partisans in England and Scotland ready to communicate every turn in politics to the Duke of Ormond, to the Earl Marischal, to the titular Earl of Dunbar, who formed the principal persons of the little court at Rome. In Scotland there was an association engaged to restore the exiled family—some held together by honest principles—others, such as Lord Lovat, disappointed in some object of selfish ambition, and ready to throw off their allegiance to the government which had not duly bought them. In England Walpole knew all the Jacobites, and counted the greater number as honest enemies. He kept his eye upon the great families, the Somersets and the Wynns; denounced Wyndham in parliament, and propitiated Shippen. But he never went out of his way to pry into plots or to arrest plotters. As long as Walpole was in power, and England was at peace with foreign states, the Stuarts had no chance of winning a throne by revolt and invasion. When Walpole fell, and England was at war with Spain and France—when the pacific French minister, Cardinal Fleury, was succeeded by the more energetic and more wily Cardinal Tencin—the vulnerable point in the position of the house of Brunswick was to be hit. In 1743 a great invasion was projected from France. Charles Edward was urged to leave Rome and repair to Paris. He was nominally to command an army of veterans assembled at Dunkirk, having the great Marshal Saxe to lead the troops which were to drive the Elector of Hanover from his usurped throne. The expedition sailed at the beginning of 1744 from Dunkirk. A great storm destroyed or scattered the fleet of transports, and Sir John Norris, who was ready for a fight in the Channel, was content to pick up a few dismasted vessels. Marshal Saxe went to take the command of an army in the Low Countries, and Charles Edward secluded himself at Gravelines till a more favorable occasion should arise when he should emerge from his obscurity as Regent of Great Britain and Ireland.

When the king prorogued the parliament on the 21st of April, 1743, he announced that, at the requisition of the Queen of Hungary, he had ordered his army, in conjunction with the Austrian troops, to pass the Rhine. His majesty immediately departed for Germany. The British troops in Flanders, under the command of the Earl of Stair, had marched toward the Rhine in February. They were joined by the sixteen thousand Hanoverians in the pay of England, and by some Austrian regiments commanded by the Duke of Aremberg. In May the army had crossed the Rhine, and had taken up a station at Hochst, near Frankfort. Stair was waiting for Hanoverians and Hessians to add to his numbers; for the French Marshal de Noailles, with an army of sixty thousand men, was within a few leagues of the British general's position. Stair made an imprudent movement, by which he was cut off from his supplies at Hanau. King George reached the army on the 19th of June, accompanied by his second son, the Duke of Cumberland. The forty thousand men were reduced to thirty-seven thousand; they were on short rations, and the horses without forage. Their position was an unfavorable one near the village of Dettingen; the French general was at hand with a superior force. It was absolutely necessary that the allies should return to their magazines at Hanau. On the 27th of June, before sunrise, they had commenced their march from Aschaffenburg toward Dettingen. They were ignorant of the exact position of the French, fancying their principal force was toward Aschaffenburg, in their rear. In this belief the king took the command of the rear-guard, as the post of danger. A large body of French were in their front, to contest the passage of the allies through the defile of Dettingen. George immediately rode from the rear to form his army in order of battle, with the almost desperate resolution of forcing the strong French lines. The brave little man was surrounded by dangers. As he marched from Aschaffenburg the French entered the place with twelve thousand men. Behind and before was the enemy, in most formidable numbers, shutting him up in a narrow valley. Grammont, the nephew of Noailles—eager to engage, in the temporary absence of his uncle, who had ridden off to bring up additional force—rushed forward from a formidable position covered by a morass, to charge with his cavalry. George dismounted, drew his sword, and put himself at the head of the right of his British and Hanoverians, exclaiming, "Now, boys, now for the honor of England; fire, and behave bravely, and the French will soon run." The infantry thus led on did behave bravely, and did make the French soon run. The Duke of Cumberland, who commanded the left, displayed the same courage as his father. The battle of Dettingen afforded no display for high military skill on the part of the British commanders. They had desperately to fight their way out of a difficulty; and they had troops upon whose bravery and steadiness they could confidently rely. The battle was not over till four in the afternoon, but the victory was complete on the part of the allies. The French could offer no resistance to the retreat to Hanau, which again gave the half-starved British, Hanoverians, and Austrians the command of abundant supplies. At Hanau they were joined by their reinforcements, and an invasion of France was even talked of. It was wise in King George not to be flushed with his triumph, and to resist the advice of Stair to attempt some perilous adventure. It was complained that the king did not listen to the counsels of his English officers, but had Hanoverian partialities. Stair, the Duke of Marlborough, and others, resigned their commissions. The success of the allies in the campaign was completed by the expulsion of the French armies from Germany, by the forces under Prince Charles of Lorraine. The king was received in England with an enthusiasm which he had never before excited. But the complaints of Lord Stair and others revived the old cry of Hanoverian influence. The Hanoverian White Horse, in cocked hat and jack-boots, riding the feeble British Lion, was the subject of a popular caricature.

In August, 1743, while the king was on the continent, Henry Pelham, brother of the Duke of Newcastle, had been appointed first lord of the treasury. Walpole had identified this office with the position of a prime minister; but Carteret, the secretary of state, who had accompanied George in his campaign, had really controlled the cabinet. Carteret was now the great object of attack from the opposition. He was the Hanoverian minister—the wicked minister. Succeeding to some of the power of Walpole, he had inherited no inconsiderable portion of the odium which attached to every servant of a king who, unfortunately, had other interests to promote than that of the country which had called his family to the throne. The violent tone of the parliamentary debates led foreigners to believe, as they always believe under such circumstances, that Great Britain was torn to pieces by internal dissensions, and that the time was ripe for dynastic changes, if not for invasion and conquest. It was this belief which suggested the abortive attempt of 1744, which we have briefly noticed. The instant that the country really appeared in danger, the most eloquent opponents of the administration—the most indignant declaimers against Hanoverian partialities—those who would have disbanded every foreign soldier, without any substitute for national defence—raised a voice in parliament for the defence of the nation and the throne, which, as in many similar instances, made foreigners wonder at the inconsistencies of representative assemblies. On the 20th of March, 1744, France declared war against England. There was an end of that anomalous state of things, in which two great states were fighting against each other, not as principals, but as auxiliaries of other governments. The English declaration of war was issued on the 31st of March.

The continental war of 1744 was chiefly marked by the sudden movement of the King of Prussia against the Austrians. He overran Bohemia, but evacuated it before the end of the year. The King of England, very much against his will, was restrained by the general voice of his council, with the exception of Carteret, now Earl Granville, from leaving England. The difference of opinion on these Hanoverian questions soon made it impossible that the ministry could hold together. Pelham had succeeded Walpole in his command of the House of Commons. Granville had the king with him. It was clear which party would triumph. The king was obliged to part with his favorite—a man far more able than those who insisted on his dismissal, but whose very ability was more dangerous than their mediocrity. The Duke of Newcastle and his brother desired a coalition of parties. They wanted old Jacobites, like Sir Hinde Cotton, to be associated with young patriots, like Chesterfield and Pitt. The greatest member of the opposition refused to take an office inferior to that of secretary of state. But Pitt did not oppose the new government. At the risk of that charge of inconsistency which feeble statesmen always dread, he supported a grant for the continuance of the army in Flanders—a measure which he had before opposed. "He showed how much the question was changed from what it was last year, when a certain fatal influence prevailed in his majesty's councils. The object then seemed to be the multiplying war upon war, expense upon expense, and the abetting the house of Austria in romantic schemes of acquisition, such as the recovery of the Avulsa Imperii, without regard to the immediate interest of Great Britain. The object now was, by connecting ourselves closely with Holland, to arrive at a situation which might enable us to hold out fair and reasonable terms of peace, both to our friends and enemies, and not to prosecute the war a moment longer than we could obtain an equitable and sufficient security for our own rights, and those of our allies, pursuant to public treaties. . . . He thought a dawn of salvation to this country had broke forth, and he would follow it as far as it would lead him. He should be the greatest dupe in the world if those now at the helm did not mean the honor of their master, and the good of the nation; if he found himself deceived, nothing would be left but to act with an honest despair." * The great Commoner was no doubt sincere in his belief; yet there was little change in the system of subsidizing foreign powers and paying foreign troops.

The Earl of Chesterfield, before he entered upon the appointment he had accepted as lord lieutenant of Ireland, went upon a mission to the Hague, to concert military operations with the Dutch government. The great object to be attained was that the Duke of Cumberland should be appointed commander-in-chief of the confederate army. Before the campaign of 1745 was opened the Emperor Charles the Seventh died at Munich. His son, the new Elector of Bavaria, withdrew his claim to the Austrian succession, and separated his troops from the army of the French. Maria Theresa restored her conquests in Bavaria. In March, 1745, Lord Orford died. The evils which he had for many years averted by his pacific policy were coming thick upon his country.

The campaign of 1745, in Flanders, was long memorable for such a display of the qualities of the British soldier as have often made the purely military nations of Europe look on with wonder. As often, in the long interval between the days of Marlborough and of Wellington, have they equally wondered at the incapacity of those commanders under whom these qualities were displayed. The French army, seventy-six thousand in number, had taken the field under Marshal Saxe. His name alone was sufficient to give confidence to his men and to induce caution in his enemies. To oppose him was the young Duke of Cumberland, under the tutelage of an old Austrian marshal, and controlled in some respects by the Dutch commander. The united army scarcely reached fifty thousand in number. At the beginning of May the French suddenly invested Tournay. The States-General pressed for the relief of this fortress, the strongest in Flanders, and the Duke of Cumberland advanced at the head of his forces to encounter the sixty thousand French that were collected in advance of Tournay. Marshal Saxe had taken up a strong position on rising ground, with the village of Fontenoy in front. His right rested on the village of Antoin and the Scheldt, his left on the wood of Barré. This position was strengthened by all the resources of military science. Redoubts were constructed; the villages were fortified; abatis were formed in the wood. On the 10th of May [N. S.] the Duke of Cumberland's army had driven in the French outposts, and he issued orders for an attack on the French. At four o'clock on the morning of the 11th the allies advanced; and by nine o'clock the engagement had become general. The French commanders were astonished that an enemy inferior in numbers should attack them in a position so apparently unassailable. Louis XV. and the dauphin had joined the army, and they looked upon a sight which told them of England's strength—perhaps of England's weakness. The Dutch commander, the Prince of Waldeck, had undertaken to carry Antoin and Fontenoy by assault. He could not stand up against the fire of the French batteries, and he retired to some distance from the field, rendering no help to the English and Hanoverians. The ground was too rugged, it is said, for the operations of cavalry. William of Cumberland formed a column of fourteen thousand British infantry, thirty or forty abreast; and with measured tread, regardless of every natural obstacle, undismayed by the cannonade left and right which mowed down their ranks, this terrible column strode on through the enemy's lines, carrying all before them.

Marshal Saxe urged the king and his son to retire; but they had the spirit to remain, and see the end of this unparalleled advance. The Duke de Grammont had fallen—he whose rashness lost the day of Dettingen. The French cavalry had charged the British column again and again. Still it marched on. But where was their support? A column of infantry, without a horse, without a gun, now reduced probably to ten thousand, could not win a battle against sixty thousand, merely through the supremacy of physical strength and moral endurance. Voltaire says that if the Dutch had moved when this wonderful column had broken through the French ranks, there had been no chance even of retreat for Marshal Saxe and his king. At the moment when all was confusion, the young Duke de Richelieu advised that a battery should be brought up so as to fire down the length of the column, while it was attacked in flank by the divisions that had been released from Antoin and Fontenoy. The guns fired right at the advancing front. The French household troops and the Irish brigade charged on all sides. Slowly the compact mass moved back, still facing the enemy. Its ranks were not broken, not a man fled. It moved back, till the cavalry came up to cover the retreat. When the ramparts of Ath were reached, the British had lost above four thousand men killed, and the Hanoverians nearly two thousand. This number of killed is judged to have been underrated. The Dutch loss was about fifteen hundred. The French acknowledged a loss of seven thousand. Nothing was gained by the extraordinary advance of the British infantry—"a noble precursor of the heroic madness of Balaklava."* Yet the battle of Fontenoy was long remembered by the nation as something which added to its military fame—not a victory, but "a soldier's battle," which had its own glory.

We are about to open the last chapter of that tragic volume whose first chapter commences at the eventful period when the great-grandfather of Prince Charles Edward set up the royal standard at Nottingham, at the beginning of that civil war which was to decide whether England was thenceforth to have the freedom of her people as the basis of her government, or whether she was to resign herself to the crushing weight of an absolute monarchy, such as other nations were consenting to endure. In reading this last chapter, it is our belief that freemen ought to read it, as they have read many previous pages of the same eventful history, with the constant feeling that the welfare of the governed is of far higher importance than the personal successes or misfortunes of those who govern them, or claim to be their governors. This is not the romantic view of public affairs; but it is the only rational view. It is the only view that will stand the test of any investigation of the causes of the greatness of nations, and in the greatness of nations we include "the greatest happiness for the greatest number." We may surrender our feelings to the charm of the early chivalry; we may admire, and even reverence, the passionate loyalty of the cavalier; we may drop a tear for the misfortunes of an exiled family, and believe that they had a hard measure of justice; we may especially take a deep interest in the daring adventure of a young prince, who, without foreign aid, threw himself upon the affections of an enthusiastic people, and claimed their allegiance for the descendants of a great line of kings, renowned in story long before the union of the crowns of Scotland and England. But in spite of all these natural emotions, let us never forget that the real fight was on one side for constitutional government, on the other side for irresponsible power; on one side for progress, on the other for retrogression; on one side for spiritual freedom, on the other for an intolerant church, if not for the establishment of a faith that was hateful to the nation, and which it was impossible to bring back, even by the most lavish outpouring of blood on the battle-field and on the scaffold.

In 1744 a bill was passed "to make it high treason to hold correspondence with the sons of the pretender to his majesty's crown, in case they shall land or attempt to land in Great Britain." In both houses the bill was debated with much eloquence; especially a clause by which the term of forfeitures for high treason was extended beyond the life of the pretender to continue during the lives of his two sons. Lord Chesterfield was one of the ablest opponents of this bill; and the chief ground of his opposition was that the politicians and patriots of the reign of Anne thought it necessary to end the extension of penalties to the descendants of traitors when the life of the pretender was ended. If those who passed that law were to return, would they discover any reasons to alter their resolutions? "If they were to cast their eyes over the nation, they would find the faction of the Jacobites, which was then so numerous, so daring, so factious, and so potent, is now shrunk into a sect almost invisible, and equally despicable for the smallness of its number and the absurdity of its principles; a sect without influence, without property, without policy, and without leaders, without money, and without arms; a sect, therefore, from which nothing can be hoped by our enemies, and from which nothing is now to be feared; a sect which its own stupidity will extinguish, and which probably will be scarcely heard of in another generation." We extract this passage to show the conviction of a very eminent statesman that Jacobitism in England was "a creed outworn." Looking at the real prosperity of the people under a mild government—to which the only serious objection that could be made was that its head was a foreigner—we may well believe that in England the system of half a century would be in little danger from an insane passion for the abstract doctrine of hereditary right. And yet, in 1743, after the fall of Walpole, Carte, the historian, an agent of James, thought that the prospects of the exiled house were more hopeful: "Your majesty's cause seems to me to have derived several advantages from that session. Among these I reckon the utter contempt into which Prince Frederick is fallen by his conduct at that time, so that nobody for the future will have any recourse to him, or dependence upon him; but, in case of discontent, will naturally look out for redress from another quarter: and I think the events of that session will naturally enough keep the people from ever expecting redress of their grievances in a parliamentary way, or from any change of a ministry, or indeed in any way but by your majesty's restoration."* These were the blind views of partisanship—views which the Stuarts, who knew little of the workings of representative government, and foreigners, who knew less of the anomalous conditions under which public liberty exists, were always prone to adopt. In a debate in the Commons, on the bill to prevent correspondence with the pretender's sons, it was justly said: "However much we here at home may distinguish between discontent and disaffection, it is not easy for foreigners to comprehend the distinction; therefore, when they hear of general discontents among the people they are apt to conclude that the greatest part of the people are Jacobites, and that they may overset our established government by throwing in a handful of regular troops among us, to give countenance to a general insurrection."†

The popular temper of Scotland was essentially different from that of England. There was not only discontent, there was disaffection. In the Highlands there was a social organization peculiarly fitted to place a large military population under the absolute control of a few daring and ambitious chiefs. The feudal principle, that the will of the lord was the only law for his vassals, was eminently adapted to fit in with the principle of implicit obedience to the right divine of kings. The Highlanders had always despised the industry by which the Lowlanders were slowly advancing in wealth and civilization. The Lowlanders had always regarded with apprehension the bold and predatory habits of the Highlanders—dreaded them as thieves, and looked upon them with contempt as savages. But at the period of which we are speaking, "while the severance between the two races inhabiting Scotland was as distinct as ever—almost more distinct from Lowland progress in civilization—much of the hostile bitterness had passed away on both sides. The mountaineers were looked upon as kindly Scots, who were in some respects the main sufferers from common hardships."‡ It has been objected to Walpole, that, after the suppression of the rebellion in 1715, and during the long continuance of peace, he took no effectual means to make the Highlands a source of strength to the government—to enlist the clans in the common service of the country, and to place confidence in their chiefs. Why should not Highlanders have formed then, as they have formed since, a powerful arm of the British military power? Mr. Burton has answered the question: "To have drafted so many of the clans, with their native hierarchy, into the British army, would have been, in many instances, embodying a force for the use of the exiled house."§ Duncan Forbes, in 1738, proposed that Highland regiments should be raised, to be commanded by an Englishman, but with Highland officers under him; and that these should be sent on foreign service. Chatham adopted this principle, after the last sparks of rebellion had been trodden out; but, in the mean while, the only native forces in the Highlands consisted of the independent companies, known as "The Black Watch"—a sort of police, but wholly under the control of the chiefs of the clans from which they were taken. The Black Watch was abolished, and out of these companies was formed the famous Forty-second. That regiment, when quartered in London in 1743, was exposed to the ignorant scoffs of a rude multitude, who laughed at their peculiar dress and their unintelligible language. "Proud as Spanish hidalgoes," the whole body of rank and file marched off; and, having at length surrendered, some of the more mutinous were sent to the West Indies. The greater number, afterward serving in Flanders, distinguished themselves for their steadiness and bravery. The Scottish Lowlanders at this period were far behind their English neighbors in agricultural and commercial industry. There was progress, but not rapid progress. Wherever there was poverty, it was attributed to the union. The great support of the Stuarts was to be found in the Highlands; and that support almost wholly depended upon the absolute control of the chiefs over their clans. In the Lowlands men judged for themselves, and weighed their real or imaginary grievances in one scale and the danger of revolt in the other. But there was unquestionably a strong disposition to Jacobitism. There was irritation from fiscal exactions; there was irritation from the sensitiveness of national pride. But Jacobitism had also a strong hold upon the imaginative character of the Scottish people. Charles Edward, says Mr. Burton, "became a sort of idol of the imagination, with those whose politics and religion would have compelled them to vote against him, had the question of his succession to the crown been a matter of deliberative adjustment."

Whether Charles Edward understood, or not, the curious complication of motives upon which he was to depend for support in Scotland—whether he correctly saw that in Scotland there were far stronger elements of success than in England—he took the sound resolution of making a bold experiment for the restoration of his house, by throwing himself upon the loyalty of a people who would incur some peril to welcome a descendant of the Bruce. Since the failure of the expedition of 1744 the government of Louis XV. had manifested no inclination to render further assistance of men and money to a perilous enterprise. It has been pointed out "that several Protestant princes, the King of Prussia more especially, had remonstrated against the support which France was giving to the Roman Catholic party in Great Britain." * Charles Edward was indignant at this lukewarmness. But he had made up his mind to a bold step; and he concealed his purpose with an adroitness which scarcely belonged to a young man of twenty-three, but with a sort of hereditary instinct. He writes to his father, in June, 1745, "If your majesty was in this country, I flatter myself you would be surprised to see with your own eyes how I blind several, and impose upon them, at the same time they think to do it to me." † Five days afterward, as he informs his father, Charles Edward has taken his final resolution: "I believe your majesty little expected a courier at this time, and much less from me, to tell you a thing that will be a great surprise to you. I have been, above six months ago, invited by our friends to go to Scotland, and to carry what money and arms I could conveniently get; this being, they are fully persuaded, the only way of restoring you to the crown, and them to their liberties. After such scandalous usage as I have received from the French court, had I not given my word to do so, or got so many encouragements from time to time as I have had, I should have been obliged in honor, and for my own reputation, to have flung myself into the arms of my friends, and die with them, rather than live longer in such a miserable way here, or be obliged to return to Rome, which would be just giving up all hopes. I cannot but mention a parable here, which is—a horse that is to be sold, if spurred he does not skip, or show some sign of life, nobody would care to have him, even for nothing; just so my friends would care very little to have me, if, after such usage, which all the world is sensible of, I should not show that I have life in me. Your majesty cannot disapprove a son's following the example of his father." ‡ He adds, in the same letter, "I have been obliged to steal off, without letting the King of France so much as suspect it."

NOTE ON THE BATTLE OF DETTINGEN.

THE following account of the battle of Dettingen is extracted from an unpublished letter of the Hon. Henry Conway (afterward Marshal Conway), addressed to his brother Lord Conway, from the camp at Hainault, June 30th, 1743, N. S. This letter forms part of a series in the possession of the author of 'The Popular History of England.' It is singular that Conway makes no allusion to the uncommon occurrence of a King of England being in the field.

"On Thursday last, the 26th, we marched at daybreak from our camp at Aschaffenburg, the guards making the rear-guard of the army, which in a retreat is looked upon as the post of honor, but proved quite the contrary on this occasion by throwing us entirely out of the action; which happened thus: Before we were marched much above a league from Aschaffenburg the enemy's cannon began playing very briskly upon our vanguard from the other side of the river, and continued flanking us as we advanced toward a village called Detting upon the Maine; here the French to the number of forty thousand had passed the river upon two bridges of boats, and drew up as we advanced upon a plain before the village. Our army formed in two lines upon the plain, the first consisting of English, and the second of Austrians and Hanoverians. Our brigade, which I told you made the rear-guard with another of Hanoverians and a few horse, marched off to the right, to avoid being flanked by the French camp, and were posted upon a hill with a large wood between us and the rest of the army. This wood covered the right flank of our army, and the river was on the left. The attack was begun by the French horse, chiefly of the Maison du Roi, upon our foot, who broke them entirely and repulsed them with great loss. Some of our horse and dragoons suffered a good deal, particularly Bland's dragoons, of which but one squadron out of three remained fit for service, and very few of the officers escaped. Major Honeywood, who commanded them, received five wounds, and is thought in a dangerous way. They behaved with vast resolution, and broke five squadrons of the enemy. Ligonier's horse suffered a good deal, as did Pembroke's (Honeywood's now) from the cannon. The blues suffered more in their reputation than otherwise; as did Honeywood's at first, by doing what is vulgarly called running away—in the military phrase retreating with too much precipitation. The English foot, particularly Johnstoun's, Onslow's, and the old and new buffs, behaved with astonishing bravery, and contributed greatly to our gaining what may be properly called a victory, as the enemy suffered a good deal in the flower of their troops, and left us master of the field, by retiring very precipitately over the Maine. As soon as the attack began, the guards were missed, and sent for in great haste, but being ill-conducted by our guide, the enemy were retired before we came upon the plain, where we had the honor of sharing the victory by passing one of the wettest and coldest nights I ever felt upon the ground among the slain and wounded of both sides. Our loss is said at most not to exceed a thousand, and that of the French may, I believe, moderately be called four or five; some say seven or nine. What made it heavier to them was, that it fell among the best of their troops, as the Mousquetaires, of whom they say but fourscore remained out of 400. The gendarmerie, Chevaux Legers, and cuirassiers suffered vastly, as one might know from the vast number of breast-plates that were found on the field."

CHAPTER CLV.

Prince Charles Edward arrives at Eriska—Lands at Borodale—His interviews with chiefs of clans—The gathering at Glenfinnan—Military resources of the government—Sir John Cope—Highland army marches to Perth—Preparations for defence at Edinburgh—Charles Edward at Holyrood House—Cope's army lands at Dunbar—Battle of Preston Pans—Charles Edward's sojourn at Edinburgh—Siege of the castle—English opinions of the rebellion. Note on the Highland costume.

On the 23d of July, 1745, a French vessel, carrying sixteen guns, is lying off Eriska, one of the small western isles between Barra and South Uist. An eagle is hovering over the ship, as if watching the unwonted disturbance of the solitude of these dreary regions; and the presence of the king of birds is hailed as a welcome to a royal stranger who is on board.* Prince Charles Edward is on board, with seven friends or attendants, one of whom is the Marquis of Tullibardine, called by the Jacobites Duke of Athol. The prince has been eighteen days at sea, in La Doutelle the little vessel which he has hired to make a descent upon the kingdom which he deems his patrimony; proposing, with a few hundred muskets and broadswords, and with four thousand louis-d'ors, to overthrow an usurping government, which kept his father and himself from the enjoyment of their hereditary rights. The prince has had some perilous incidents in his voyage from Belleisle. A large French ship-of-war, which was his convoy, has been disabled in an engagement with an English man-of-war; and La Doutelle has been chased by other hostile cruisers. The arms, ammunition, and money are at last put on shore at Eriska, and the prince and his followers land on the dreary island. The night is wet and stormy. They find shelter in the house of Angus MacDonald, the tacksman; but this house, the best of the district, belonging to the principal proprietor, was unprovided with any other vent for the peat smoke than the accustomed hole in the roof. Charles Edward, reared in Italian palaces—he who had lately parted with the luxurious accommodations of the Château de Navarre, the seat of the Duke de Bouillon, at Evreux—was choked with the cloud that arose from the fire in the centre of the room. To the inhabitants of the hovel that smoke was pleasurable warmth. The prince again and again sought the open air. The indignant host, unconscious of the rank of his visitor, at length exclaimed, "What a plague is the matter with that fellow, that he can neither sit nor stand still, and neither keep within nor without door." †

From this rough retreat messengers were sent to various persons of consequence in those remote districts. With the exception of Tullibardine, who was attainted in 1715, there was no man of mark with the royal adventurer. His companions were chiefly Irishmen, "drawn into Scotland by the allurement which the enterprise held out to them of making their fortunes." ‡ The first Scottish gentleman who came to Charles Edward, and saw him on board La Doutelle, was MacDonald of Boisdale, brother of the chief of Clanranald. This prudent adviser—who was accused by the Jacobites of "playing the game of the government"—earnestly discountenanced the attempt to raise an insurrection without better means than the prince could show. He exhorted him to return home. "I am come home, sir," replied the prince; he would not go back: he relied on his faithful Highlanders. §

The little vessel now made sail for the mainland, and anchored in the Loch Na Nuagh, a small arm of the sea between the districts of Moidart and Arisaig. The journal of a Highland officer ‖ describes the appearance of the adventurer, as he presented himself on the deck of La Doutelle, where a tent had been erected. The prince, the young chief Clanranald, and MacDonald of Kinloch Moidart, had been for three hours in the cabin of Charles—they arguing against his project, he resolutely combating all their objections. "Clanranald returned to us, and in about half an hour after there entered the tent a tall youth of a most agreeable aspect, in a plain black coat, with a plain shirt not very clean, and a cambric stock fixed with a plain silver buckle; a fair round wig out of the buckle; a plain hat, with a canvas string having one end fixed to one of his coat buttons; he had black stockings, and brass buckles in his shoes." This is not the heroic costume in which imagination delights to dress up the adventurous prince. He was represented to be "ane English clergyman wha had long been possessed with a desire to see and converse with Highlanders." * The hesitation of the two chiefs was at length overcome by the enthusiasm of a younger brother of Kinloch Moidart. He had watched the eagerness of the tall youth, and the coldness of those whom he sought to convince. "When he gathered from their discourse that the stranger was the Prince of Wales; when he heard his chief and his brother refuse to take arms with their prince; his color went and came, his eyes sparkled, he shifted his place, and grasped his sword. Charles observed his demeanor, and turning briskly toward him, called out, 'Will not you assist me?' 'I will, I will,' said Ranald; 'though no other man in the Highlands should draw a sword, I am ready to die for you.' Without further deliberation the two MacDonalds declared that they also would join." This is dramatic. The narrator of the scene is John Home, the author of "Douglas." † Gradually more offers of support came by messengers to the prince, who remained on ship-board till the 25th of July. On that day he landed at Borodale, and took up his quarters at a farm-house belonging to Clanranald.

Charles Edward was not altogether unprepared to look to special quarters for assistance. He had combated the objections of MacDonald of Boisdale by the assurance that he could rely for aid upon MacDonald of Sleat, and the Laird of MacLeod, two powerful chiefs who could each raise more than his thousand followers. Clanranald, after his adhesion, was sent to the Isle of Skye to secure these personages. On the 3d of August MacLeod wrote from Dunvegan, in Skye, to Duncan Forbes, the lord president, to give information that "the pretended Prince of Wales is come on the coast;" with the intention, with a few followers, "to raise all the Highlands." The chief adds, "Sir Alexander MacDonald and I not only gave no sort of countenance to these people, but we used all the interest we had with our neighbors to follow the same prudent method." In a postscript MacLeod says, "Young Clanranald has been here with us, and has given us all possible assurances of his prudence." ‡ Young Clanranald did not succeed in his mission to these cautious chiefs. Charles Edward was more successful with Cameron of Lochiel. He had determined to persuade the prince to withdraw from his rash enterprise, although he had been one of the associates who was in correspondence with the pretender before the expedition from Dunkirk in 1744. Charles Edward and Lochiel met at Borodale. Lochiel for some time steadily maintained his resolve, although his brother had said to him on his way, "If this prince once sets his eyes upon you, he will make you do whatever he pleases." § Charles Edward at last declared that with the few friends he had he would raise the royal standard, win the crown of his ancestors, or perish in the attempt: "Lochiel, who my father often told me was our firmest friend, may stay at home, and learn from the newspapers the fate of his prince." Lochiel then passionately declared he would share his prince's fate. This is Home's poetical relation. There is a more prosaic version of this interview, "on the result of which depended peace or war;" for "if Lochiel had persisted in his refusal, the other chiefs would not have joined." ‖ Bishop Forbes relates that young Glengarry assured him, upon information derived from Charles Edward himself, that Lochiel "had refused to raise a man, or make any appearance, till the prince should give him security for the full value of his estate, in the event of the attempt proving abortive." * Cluny MacPherson "made the same agreement with the prince before he would join the attempt with his following."

On the 19th of August the prince proceeded to a general gathering of the friendly clans at Glenfinnan, a valley on the border of Loch Shiel. A day or two before, the first blood had been spilt in a skirmish between the Keppoch Macdonalds and a party of the Scots Royals proceeding to Fort William. The advantage was on the side of the daring band of Highlanders. When Charles Edward and his friends arrived at Glenfinnan the valley bore its usual aspect of a few poor inhabitants. But before noon the bagpipe was heard from the hills, and before evening fifteen hundred Highlanders were assembled. Tullibardine then raised a banner of red silk, with a white space in the centre. "The appearance of the standard was hailed by a storm of pipe-music, a cloud of skimmering bonnets, and a loud and enduring shout." † The attainted heir of the dukedom of Athol then read the declaration in the name of James VIII., dated from Rome in 1743, and the commission to his eldest son as prince regent. The "loud huzzas and skimming of bonnets up into the air, appearing like a cloud," ‡ which followed the rearing of the standard, was the tribute of simple men who obeyed the command of their chief, little heeding the arguments of the Stuart declaration, even if they understood its language. That declaration, promising redress of grievances under a lawful king, was to have its effect upon the general discontent of Scotland, in its denunciation of the union and of the fiscal exactions whch the union was held to have entailed. The government of an usurper was pronounced to be the cause of national miseries which a free parliament was to redress. The religious institutions of the country were to be respected. The regent promised indemnity for past treasons to all who should now take arms in his cause. Such arguments and promises were judicious. Nevertheless, "if the phraseology of these documents is examined, it is found that the royal prerogative, as the embodiment of legislative power, is carefully though not offensively or conspicuously reserved." § Few of the discontented in Scotland would carefully examine the phraseology of these documents. The rebellion was begun. Its first success would make the timid bold and the prudent rash. But in England every man not ignorant of the history of his country in the past century could scarcely fail to see that the real question at issue was whether the whole course of government since the expulsion of James II. had been a series of unlawful usurpations, or whether the national will was not something higher than the principle of divine right, asserted by the descendants of a bigoted tyrant. These declarations treated the whole contest for the throne of England as a personal question between the Elector of Hanover and the son of James II. Officers and soldiers were called upon to desert their colors and violate their oaths, "since they cannot but be sensible that no engagements entered into with a foreign usurper can dispense with the allegiance they owe to their natural sovereign." The British parliament rightly designated these proclamations as seditious and presumptuous declarations against the constitution of the United Kingdom.

When Charles Edward landed in Scotland, George II. was in Germany, and the government of Great Britain was directed by a regency. The administration regarded, as most official persons are inclined to regard, only the material means which the adventurer had at his command. They despised the chances of that popular enthusiasm for the exiled family which the apparent hopelessness of the young prince's cause carried forward into a personal admiration for his daring confidence. Had the descendant of their ancient kings landed in Scotland with ten thousand Frenchmen, he would have been eventually less powerful to overthrow the established government than when he set foot on Eriska with his seven followers. The sagacity and experience of the lord president could not see the effect which such undoubting trust has ever produced in converting cold friends into zealous partisans. Forbes wrote to the Marquis of Tweeddale, the Scotch secretary of state in London: "I am confident that young man cannot expect to be joined by any considerable force in the Highlands. Some loose lawless men, of desperate fortunes, may indeed resort to him; but I am persuaded that none of the Highland gentlemen who have aught to lose will, after the experience with which the year 1715 furnished them, think proper to risk their fortunes in an attempt which to them must appear desperate." * Tweeddale wrote to Forbes in reply, dating from Whitehall: "I own I have never been alarmed with the reports of the pretender's son landing in Scotland. I consider it as a rash and desperate attempt, that can have no other consequence than the ruin of those concerned in it." † This indifference was the narrow view of a professional statesman. Charles Edward knew his own power, when he wrote to his father that he was joined by brave people, of whose numbers he could not judge, as he had not yet set up his standard; but manfully adding, "The worst that can happen to me, if France does not succor me, is to die at the head of such brave people as I find here, if I should not be able to make my way; and that I have promised to them." ‡ The enterprise was not altogether so rash and desperate as the members of the government chose to think. The attempt was made when there were few troops in England and Scotland; when the British army in the Low Countries had been seriously crippled in the battle of Fontenoy; when no statesman who possessed the prudence of Walpole or the energy of Pitt was at the head of the British councils. In Scotland, in the August of 1745, there were less than three thousand troops, of which number only fourteen hundred were available to oppose the hostile clans. The commander-in-chief in Scotland was Sir John Cope, an officer of the routine school, scarcely able of himself to deal with a great emergency. Tweeddale expresses his hope that if Sir John Cope should speedily obey the orders he had received, there would be an end of the affair. § These orders were to attack the rebels in the mountains; and they assumed that the general would receive important aid from the well-affected clans. Cope marched from Stirling on the 20th of August toward Fort Augustus; and soon in his progress northward he discovered that he could rely little upon Highland auxiliaries. He heard of the successful gathering of the clans round the standard of the Stuarts; of the rapid increase of their forces as they marched onward. On the 28th Charles Edward was at the foot of Corriaraic, near Fort Augustus. Cope prudently declined to encounter him in the mountain passes, which the traditional victories of Highlanders over disciplined troops made well-trained veterans regard with something like apprehension. Cope resolved to march to Inverness—an extraordinary resolution, by which he left the Lowlands open to the advance of the rebels. The prince was urged to follow him. One account says, "I am assured that their young forward leader called for his Highland clothes; and that, at tying the latchets of his shoes, he solemnly declared that he would be up with Mr. Cope before they were unloosed." ‖ A wiser resolution was taken. The Highland army crossed the Grampians; and, by the road of Blair Athol and Dunkeld, reached Perth on the 4th of September. Blair Castle was left by the Duke of Athol free to its ancient possessor; and Tullibardine became the host of his prince, and summoned the tenantry, not without threats of vengeance for disobedience, to repair to the Stuart banner.

On the 4th of September the prince made his public entry into Perth. A fair was proceeding in the city, which brought traders from the west of Scotland and from England. He gave passports to the travelling merchants, and told a London linen-draper to inform his fellow-citizens that in two months he should see them at St. James's. There was little at Perth to excite these sanguine hopes. There were remembrances of 1716, when the father of the young man who now commanded the popular applause had fled from his camp, after issuing proclamations and fixing the date of his coronation. The grandson of James II. had a far less formidable array of adherents than were in arms for the same cause within the memory of living witnesses of his father's regal pomp and his unheroic retreat. But the bold bearing, the cordial trust, of this young man, won him some supporters; yet not enough to make him feel that the enthusiasm of the Highlands would attend him in the Lowlands. Still he went on. The road was open before him. Two important men joined him—James Drummond, styled Duke of Perth,* and Lord George Murray. Lord George had seen something of war, and was a man of ability. He had been opposed in 1719 to the Hanoverian dynasty, but had made his peace, though he was not trusted or employed. When he joined Charles Edward his qualifications gave him a high place in council, and in military arrangements; but he did not speak the language which hereditary right claims as its absolute due. When the prince used the antiquated tone of the Stuarts of the seventeenth century, Lord George Murray pointed out its unsuitableness to a people who had forgotten to recognize such high pretensions, and he was coldly looked upon. Suspicion and jealousy soon divided the rebel camp into factions. But whatever were the dissensions, the great prize of the capital of Scotland was to be attempted to be won. It was won without much difficulty.

On the 11th of September the little army marched southward. They crossed the Forth at the fords of Frew, about eight miles westward of Stirling. The passage was not disputed by Colonel Gardiner's dragoons, who retired before them. At Callender House, near Falkirk, Charles Edward received the adhesion of Lord Kilmarnock, the first Lowland man of rank who joined his banner. He went on to Corstorphine, within four miles of Edinburgh, without opposition. There was division in the municipal councils of the Scottish capital. Provost Stewart acted in a spirit of corporate rivalry against an able and zealous loyalist, George Drummond, who was for organizing a vigorous resistance. Even if the civic authorities had agreed among themselves, they had to defend old walls which could be easily clambered over or broken down; and all the force which could be mustered was not more than eleven hundred men, not a third of whom were disciplined soldiers. The greater number were rapidly embodied volunteers. On Sunday, the 15th, the citizens were called to arms by the alarming toll of the great fire-bell. The volunteers mustered, but there was no one to command them. They manned the town-walls on that night. On the Monday the dragoons, who, with the town guard, were very near the advancing rebels at Colt Bridge, were seized with a sudden panic as their pickets fled before some mounted Highlanders. The dragoons disgracefully galloped away in a body, and the Edinburgh loyalists were left to their own wretched means of defence. A message was brought to the city that resistance to the prince would be followed by military execution. The magistrates called a meeting, when a formal summons to surrender, containing a similar threat, was read. A deputation was now sent to the rebel camp to offer terms of capitulation. A messenger had meanwhile arrived with the news that General Cope, who had embarked his troops at Aberdeen, was in sight of Dunbar, and would speedily land for the relief of Edinburgh. The deputation returned to say that an unconditional surrender was demanded. A second deputation was sent in the night to entreat for delay. As might have been expected, they obtained no hearing. These baffled negotiators returned to the city before daybreak on the morning of the 17th. The Canongate having been opened to allow the hackney carriages which had brought back the deputation to go out to the suburbs, a party of Highlanders, who had waited in ambush, rushed in. The volunteers had dispersed when they saw the disposition of the authorities to surrender, and had delivered up their arms, which were sent to the castle. There were none to dispute the possession of the city with the alert mountaineers. The other gates were soon opened. "The Parliament Close," says an eye-witness, "was filled with rebels before five in the morning. They were very naked, and several wanted arms, especially firelocks. Their weapons, which were unfit for use, were rubbed up by the armorers, who at this time got constant employment. They set about providing clothes, shoes, and linen, of which they were in great want, the most part having nothing but a short old coat of coarse tartan, a pair of hose much worn, coming scarce up to their knees; their plaids and bonnets in the same condition."† Moving by the south of the city, far out of the reach of the guns of the castle, Charles Edward entered the Palace of Holyrood, and, amid the antique pomp of heralds and pursuivants, King James VIII. was proclaimed at the High Cross of Edinburgh.

While a large number of the populace of Edinburgh huzzaed as Prince Charles rode into Holyrood, and the declarations were read at the High Cross; "while a number of ladies in the windows strained their voices with acclamation, and their arms with waving white handkerchiefs;"* Cope was landing at Dunbar. On the 18th he had completed the debarkation of his troops, artillery, and stores; and he had been joined by the panic-stricken dragoons, who had run away at Colt's Bridge. On the 19th Cope marched toward Edinburgh. "This little army," says Home, "made a great show; the cavalry, the infantry, the cannon, with a long train of baggage-carts, extended for several miles along the road." Home was himself with that army, being, most probably, the volunteer whom he describes as giving information to the English general of the numbers and condition of the Highland forces, as he had observed them before he quitted Edinburgh. He estimated them at about two thousand men. They had no artillery, except "one small iron gun which he had seen, without a carriage, lying upon a cart drawn by a little Highland horse." About fifteen hundred were armed with firelocks and swords; and a hundred or so had each a scythe fastened to the shaft of a pitchfork. The volunteer probably underrated the number of the rebel forces, as Cope and other officers overrated them. In the same way Cope's forces were overrated by those opposed to them. The most trustworthy accounts make the Highlanders amount to less than three thousand men, and the royal troops to somewhat above two thousand.† On the 20th Cope had reached the village of Preston, and he there learned that the prince had marched from Edinburgh to encounter him. The English general resolved to rest here, and wait to be attacked. He had a strong position, thus described by De Johnstone: "We arrived about two o'clock in the afternoon within musket-shot of the enemy, where we halted behind an eminence, having a full view of the camp of General Cope, the position of which was chosen with a good deal of skill. . . . The general had on his right two inclosures, surrounded by stone walls, from six to seven feet high, between which there was a road of about twenty feet broad, leading to the village of Preston-Pans. Before him was another inclosure, surrounded by a deep ditch filled with water, and from ten to twelve feet broad, which served as a ditch to the marshy ground. On his left was a marsh, which terminated in a deep pond; and behind him was the sea." The Highlanders saw the difficulty of getting through the morass, so as to attack their enemy in front. During the evening various movements were made in each army, but Cope clung to the supposed advantage of his position, although doubts had arisen whether it was prudent for his troops thus to be shut up, while the rebels could move freely about, watching for any opportune advantage. The night came on, dark and cold. Pickets of the royal army kept guard along the morass. Fires were lighted. The baggage was sent to the rear. All seemed safe against a surprise. It had been determined by Charles, with the advice of a council of war, to attack at break of day, from a ground below the east of Tranent, and his little army had been moved into this position. The Highlanders were sleeping, wrapped in their plaids. The prince, Lord George Murray, and other chiefs, were lying down in a field of peas. A proprietor named Anderson was brought to Lord George Murray, to tell him that he knew a far more practicable way through the morass than their present position offered. He had often crossed it when hunting, and he would himself lead the way. Another council was held, and Anderson's plan was adopted. In the silence of the dark morning the Highlanders began to move. As the day broke, a frosty mist concealed their advance. The morass was successfully crossed, though some men sank deep in the boggy ground. The column marched northward toward the sea, and then formed in line. Between the two armies was a broad corn-field, the harvest having just been got in. Over the thick stubble rushed the Highlanders. The sun rose; the mist dispersed; the disciplined troops, horse and foot, stood before these wild and ill-armed men, in their firm ranks, their arms glittering in the morning ray, their cannon threatening a swift destruction. Some of the rebel officers afterward acknowledged that when they looked upon this array they expected the Highland army to be swept away in a moment.* The Highlanders rushed on. They fired, cast away their muskets, and threw themselves on the astonished line, "with a swiftness not to be conceived," as one of the English colonels described in evidence. According to De Johnstone's account, the Highlanders had been instructed to cut at the noses of the horses, and thus threw the cavalry into confusion. The cannon which Cope had landed was of little use, for he had only one artilleryman; and sailors who were placed to work the guns immediately abandoned them at the rush of the Highlanders. Neither horse nor foot could stand up against these strange and terrible foes. "None of the soldiers," says Home, "attempted to load their pieces again, and not one bayonet was stained with blood." Then commenced a slaughter of which modern warfare has few parallels. The road between the two inclosures was stopped up by the fugitives. "The strength of the enemy's camp," says De Johnstone, "became their destruction. . . . The field of battle presented a spectacle of horror, being covered with heads, legs, and arms, and mutilated bodies; for the killed all fell by the sword." The king's officers, with one exception, seem to have abandoned their men to this terrible slaughter, with very feeble attempts to rally them—with no disposition, certainly, to die with them. The one signal exception to the shame of commanders who were the first to carry the news of their own defeat,† was Colonel Gardiner. Dr. Doddridge has told how this brave and pious man fell, close to the door of his own mansion. He had been wounded in the breast and in the thigh. He had tried, in vain, to rally his panic-stricken troop, who at last made a precipitate flight. Deliberating what his duty next required of him, "he saw a party of the foot, who were then bravely fighting near him, and whom he was ordered to support, had no officer to head them; upon which he said eagerly, in the hearing of the person from whom I had this account, 'These brave fellows will be cut to pieces for want of a commander,' or words to that effect; which, while he was speaking, he rode up to them, and cried out, 'Fire on, my lads, and fear nothing.' But just as the words were out of his mouth, a Highlander advanced toward him with a scythe fastened to a long pole, with which he gave him so dreadful a wound on his right arm that his sword dropped out of his hand; and at the same time several others coming about him while he was thus dreadfully entangled with that cruel weapon, he was dragged off from his horse. The moment he fell, another Highlander gave him a stroke either with a broadsword or a Lochaber axe (for my informant could not exactly distinguish) on the hinder part of his head, which was the mortal blow. All that his faithful attendant saw further at this time was, that as his hat was falling off, he took it in his left hand and waved it as a signal for him to retreat, and added, what were the last words he ever heard him speak, 'Take care of yourself;' upon which the servant retired."

The prince, as related by Home, "remained on the field of battle till midnight, giving orders for the relief of the wounded of both parties." We may add a characteristic passage from a manuscript journal of a Scottish chaplain in the Highland army: "Then I rode straight into the field of battle; and after meeting Invernahyle and his men in the pursuit, I made up to the prince, and wished him joy of the glorious victory! To which he was pleased to reply, with a smile, 'Sir, the Highlanders have done it all.' After the wounded of both sides and the prisoners were taken care of, there was a table spread for his Royal Highness on the field of battle,-at Cope's cannons; and he did me the honor to bid me say grace, to which he rose, and stood very gravely."‡ This triumph was called by the rebels the victory of Gladsmuir—a place about a mile from Preston Pans—there being an old prediction, "On Gladsmuir shall the battle be."

Charles Edward slept on the night of the battle at Pinkie House; and he returned to Edinburgh on the 22d of September, with exulting followers but with a diminished army. The booty of the field of Preston was too great to allow the Highlanders to believe that there was any duty more urgent than to return to their homes in triumph with their spoil, provided they could escape from the control of their leaders. They found serviceable arms and good clothes; money, whose value they comprehended, and watches, whose use they could not readily understand. But the victory which had been gained inspired such confidence in wavering chiefs and hesitating lairds that, during the time of the prince's sojourn in Edinburgh, nearly six weeks, he was enabled, in spite of large desertions, to muster double the number of men that he had been able to oppose to General Cope. Duncan Forbes describes the effect produced by the possession of Edinburgh and the battle of Preston: "All Jacobites, how prudent soever, became mad; all doubtful people became Jacobites; and all bankrupts became heroes, and talked nothing but hereditary rights and victory. What was more grievous to men of gallantry, and if you will believe me much more mischievous to the public, all the fine ladies, except one or two, became passionately fond of the young adventurer, and used all their arts and industry for him in the most intemperate manner."* From the 22d of September to the 31st of October Edinburgh was unwontedly gay in the sunshine of the young prince's successes. There was some terror when the governor of the castle, General Guest, threatened to bombard the city if the blockade which cut off the supplies of the garrison were not removed. Charles was indignant at what he called the barbarity of the governor, although he listened to the prayer of the magistrates that he would not persevere in exposing them to this peril. General Guest was also induced to suspend his resolve till orders had been received from London. There was a sort of armistice, which the Highlanders broke by firing upon men who were carrying provisions up the Castle hill. The governor retaliated, and swept the streets with his artillery loaded with small shot. The prince then yielded to the terror of the citizens, and revoked the order "which made it death to carry provisions to the castle."

The intention of Charles Edward to cross the border was formed immediately after the victory of the 21st of September. He gave authority to a person named Hickson to repair forthwith to England, to notify to his friends the great success he had met with, and "to let them know that it is my full intention, in a few days, to move toward them."† Hickson was apprehended at Newcastle, and attempted to destroy himself.

We shall have to direct our view to the state of affairs in England—to the movements of the administration, the opinions of the parliament, and the temper of the people—under the extraordinary circumstances which had placed the capital of Scotland in the possession of the Jacobites, and which rendered an invasion of the south a very imminent danger. In the illusions of the romance of the Forty-five, or in sympathies with a faded Toryism, writers, otherwise judicious and impartial, have taken little trouble to examine the real difficulties of an attempt, in the middle of the eighteenth century, for the restoration of the Stuarts. In entering upon such an examination, we demur to the conclusion of one excellent historian, who expresses his belief, that if, after the battle of Preston, Charles could have pushed on with two or three thousand men, "he might have reached the capital with but little opposition, and succeeded in at least a temporary restoration."‡ He says "the spirit of the people in no degree responded to the efforts of the government; they remained cold lookers-on, not indeed apparently favoring the rebellion, but as little disposed to strive against it"§ The popular feeling is described as, first, apathy, and then terror. In our view, the public spirit of the people of England, in the crisis of 1745, is not to be estimated by the alarm of timid ministers or the indifference of fashionable triflers. Pelham was not so apprehensive of the strength or zeal of the enemy, as fearful of the inability or languidness of friends. Some politicians went farther. England, Fox thought, would be for the first comer—the English and Dutch battalions from Flanders, or the French and Spaniards. Horace Walpole was alternating between selfish fears and affected nonchalance. On the 6th of September he looks upon Scotland as gone. On the 13th he does not despair, yet expects nothing but bad. On the 20th his apprehensions are not nearly so strong as they were. On the 27th, when the news of Preston battle has arrived, he has so trained himself to expect this ruin, that he sees it approach without any emotion. This is the ordinary mode in which the exclusive world looks at great public events that affect a nation. On the 4th of October the smart letter-writer discovers that there is a community who are not about to be conquered by "banditti," as he had termed the Highlanders. "A wonderful spirit is arisen in all counties, and among all sorts of people." The merchants of London, he says, have undertaken to support public credit; noblemen are raising regiments; the Archbishop of York has set an example that would rouse the most indifferent. He then, as was his wont, shuts up his hopes and his fears in matter for a laugh. "As an instance of more spirit and wit than there is in all Scotland," he quotes an address "To all jolly Butchers—My bold hearts, the Papists eat no meat on Wednesdays, Fridays, Saturdays, nor during Lent." *

NOTE ON THE HIGHLAND COSTUME.

Charles Edward, on his march into England, adopted the Highland costume as one of the means of acquiring the affection of the mountaineers. In this costume we do not recognize the picturesque garb which is usually associated with the person of the Highlander—the garb which Scottish gentlemen delight to wear on their high festivals, and which the household-god of the snuff-shop once made familiar to the eyes of the Londoners. Prince Charles Edward is painted as wearing the truis, the breeches and stockings in one piece, or hose pantaloon; and not as wearing the kilt or philibeg, with the knee and part of the leg uncovered. Without entering into any examination of the disputed question of the high antiquity of the reputed Highland costume, it may be satisfactory to show what the ordinary costume really was, as described by a traveller in Scotland at a period between the rebellions of 1715 and 1745: †

"The Highland dress consists of a bonnet made of thrum without a brim, a short coat, a waistcoat longer by five or six inches, short stockings, and brogues or pumps without heels. By the way, they cut holes in their brogues, though new made, to let out the water when they have far to go and rivers to pass; and this they do to preserve their feet from galling.

"Few besides gentlemen wear the trowze [truis], that is, the breeches and stockings all of one piece and drawn on together; over this habit they wear a plaid, which is usually three yards long and two breadths wide, and the whole garb is made of checkered tartan or plaiding; this, with the sword and pistol, is called a full dress, and to a well-proportioned man with any tolerable air it makes an agreeable figure; but this you have seen in London, and it is chiefly their mode of dressing when they are in the Lowlands or when they make a neighboring visit, or go anywhere on horseback; but when those among them who travel on foot, and have not attendants to carry them over the waters, they vary it with the quelt [kilt], which is a manner I am about to describe.

"The common habit of the ordinary Highlanders is far from being acceptable to the eye; with them a small part of the plaid, which is not so large as the former, is set in folds and girt round the waist to make of it a short petticoat that reaches half way down the thigh, and the rest is brought over the shoulders, and then fastened before, below the neck, often with a fork, and sometimes with a bodkin or sharpened piece of stick, so that they make pretty near the appearance of the poor women in London when they bring their gowns over their heads to shelter them from the rain. In this way of wearing the plaid they have sometimes nothing else to cover them, and are often barefoot; but some I have seen shod with a kind of pumps made out of a raw cow-hide with the hair turned outward, which being ill-made, the wearer's feet looked something like those of a rough-footed hen or pigeon: these are called quarrants, and are not only offensive to the sight but intolerable to the smell of those who are near them. The stocking rises no higher than the thick of the calf, and from the middle of the thigh to the middle of the leg is a naked space, which being exposed to all weathers becomes tanned and freckled. This dress is called the quelt."

The kilt, as a part of the dress separate from the plaid, "set in folds and girt round the waist, to make of it a short petticoat that reaches half way down the thigh," is held to have been an innovation occurring between the rebellions of 1715 and 1745. It is ascribed to the genius of an army tailor attached to the troops of General Wade, who saw the inconvenience of the old cumbrous arrangement. Thus the Highland costume, "in its more complete shape, has every appearance of being essentially modern." ‡ The difference of colors in the tartan, as distinguishing various clans, is also held to be of comparatively modern origin.

"Various reasons," says the author of the Letters, "are given both for and against the Highland dress. It is urged against it, that it distinguishes the natives as a body of people distinct and separate from the rest of the subjects of Great Britain, and thereby is one cause of their narrow adherence among themselves to the exclusion of all the rest of the kingdom; but the part of the habit chiefly objected to is the plaid (or mantle), which, they say, is calculated for the encouragement of an idle life in lying about upon the heath in the daytime, instead of following some lawful employment; that it serves to cover them in the night when they lie in wait among the mountains to commit their robberies and depredations, and is composed of such colors as altogether in the mass so nearly resemble the heath on which they lie that it is hardly to be distinguished from it till one is so near them as to be within their power, if they have any evil intention.

"On the other hand it is alleged: the dress is most convenient to those who, with no ill design, are obliged to travel from one part to another upon their lawful occasions, viz., That they would not be so free to skip over the rocks and bogs with breeches, as they are in the short petticoat. That it would be greatly incommodious, to those who are frequently to wade through waters, to wear breeches, which must be taken off upon every such occurrence, or would not only gall the wearer, but render it very unhealthful and dangerous to their limbs to be constantly wet in that part of the body, especially in winter-time, when they might be frozen. And with respect to the plaid in particular, the distances between one place of shelter and another are often too great to be reached before night comes on, and being intercepted by sudden floods, or hindered by other impediments, they are frequently obliged to lie all night in the hills, in which case they must perish were it not for the covering they carry with them."

The preceding is an intelligible description, which may enable us to form a truer conception of the Highland army than we may derive from romances or melodramas. In the act of parliament of 1747, by which "the clothes commonly called Highland clothes," are forbidden to be worn except by officers and soldiers, these clothes are described as "the plaid, philibeg or little kilt, trouze, shoulder-belts;" and it is enacted "that no tartan or parti-colored plaid should be used for great coats or upper coats." In the "Humphrey Clinker" of Smollett, which embodies his remarks on his native country in 1766, we may trace the operation of this statute, which had for its object the amalgamation of Highlanders and Lowlanders: "It must be observed that the poor Highlanders are now seen to disadvantage. They have been not only disarmed by act of parliament, but also deprived of their ancient garb, which was both graceful and convenient; and, what is a greater hardship still, they are compelled to wear breeches—a restraint which they cannot bear with any degree of patience; indeed, the majority wear them, not in their proper place, but on poles or long staves over their shoulders; they are even debarred the use of their striped stuff, called tartan, which was their own manufacture, prized by them above all the velvet, brocades, and tissues of Europe and Asia. They now lounge along in loose great coats of coarse russet, equally mean and cumbersome, and betray manifest marks of dejection. Certain it is, the government could not have taken a more effectual method to break their national spirit." These "breeches" were certainly not the "trouze" of the Highland gentlemen. "The 'breeks' attempted to be forced upon the nether limbs of the brawny Highlanders were the Lowland and English knee-breeches of George the Second's reign, with all the buttons and buckles thereunto belonging." * The author of the interesting letters which we have quoted gives an example to show that the whole people were "fond and tenacious of their Highland clothing" before the eventful period which was to produce such changes in this matter, as well as in greater affairs: "Being, in a wet season, upon one of my peregrinations, accompanied by a Highland gentleman, who was one of the clan through which I was passing, I observed the women to be in great anger with him about something that I did not understand. At length I asked him wherein he had offended them? Upon this question he laughed, and told me his great coat was the cause of their wrath, and that their reproach was, that he could not be contented with the garb of his ancestors, but was degenerated into a Lowlander, and condescended to follow their unmanly fashions." † attached to Scotsmen in London—Andrew Drummond, the banker—Proceedings against popish priests.

The king returned from Hanover on the 31st of August. The parliament was summoned to meet on the 17th of October. On the 9th of October, "Charles, Prince of Wales, Regent of Scotland, England, France, and Ireland," issued his proclamation from his palace of Holyrood House, warning all his subjects, peers or commoners, to pay no obedience to this summons of the Elector of Hanover, and threatening that if any peers or commoners of Scotland should presume to sit or vote in such parliament they should be proceeded against as rebels and traitors. Nevertheless, in spite of this doughty manifesto, the parliament did meet at Westminster on the 17th of October, although some few Scottish peers did keep away. The king expressed his surprise that any of his Protestant subjects should have been concerned in this rebellion; for throughout the whole course of his reign he had made the laws of the land the rule of his government; and the preservation of the constitution in Church and State, and the rights of his people, the main end and aim of all his actions. Whatever had been the defects of the government of the two Georges, the laws of the land had not been violated; the constitution under which they reigned had been upheld. The freedom of speech which was heard in both houses, at this crisis of danger, is the best proof that no arbitrary power had deadened the old spirit which ejected the Stuarts; that the corruption, by which Sir Robert Walpole had believed that the intrigues of the Jacobites could only be effectually resisted, had not created a parliament of slaves and sycophants. In the Lords the Earl of Westmoreland proclaimed that "the people suspect that both houses are under a corrupt dependency upon the crown." * In the Commons Major Selwyn denounced the system of continually interposing in continental affairs: "We have been doing little else for above twenty years, than pulling down with one hand, and setting up again with the other; so that a drum was never to beat in Germany but we, knight-errant like, thought we must have recourse to arms." † The opposition in the Commons, even at this time of public alarm, supported an amendment to the address as boldly conceived as in the previous days of domestic security: "In order to the firmer establishment of his majesty's throne on the solid and truly glorious basis of his people's affections, it shall be our zealous and speedy care to frame such bills as, if passed into laws, may prove most effectual for securing to his majesty's faithful subjects the perpetual enjoyment of their undoubted right to be freely and fairly represented in parliament, frequently chosen, and exempted from undue influence of any kind." ‡ Lyttelton and Pitt, who had bearded Walpole in the height of his power, and had exercised all their oratory to drive Carteret from office, now spoke against the amendment. Pitt was indeed looking for place, from which the personal dislike of the king alone excluded him; but it was something far nobler than courtly subserviency which prompted him at this juncture to postpone every other consideration to the great question of the defence of his country; for he knew that the stability of the throne was undoubtedly the firmest foundation for the liberties of the people. In his speech on this occasion Pitt said that he had always been a friend to everything that could reasonably be offered to secure the independence of parliament; that, because he was a real friend to every regulation that might appear likely to be effectual for preventing the fatal effects of corruption, he would never propose or advise the introduction of any such regulation into the house but at a proper season. Was this a proper season? "While the nation is engaged in a most dangerous and expensive foreign war, a rebellion breaks out at home. Those rebels have already gained a victory over the king's troops, which has made them almost wholly masters of one part of the United Kingdom. We are under daily apprehensions both of an irruption and a foreign invasion being made upon the other; and that invasion would certainly be attended with an insurrection. In such circumstances, shall we amuse ourselves with contriving methods to prevent the effects of corruption? Shall we spend our time in projects for guarding our liberties against corruption, when they are in such immediate danger of being trampled under foot by force of arms? Would not this be like a man's sitting down to think of ways and means for preventing his being cheated by his servants, at the very time that thieves were breaking into his house?" * This was the language of a statesman. The amendment was negatived. On the 28th of October a motion was made for a committee "to inquire into the causes of the progress of the rebellion in Scotland." The supineness of the ministry was defended on the ground "that they could not have supposed that a few Scotch Highlanders would be so mad as to take it into their heads that without any foreign assistance they could conquer the whole island of Great Britain." † The motion was negatived.

When Charles Edward was marching southward, party jealousies and court intrigues took a shape essentially characteristic of a period when most public men thought their own petty interests and rivalries of far more importance than the welfare of the nation. Fifteen peers had offered to raise regiments. The offer was accepted by the government. Had the Lords "paid them too, the service had been noble," writes Horace Walpole. The king was to pay them; and their colonels, it was alleged, named none but their own relations and dependants for the officers. Walpole insinuates that some of these peers took the pay but did not raise the men; and he distinctly says that not six regiments were raised, and not four employed. The Duke of Bedford, he admits, actually raised and served with his regiment. "The fourteen promised regiments," says Lord Mahon, "all vanished to air or dwindled to jobs." There is no authority for this sweeping statement, even in the sarcasms of Horace Walpole. But there is little doubt that the public spirit of the aristocracy was not very great or very universal. Andrew Mitchell describes, in a letter to Duncan Forbes, this affair of the new regiments with a bitter irony: "It is certain that no job was intended by those who made the first proposal, but your lordship knows this country too well to believe that in the time of public danger any man would attend to his own private advantage." ‡ On the 4th of November a motion was made in the Commons for an address to beseech his majesty "that the officers in the new regiments, now raising, or already raised, may not be allowed any rank from their commissions after these regiments are broke." This address was rejected only by a small majority. The king was against the officers taking rank, but he did not wish to refuse it. Courtiers, patriots, and Jacobites supported the address, which if carried would have put an end to the scheme for raising those regiments. Pitt took a part which may lead us not wholly to believe the calumnies of Walpole; a part best calculated to make any selfish grandee ashamed of his baseness, if any portion of these calumnies were true. The noble peers, he said, who had undertaken to raise these regiments, "have stood like men of fortitude and integrity in the gap at which war and confusion were breaking in upon us, and have by their influence and example raised the same spirit in others, who, had they not been thus animated to resistance and resolution, would inevitably have sunk under their fears, and suffered all the calamities of an invasion, without daring to attempt the means of opposing or preventing them." § The officers, he said, who are to be employed under them are men whose fortunes and whose merit raise them to distinction in their own counties—men who voluntarily serve their country from their zeal for its security. The suspicions of the integrity of the highest in rank, and the differences of opinion in statesmen professing the same principles which these discussions exhibited, were not favorable to the belief that the prayer would be realized which the Archbishop of York so fervently put up at the commencement of the rebellion: "May the great God of battles stretch out his all-powerful hand to defend us; inspire an union of hearts and hands among all ranks of people; a clear wisdom into the councils of his majesty; and a steady courage and resolution into the hearts of his generals." The want of concert among the Whigs in parliament, and the absence of cordiality among the advisers of the king, are described in the letter of Andrew Mitchell just quoted: "Affairs in the House of Commons are not now carried on in the manner they were when your lordship sat in parliament. Their proceedings are now like the operations of an army composed of several nations, where all the leaders must be satisfied, and where there is properly no commander-in-chief. Though the influence of some be great, yet in many points they must yield to their new allies. In the cabinet, I fear, there is as little harmony as elsewhere; the consequence of which must be an unsteadiness of councils, and want of all scheme or plan of action."

The parliamentary reports in the "Gentleman's Magazine" and the "London Magazine," from which waverers in England might have learned in October something of the divided opinions of parliament, could scarcely have reached the west of Scotland before Prince Charles entered Cumberland on the 8th of November. His march into England had been regarded with little favor by the Highland chiefs. Some, according to the Chevalier de Johnstone, told him that it was ridiculous to invade England with such a handful of men. Others said they had taken arms to seat him on the throne of Scotland, but wished to have nothing to do with England.* The adventurer had wild notions of a great insurrectionary movement in his favor, after he had crossed the border. The experience of Lord Kilmarnock might have taught the prince that communities flourishing by their industry were not likely to forsake the protection of an established government, to enter into a dispute of hereditary right against a constitutional succession of half a century's duration. The father of Kilmarnock raised a regiment for the pretender in 1715, when claims to feudal service were respected in the Scottish Lowlands. In 1745 the mistaken and unfortunate lord called upon his tenants and the carpet-weaving population of the town of Kilmarnock to follow him to fight for the Stuart; and he was roughly told by all, to a man, of those he called his people, that neither threats nor entreaties should take them from their homes. The young prince was as ignorant of the real condition of the English people—of the rapid progress that had been made in the industrial arts, and in the improved resources of all ranks, since his grandfather left Whitehall in 1688—as he was unconscious of the resolution of the people not to put to risk every good which they enjoyed, for the sake of a dynasty hated by four fifths of the general population, without any zealous support except from the professors of antiquated creeds in religion and politics. The Georges had never been popular. They were disliked as foreigners. There was no comparison to be made between the attractions of the tall young prince, who was playing the part of a hero of romance, and of the little old gentleman, who, although he had flourished his sword at Dettingen, received no greetings of white handkerchiefs from fair ladies in London windows. But George II. had not been a harsh or an unjust king. Archbishop Herring spoke to the hearts of his hearers at York when he said, "not an instance can be pointed out during his whole reign, wherein he made the least attempt upon the liberty, or property, or religion of a single person." The contrast with the last king of the Stuart line was not forgotten, even in Scotland.

"In the year 1745," writes Gibbon, "the throne and the constitution were attacked by a rebellion, which does not reflect much honor on the national spirit; since the English friends of the pretender wanted courage to join his standard; and his enemies—the bulk of the people—allowed him to advance into the heart of the kingdom." The father of the great historian was one of those who had not the courage to take a decided part in a cause to which his inclination tended: "Without daring, perhaps without desiring, to aid the rebels, my father invariably adhered to the Tory opposition. In the most critical season he accepted, for the service of the party, the office of alderman in the city of London."† This covert Jacobitism, "willing to wound, and yet afraid to strike," furnishes an explanation for a portion of the seeming indifference to the result which marked the public demeanor of some men of rank and wealth on the approach toward London of the Highland army. Why the enemies of the leader of this army allowed him to advance into the heart of the kingdom, is capable of very easy solution, if we trace his progress step by step. We doubt if this non-resistance can be fairly ascribed to any want of national spirit in "the bulk of the people."

The Highland army, upon leaving Dalkeith, divided into two columns. One, under the command of Lord George Murray, took the western route into England by Peebles and Moffat; the other, with the prince at its head, marched as if about to proceed by the eastern road to Berwick. The Chevalier de Johnstone attributed to this stratagem the determination of Wade to remain with his large force to protect Newcastle. The prince, suddenly turning westward from Kelso, joined the other division near Reddings. On the 10th the entire army invested Carlisle. The inhabitants of Newcastle were relieved from the fears which they are held to have entertained after the battle of Preston Pans. John Wesley was in the town on the 23d of September. No English or Dutch troops were yet there for the protection of the inhabitants; but, writes Wesley, "the walls are mounted with cannon, and all things prepared for sustaining an assault." This preparation for defence scarcely bears out the belief that at Newcastle the arms of Charles Edward "had struck the deepest dismay."* Wesley says, "Our poor neighbors on either hand are busy removing their goods; and most of the best houses in our street are left without either furniture or inhabitants." When a bombardment is expected, the inhabitants of the threatened town may remove their goods from an exposed to a secure place, without feeling "the deepest dismay." General Wade did not march from Newcastle till five days after the investment of Carlisle. The surrender of that city, before Wade arrived in the neighborhood for its relief, can scarcely be accounted for, except through the disaffection of a few, operating upon the gross ignorance and folly of its magisterial defenders. In the castle the garrison consisted of only one company of invalids, commanded by Colonel Durand. The besieged were not wanting in artillery. The city was surrounded with old walls, within which was the militia of Cumberland and Westmoreland. The siege was conducted by the Duke of Perth with a small force; for the prince, with the greater part of the army, had marched to Brampton, in the expectation of giving battle to Wade. There was a valiant mayor of Carlisle, who wrote to the secretary of state that he had fired on the rebels and made them retire; adding, in his heroic epistle, "And so I think the town of Carlisle has done his majesty more service than the great city of Edinburgh, or than all Scotland together."† The king spoke of this Mr. Patteson, at his levee, with great encomiums. The boasts of the mayor soon came to an end. The besieging army had twelve field-pieces, six of which had been taken at Preston. The city, says De Johnstone, "surrendered the third day after the opening of the trenches, rather from our threatening to fire red-hot balls upon the town and reduce it to ashes, than from the force of our artillery; as we did not discharge a single shot, lest the garrison should become acquainted with the smallness of their calibre, which might have encouraged them to defend themselves."‡ The town authorities compelled the feeble garrison to join in the capitulation; and they had previously ordered them to desist from firing upon the besiegers. In a letter from a gentleman in Kendal, dated the 18th of November, the citizens of Carlisle are represented in no favorable light: "Most of our militia are got home from Carlisle, who generally complained of very ill-usage in that place; and though perhaps some of them may exaggerate matters through resentment, yet, by all accounts, the conduct of that city fell much short of what was expected from a place of so much strength and reputed loyalty."§ The people of Whitehaven, according to the loyal volunteer, James Ray, had raised ten companies of fifty men each for the defence of the place, and had formed breastworks before the town, in which cannon was planted. But when they heard of the surrender of Carlisle the guns were dismounted and put on board ships, that they might not fall into the enemy's hands.

It is at this period, when the newspapers announced the advance of the rebels into England, and their successful attack upon Carlisle, which from early times had been regarded as one of the most formidable barriers against Scottish assault, that we find in the letters of the poet of the Leasowes a slight indication of the popular interest which these stirring events excited in the midland counties. Shenstone, on the 22d of November, thus writes to his friend Mr. Graves: "The rebellion, you may guess, is the subject of all conversation. Every individual nailer here takes in a newspaper (a more pregnant one by far than any of the London ones), and talks as familiarly of kings and princes as ever Master Shallow did of John of Gaunt.

Indeed it is no bad thing that they do so; for I cannot conceive that the people want so much to be convinced by sermons of the absurdity of popery, a they do by newspapers that it may possibly prevail. The reasons and arguments, too, in favor of the present government are so strong and obvious, that even I, and every country squire, and every country clerk, and Sam Shaw the tailor, seem to be as much masters of them as the bishops themselves. I must not say we could express them so politely." * Secker and Sherlock and Warburton were preaching like sensible divines against the mischiefs which a change of dynasty would produce; and the newspapers, London and provincial, gave little encouragement to the enterprise of a family that had not been distinguished for a regard to the freedom of the press. A few years later than this, Dr. Johnson, who saw without much favor the fact that "almost every large town has its weekly historian," makes this admission of the utility of newspapers, even in this early period of the development of their mighty influence: "All foreigners remark that the knowledge of the common people in England is greater than that of any other vulgar. This superiority we undoubtedly owe to the rivulets of intelligence which are continually trickling among us, which every one may catch, and of which every one partakes." †

The possession of Carlisle appears to have somewhat influenced the decision of Charles' council to march onward toward London. Some, according to Lord George Murray, proposed returning to Scotland. The cause of the Stuarts was not flourishing there. Although Lord Strathallan, who had been left in command at Perth, had received a considerable accession of force, from clans who had taken arms under the son of Lord Lovat and other chiefs, the large commercial towns had given the most decided manifestations in favor of the established government. Glasgow, Paisley, and Dumfries had raised their militia for the reigning house. Edinburgh had renewed its allegiance. Even at Dundee and Perth "the populace had insisted on celebrating King George's birthday, and a few shots or blows had been exchanged between them and their Jacobite garrisons." ‡ "The populace" may here have a wider significance than "the mob." Lord George Murray (the project for marching back to Scotland not being approved) says that some were for quartering in the country about Carlisle. "Others were for marching forward the west road, and that now we had Carlisle, at worst we had a safe retreat. His Royal Highness declared for this." His own opinion being asked, Lord George said he could not venture to advise "to march far into England without more encouragement from the country than we had hitherto got;" but he added that, if the prince was resolved to make a trial, the army, though small, would follow him. "Upon this he immediately said he would venture." § Murray at that time had resigned his commission, and was determined to serve only as a volunteer. There had been differences between him and the Duke of Perth, who was in especial favor with Charles. But the experience and knowledge of the plain-speaking general could not be safely dispensed with. He soon, he says, "as all the other officers were very pressing with me," laid aside the thought of serving only as a volunteer.

On the 20th of November the van of the Highland army marched from Carlisle; and the main body, in a second division commanded by the prince, followed shortly after. The whole force did not reach five thousand men, according to some accounts; it amounted nearly to seven thousand, upon other estimates. At Penrith the main body halted on the 22d for a day, the van having marched to Kendal. Home says that the second division, "coming to Penrith, occupied the quarters which the van had left." ‖ The chaplain, from whose MS. we have already quoted, says, under the date of the 22d, "The van marched to Kendal, and the main body halted at Penrith." These accounts, corroborated by De Johnstone, refute the statement that "the whole army reunited at Penrith, and halted there one day, in the expectation that Wade was advancing to attack them; but on learning the retreat of that doughty veteran from Hexham they pursued their progress." ¶ On the 27th the two divisions were united at Preston. "Last night they were to be at Preston," writes Walpole on the 29th. He adds, "The country is so far from rising for them that the towns are left desolate on their approach, and the people hide and bury their effects, even to their pewter." We must not cease to bear in mind that the towns, then left desolate, were essentially different from the towns of half a century later—mere hamlets compared with the vast abodes of manufacturing industry into whose localities Charles Edward was now entering. "Manchester," says Volunteer Ray, "was taken by a sergeant, a drum, and a woman, about two o'clock in the afternoon [of the 28th], who rode up to the Bull's Head on horses with hempen halters, where they dined. After dinner they beat up for recruits, and in less than an hour listed about thirty." * This seemingly apocryphal story is confirmed by letters given by Lord Mahon, but more circumstantially by a very interesting narrative of the Chevalier De Johnstone. One of his sergeants, he says, a young Scotsman named Dickson, who had been enlisted from the prisoners of war at Gladsmuir, asked his permission to go forward to Manchester to make sure of some recruits before the arrival of the army. The general laughed at the notion of the adventurous youth, "as bold and intrepid as a lion." But Dickson was not to be balked in this way. He went off with a horse, and with his commander's portmanteau and blunderbuss; and on the evening of the 29th atoned for his insubordination by presenting himself at Manchester with a hundred and eighty recruits. De Johnstone gives with considerable narrative power the history of the surrender of Manchester to Dickson and his blunderbuss: "He had quitted Preston, in the evening, with his mistress and my drummer; and having marched all night, he arrived next morning at Manchester, which is about twenty miles distant from Preston, and immediately began to beat up for recruits for 'the yellow-haired laddie.' The populace, at first, did not interrupt him, conceiving our army to be near the town; but as soon as they knew that it would not arrive till the evening, they surrounded him in a tumultuous manner, with the intention of taking him prisoner, alive or dead. Dickson presented his blunderbuss, which was charged with slugs, threatening to blow out the brains of those who first dared to lay hands on himself or the two who accompanied him; and by turning round continually, facing in all directions, and behaving like a lion, he soon enlarged the circle which a crowd of people had formed round them. Having continued for some time to manœuvre in this way, those of the inhabitants of Manchester who were attached to the house of Stuart took arms, and flew to the assistance of Dickson, to rescue him from the fury of the mob; so that he soon had five or six hundred men to aid him, who dispersed the crowd in a very short time. Dickson now triumphed in his turn; and putting himself at the head of his followers, he proudly paraded, undisturbed, the whole day, with his drummer, enlisting for my company all who offered themselves. On presenting me with a list of one hundred and eighty recruits, I was agreeably surprised to find that the whole amount of his expenses did not exceed three guineas. This adventure of Dickson gave rise to many a joke at the expense of the town of Manchester, from the singular circumstance of its having been taken by a sergeant, a drummer, and a girl. The circumstance may serve to show the enthusiastic courage of our army, and the alarm and terror with which the English were seized." † The "alarm and terror" were perhaps as much produced by "those of the inhabitants of Manchester who, attached to the house of Stuart, took arms," as by the enthusiastic courage of the sergeant, the drummer, and the girl, as the representatives of "our army." The Manchester recruits were formed into a regiment. It "never exceeded three hundred men," says De Johnstone, "of whom the recruits furnished by my sergeant formed more than the half. These were all the English who ever declared themselves openly in favor of the prince; and the chiefs of the clans were not far wrong, therefore, in distrusting the pretended succors on which the prince so implicitly relied." The bell-ringing, the illuminations, the bonfires, which are described as "signs of popular favor upon the entry of the prince," lose a little of their value, when we learn, from one source, that "the bellman has been ordering us to illuminate our houses to-night, which must be done;" ‡ and from Volunteer Ray, that the bellman, who, in the morning, "had been sent about the town requiring all such as had any public money in their hands to bring it in," was, in the evening, "again sent about to order the town to be illuminated." The probability is that the inhabitants generally of Manchester, thriving as they were upon their manufactures of fustians, dimities, laces, and the various small articles of dress known as Manchester ware, and having extensive dealings with distant places, would not very gladly have seen property destroyed and credit suspended by the near prospect of insurrection and civil war. But the ancient and wealthy Roman Catholic families who dwelt among them were in general harmless; and if the bellman ordered illuminations, it was not for the industrious and loyal majority to break the papist windows. The Protestants of this busy town were not likely to be more disaffected than their neighbors. "In every place we passed through," says De Johnstone, "we found the English very ill-disposed toward us, except at Manchester, where there appeared some remains of attachment to the house of Stuart."* The Jacobite sympathy, "the old spirit of loyalty," that displayed itself in kissing the hands of the tall young prince—and which in one instance went so far as to make an ancient lady somewhat irreverently employ the sacred words of the Nunc dimittis—is a pretty object to contemplate through the haze of a century. But we cannot join in the historian's sneer at the reasoning loyalty which has taken the place of the old prostration before every wearer of a crown: "How greatly have we now improved upon those unphilosophical times! How far more judicious to value kings and governments, like all other articles, only according to their cheapness and convenience!" †

Having been in Manchester two days, the rebel army marched on the 1st of December to Macclesfield, fording the Mersey near Stockport. It was determined to proceed to Derby; but Lord George Murray, with the van, moved from Macclesfield to Congleton, "which was the straight road to Lichfield; so that the enemy would have reason to think we intended to come upon them, which would make them gather together in a body, and readily advance upon that road, so that we could get before them to Derby." ‡ The manœuvre succeeded. The Duke of Cumberland, who was at Newcastle-under-Lyne with his army, thought the object of the rebels was to get to Wales, where Jacobitism had its adherents. He therefore marched to Stone; and left the road to London open. Murray suddenly altered his course, and passing through Leek and Ashbourn, reached Derby at noon on the 5th. The prince, with the main body, arrived there the same evening. The Duke of Cumberland's spies had been taken prisoners, especially "the famous Captain Weir, well known to all about court," who fell in the way of Lord George Murray. "He was sent to the prince to be examined," writes the Highland officer in his account; § and whether it was clemency or prudence in the prince, Weir was saved from hanging to reveal all he knew of the movements of the English forces. In Derby the rebels obtained only three recruits; and, as was their usual course, they possessed themselves of the money collected for the taxes, which here amounted to 2500*l.* Without these resources, it is difficult to understand how this army contrived to subsist by paying for the necessaries which it wanted. The plunder was really inconsiderable. But the wants of the hardy Highlanders were easily supplied. They could march for a whole day upon a little oatmeal, which they carried in bags, mixed with the water of the streams through which they waded. It is highly honorable to these poor men, who in their own country were not averse to depredations upon a large scale which looked like warfare, that in their march through a rich land they plundered very little, and committed no wanton mischief. William Hutton justly appreciated this behavior: "They frequently," he said, "paid their quarters—more frequently it was not expected." He has an excuse for their petty depredations: "If they took people's shoes, it was because they had none of their own; and no voice speaks so loud as that of necessity." The general expectation in Derby was that the rebels had determined to march on. The same belief prevailed in the surrounding districts. Gray has an amusing anecdote of the temper in which this possible advance was regarded: "I heard three people, sensible middle-aged men, when the Scotch were said to be at Stamford, and actually were at Derby, talking of hiring a chaise to go to Caxton, a place in the high road, to see the pretender and the Highlanders as they passed." * This has been called "indifference," an "unconcern to the interests of the reigning family." It was simply curiosity mixed with a good deal of contempt. The unconcern at the advance into the kingdom of a small army of strangely clad and irregularly armed mountaineers, was produced by the certainty that there were in arms a very powerful force of disciplined soldiers moving to attack them, or to intercept their march to the metropolis; concentrating to put down an insane enterprise by some signal vengeance. Lord George Murray has clearly described the dangers which surrounded the adventurous prince and his men when they had reached Derby: "We did not doubt but that the Duke of Cumberland would be that night at Stafford, which was as near to London as Derby. Mr. Wade was coming up, by hard marches, the east road; and we knew that an army, at least equal to any of these, would be formed near London, consisting of guards and horse, with troops which they would bring from the coast where they were quartered; so that there would be three armies made up of regular troops, that would surround us, being above thirty thousand men, whereas we were not above five thousand fighting men, if so many." †

It is scarcely necessary to believe that, in the face of this danger, there were any especial reasons, which time has not yet developed, to determine Charles' council of war to advise a retreat. Lord George Murray has detailed the solid arguments which were opposed to the obstinate rashness of Charles. The prince did not doubt that the justness of his cause would prevail; he had hopes of a defection in the enemy's army; he was bent upon putting all to the risk. It was vain to tell him that, if a misfortune should happen, "it could not be supposed that one man could escape; for the militia, who had not appeared much against us hitherto, would, upon our defeat, possess all the roads, and the enemy's horse would surround us on all hands." ‡ The Highlanders in the streets of Derby were animated to the highest pitch of enthusiasm, breathing nothing but a desire for the combat with the Duke of Cumberland. "They were to be seen, during the whole day, in crowds before the shops of the cutlers, quarrelling about who should be the first to sharpen and give a proper edge to their swords." § In spite of this ardor, the chiefs, one and all, combated the desire of the prince to give battle on the 6th. They knew, says De Johnstone, that, "in case of a defeat in England, no one in our army could by any possibility escape destruction, as the English peasants were hostile to us in the highest degree." They told the prince that there could be no doubt but that they should easily beat the army of the Duke of Cumberland, though much superior in point of numbers; but then another battle must be fought on Finchley Common before they could enter London; and they very quietly asked, if by a miracle they could arrive at the capital, what sort of figure four thousand men would make amid a population of a million. ‖ This was an exaggerated estimate of the London population—a common error of that period. But the argument was equally strong if applied to a population of half a million. Before we proceed to describe the retreat, which was the result of these sensible opinions, let us, out of very imperfect materials, endeavor to obtain a glimpse of what the people of London were doing and thinking at this period, when war appeared to be closely approaching their peaceful homes.

The chief authority upon which a sober historian rests his belief that, when Charles Edward was known to have reached Derby, the English metropolis presented a frightful scene of terror and want of confidence, is the statement of the Chevalier de Johnstone: "Our arrival at Derby was known at London on the 5th of December; and the following day, called by the English Black Monday, the intelligence was known throughout the whole city, which was filled with terror and consternation." ¶ The 6th of December was a Friday, and not a Monday. With no personal knowledge of the circumstances, De Johnstone goes on to tell us that a run was made upon the bank; that it only escaped bankruptcy by paying in sixpences, and by sending its own agents to be foremost in the crowd, and to present the notes at one door, and take back the sixpences by another door. There was a Jacobite party in London, with one of the city members, Alderman Heathcote, at its head; and a run upon the bank was one of the means adopted to produce confusion. But the six-penny story rests upon no other evidence than that of De Johnstone; and no fact is more indisputable than that a very large number of those who are called by Smollett "the trading part of the city, and those concerned in money corporations," gave public notice that they would not refuse to receive the notes of the Bank of England in payment of any sum of money.* Smollett indeed says that the moneyed and commercial persons "prognosticated their own ruin in the approaching revolution, and their countenances exhibited the plainest marks of horror and despair." But Smollett, entertaining himself Jacobite partialities, tells us something more: "The militia of London and Middlesex were kept in readiness to march; double watches were posted at the city gates, and signals of alarm appointed. The volunteers of the city were incorporated into a regiment; the practitioners of the law headed by the judges; the weavers of Spitalfields, and other communities, engaged in associations; and even the managers of the theatres offered to raise a body of their dependants for the service of the government." We do not find these circumstances noticed by the historian, who asks, "Had, then, the Highlanders continued to push forward, must not the increasing terror have palsied all power of resistance?" † The inhabitants of London, according to De Johnstone, fled to the country, with their most precious effects. ‡ A great number certainly left the busy streets, and were crowding up Highgate Hill. But it was to gaze upon the camp at Finchley, in which London artisans were associated with troops of the line, who could inspire courage, if such inspiration were needed, by tales of Dettingen and Fontenoy. A far larger proportion were laughing at caricatures of the pretender, the pope, and the King of France, and at those which, after the unvarying fashion of Englishmen to laugh at themselves, ridiculed Johnnie Cope, and did not spare the Duke of Newcastle. They were reading the "Penny Post," with a border of capital letters forming the words, "No pretender! No popery! No slavery! No arbitrary power! No wooden shoes!" § Hogarth's wonderful print of the "March to Finchley" was not published till 1750; but from this minute embodiment of all the prevailing aspects of the outer life of the London population we may gather some clearer notion of the realities of 1745 than from the most elaborate description. We may here trace the military costume of the time—the Prussian sugar-loaf cap of the grenadier—the fifer then first naturalized in the British army. We may form some notion of the license of the soldiery in those days of cheap intoxication. We may follow all the rough diversions and practical jokes of the London populace, who exhibit in their demeanor any feeling but that of terror. We may notice how the great observer of the life around him alluded to—what was perhaps the only real danger in this crisis—the prospect of a French invasion, by which, in conjunction with the Highland insurrection, "the Jacobites were elevated to an insolence of hope which they were at no pains to conceal." ‖ The French spy, communicating to the eager old Scot the letter which promises a descent from Dunkirk, is one of those Hogarthian groups which we may accept without hesitation as the truth of individuality.

The fashionable world of London was dull at the opening of this winter: "There never was so melancholy a town; no kind of public place but the play-houses, and they look as if the rebels had just driven away the company. Nobody but has some fear for themselves, for their money, or for their friends in the army." ¶ This is the serious fear which becomes a grave nation at a dangerous crisis; but it is not the fear of cowardice. To understand why there should have been fear at all, we must bear in mind how imperfect were the means of public information. The numbers of the rebels were generally estimated at fifteen thousand. But the fidelity of the common people to their government and their aversion to the cause of the Stuarts are unquestionable. A French ship called the Soleil had been taken, with many Jacobites on board, who were coming to join their Scottish friends. There was among them a member of the unfortunate family of Derwentwater. "The mob," says Walpole, "persuaded of his being the youngest pretender, could scarcely be persuaded from tearing him to pieces all the way on the road, and at his arrival. He said he had heard of English mobs, but could not conceive they were so dreadful." The populace of London have, happily, long since ceased to be ferocious. In this instance, and in several others, we recognize no generous pity for the unfortunate; but we have, even in this temper, one of the many evidences of the mistake into which some recent writers have fallen—that of speaking "of the march to Derby as an enterprise, which, had it been continued, was extremely likely to overturn the Hanover settlement and restore the Stuarts to the throne." The sensible and unprejudiced historian from whom we quote truly says, "The country had already pronounced upon the question, in the cold silence with which it received the Highland march." * But there was an influence of public opinion, not only in England but in parts of Scotland, of far more importance than the hostility of the English peasantry, and the rude aversion of a London mob—an influence that rendered even the temporary success of the Stuart cause almost an impossibility. Mr. Hallam has pointed out that the "augmentation of the democratical influence, using that term as applied to the commercial and industrious classes in contradistinction to the territorial aristocracy, was the slow but certain effect of accumulated wealth and diffused knowledge, acting, however, on the traditional notions of freedom and equality, which had ever prevailed in the English people." † The encouragement which Charles Edward undoubtedly received from some considerable portion of the territorial aristocracy, and on which he too confidently relied, was counteracted by the impassive calmness, or decided resistance, of the commercial and industrious classes. It was not till the too confiding prince had got to Derby, that it was pointed out to him that, "after traversing all the provinces which had the reputation of being most attached to his family, in order to enable them to join him, a single person of distinction had not yet declared himself." ‡ The commercial and industrious classes were fairly represented at Liverpool, where a regiment of foot of seven hundred men was raised, clothed, and paid by public subscription. They were represented at Glasgow, where a body of twelve hundred men were raised, half of whom were sent to the defence of Stirling, and half retained to protect the city. In Bristol the same spirit was displayed. We may therefore receive, with considerable suspicion, the statement of Smollett, that the trading part of the city were overwhelmed with fear and dejection. They were subscribing large sums at the beginning of December, to procure additional warm clothing for the troops engaged in the suppression of the rebellion; and the Quakers even provided woollen under-waistcoats for the troops in the North. London had received its abundant share of that commercial prosperity which, in twenty years, had added a third to the value of the country's exports; and which had enabled the wages of the laborer to command a larger portion of subsistence than at any previous period of our history. § The community in general was flourishing and contented; and while Smollett, speaking from his own political prejudices, says that many, who had no property to lose, thought no change could be for the worse, we may, on the contrary, believe that the bulk even of the humblest, who lived under equal laws which protected labor as much as capital, really desired no change, even amid their grumbling against a German king, and their angry recollections of excise and the Gin Act.

In periods of great political excitement, when opposite principles are ripening into active hostility, the prejudices of a people, and the unreasonable suspicions of a government, are almost as destructive of the peace of society as the positive dangers of insurrection and anarchy. There is an instance of the terror produced by apprehensions of popular violence, in the case of the father of Nollekens, the sculptor. The old man, a Roman Catholic native of Antwerp, lived in Dean Street, Soho, at the time of the rebellion. He was a hoarder of his money; and he became so convinced that, as a foreigner and a papist, his house would be attacked by a mob, and his precious savings carried away, that "he lingered in a state of alarm until his death," in 1747. ‖ The suspicions attached during this crisis to Scotsmen in London are described by Sir Andrew Mitchell, in a letter to Duncan Forbes, of the 23d of October: "Already every man of our country is looked on as a traitor, as one secretly inclined to the pretender, and waiting but an opportunity to declare. The guilty and the innocent are confounded together, and the crimes of a few imputed to the whole nation." * An example of this undiscriminating suspicion may be found in a curious incident in the life of a very remarkable man, the founder of the great banking-house of Drummond. Andrew Drummond was the brother of Sir William Drummond, who became Viscount Strathallan in 1711. Strathallan was taken prisoner at Sheriffmuir, in 1715, but was released, and continued to reside in Scotland. Andrew, like many other younger branches of high Scottish families, felt that he must endeavor to secure independence by a mercantile pursuit. He settled in London soon after the union, uniting the proper business of a banker with that of a goldsmith, according to the fashion of earlier times. His ledger of 1716, in the possession of his successors, shows that he sold and exchanged jewelry, such as diamond ear-rings, buckles, and other personal adornments. In the early years of his banking business he was chiefly intrusted with the management of the pecuniary affairs of the friends of the house of Stuart, particularly of those who were abroad. Without compromising himself, he rendered valuable assistance to many who were exiled or suspected; not in assisting designs against the reigning family, but in a faithful administration of their private funds. "His brother sent up to him his two nephews, Robert and Henry, with whom he shared whatever emoluments he derived from the services he rendered to the Royalists; and in this way grew up the banking establishment which his descendants have ever since carried on." † In 1745, when Lord Strathallan was actively engaged in the rebellion, suspicion not unnaturally fell upon the banker at Charing Cross. A warrant was sent into his house, and his books and papers were seized. A report was spread that he was ruined. It was the crisis of the thriving Scotsman's fortune. He published a notice in the "Gazette" that he would instantly pay all his creditors in full. Confidence did not desert him. The government could find nothing to inculpate him after the most searching examination; and obtained no knowledge from his papers "of what was going on in Scotland." His books and papers were returned; and a round-robin was signed by every member of the cabinet as an approving testimonial of his conduct. The king desired to see him at St. James's; but at that interview the sturdy banker turned his back upon the secretary, Sir Edward Winnington, to whom he attributed the calumny against him. Andrew Drummond's bank became the favored establishment of the aristocracy of all parties. George II. there kept his private account, and so also George III. This is one of the many instances of the rapidity with which, after the final struggle, national and dynastic contests became merged in individual confidence and public tranquillity. There were national prejudices of Englishman and Scot still to be overcome; but these were only as the shifting clouds after a storm. The trust in Andrew Drummond, the banker, of the second and third sovereigns of the Brunswick line, may be regarded as a graceful tribute, not only to his individual integrity and honor, but as exhibiting some sympathy for the misfortunes of his house. The representative of the elder branch of that house, the Duke of Perth, died on shipboard after his escape from Scotland in 1746. The head of the other branch, Lord Strathallan, was killed at the battle of Culloden. ‡

But if the ancient resistance and disaffection of the Jacobite party gradually melted away in the security for good government which the nation enjoyed under the Act of Settlement, the fears of the administration, and the traditional feelings of the people, too long endured in the penal laws against Roman Catholics. There was no attempt at their conciliation at the crisis of the rebellion. At the beginning of December, 1745, a proclamation was issued, calling upon magistrates to discover and bring to justice all Jesuits and popish priests; and offering a reward of one hundred pounds for the apprehension of any such objects of the severity of the earlier statutes. This proclamation called forth a strong remonstrance from the resident ministers of various Catholic states, and especially on the arrest of a domestic of the Venetian ambassador. They contended that the law of nations had been violated; and that the act of Anne, which forbade the arrest upon civil process of the ministers of foreign powers, or of their servants, was infringed in these proceedings. The secretary of state, in his reply, did not approve of the arrest of the Venetian ambassador's domestic; but he rested the justification of the government upon the plea that chapels, with an enormous number of priests, were maintained, wherein mass was celebrated, not for the use of the minister's family, but rather for the sake of allowing the king's converted subjects to be present at mass, contrary to law. "The number of national Roman Catholic priests, who swarm more than ever in this town, was found dangerous to the state, especially at a time of open rebellion in favor of a pretender of the same religion."

CHAPTER CLVII.

Charles Edward retreats from Derby—The retreating army pursued—Skirmish at Clifton—Bombardment and capitulation of Carlisle—Charles Edward in Scotland—General Hawley takes the command of the king's troops—Battle of Falkirk—Retreat of Hawley to Edinburgh—Lord Lovat—The Duke of Cumberland in Scotland—Flight of the Highland army from Stirling.

THE retreat from Derby, regarded as a military operation, was highly creditable to the officers by whom it was conducted, and especially to Lord George Murray. He was foremost to advise that retreat; and to his prudence and watchfulness may be attributed, in great measure, that the depressed Highlanders marched back to their own mountains without serious disorganization. "I offered," he says, "to make the retreat, and be always in the rear myself." * Before daybreak, on the morning of the 6th of December, the little army left Derby. The men thought they were advancing to attack the Duke of Cumberland. "As soon," says De Johnstone, "as the day allowed them to see the objects around them, and they found that we were retracing our steps, nothing was to be heard throughout the whole army but expressions of rage and lamentation." † The prince, as blindly confident as the brave and ignorant Highlanders who would have followed him to destruction, was no longer cheerful and alert. "In marching forward he had always been the first up in the morning, and had the men in motion before break of day, and commonly marched himself afoot; but in the retreat he was much longer of leaving his quarters; so that, though the rest of the army were all on their march, the rear could not move till he went, and then he rode straight on, and got to the quarters with the van." Such is the relation of Lord George Murray. The partisans of this young prince have delighted to exhibit his condescending participation in the fatigue and privations of his followers, when leading them, as he and they thought, to the rewards of his bold enterprise. His moody displeasure and haughty indifference when his insane plans were opposed and rejected, show how truly he adhered to his family convictions, that the sovereign will should override every other consideration; that, to use his own words, "he was accountable to no one but God." His physical courage has been doubted, probably with great injustice. But his conduct in this retreat exhibits none of those qualities which appear in heroic minds, when high hopes are suddenly destroyed and serious dangers are to be confronted. Charles Edward had been deceived into the belief that the friends of his house in England were numerous, powerful, and ready to crowd round his standard. Not one of the secret Jacobites or avowed Tories of great families in the North lifted up a voice for him. He expected a descent from France would have been made upon British shores. To make such an invasion in some degree palatable to Englishmen, he had said, in a proclamation of the 10th of October, that when he saw a foreign force brought by his enemies against him—when the Elector of Hanover's allies were called over to protect his government against the subjects of the lawful sovereign—it was high time for the king, his father, to accept the assistance of those who had engaged to support him. That assistance did not come. There was a numerous and vigilant Channel fleet ready to resist every attempt at invasion. Not in the smoky hut at Eriska—not when he was hiding after the fatal day of Culloden—could the thoughts of Charles Edward have been more cheerless than on the retreat from Derby. His weakness of character displayed itself in a rash trust that his cause was so sacred that some miraculous success would ever attend it: "From the facility with which he had gained the victory at Gladsmuir he was always for fighting; and sometimes even reproached Lord George for his unwillingness to incur the risk of an engagement, when no advantage could be derived from a victory, and for his having prevented him from fighting the Duke of Cumberland at Derby."*

It is one of the many instances of the want of correct intelligence at the headquarters of the English generals, that the rebel army had been two days on its march back to Scotland before the Duke of Cumberland became aware that they were not advancing toward London. He immediately dispatched from his camp at Meriden, near Coventry, all his cavalry to pursue them; and the country people, as the infantry followed, furnished horses to mount foot-soldiers drafted out of various regiments.† A thousand cavalry troops were thus extemporized. "Our foot-soldiers not being accustomed to riding, I thought," says Volunteer Ray, "they looked odd on horseback, with their muskets and knapsacks flung over their shoulders." Marshal Wade was at Wakefield, with his army, on the 10th, when he heard of the retreat; and he also dispatched his cavalry, under General Oglethorpe, in pursuit of the rebels. The Duke of Cumberland and Oglethorpe arrived at Preston on the 13th; and on the 17th they united their mounted forces at Kendal. They were now close upon the rear of the Highland army. The hurried march back of Charles Edward, over ground which he had so recently passed in some sort of triumph, was not accompanied by any encouraging popular demonstrations. At Manchester the Highlanders were now received with "visible marks of dislike." The peaceful and orderly disposition of these men in their advance was now with difficulty kept up. At Lancaster they plundered, and threw open the prisons. As they went onward, "few there were who would go on foot if they could ride; and mighty stealing, taking, and pressing of horses there was among us." The captain, who thus records that the army "began to behave with less forbearance," adds, "diverting it was to see the Highlanders mounted, without either breeches, saddle, or anything else but the bare backs of the horses to ride on, and for their bridle only a straw rope."‡ Near Stockport the Highlanders set fire to a village, the peasants having shot at one of their comrades acting as a patrol. The retreat was now manifestly through a hostile district. The Duke of Perth, having been detached with some horsemen to proceed to Scotland, was attacked by the country people after he had passed Kendal, and was compelled to return. He again rode with a large escort the next day to Penrith, when he was again driven back.

The retreating and the pursuing forces were close together on the 18th of December. Lord George Murray had been detained at Shap on the 17th, from the difficulties of getting along the bad roads and up the steep hills. The weather was wet and tempestuous. "I was stopped," says Lord George, "by what I always suspected—the wagons could not be carried through a water where there was a narrow turn and a steep ascent."§ Horses and men could not overcome the difficulty until nightfall. The van and the rear were widely separated, when Murray reached the village of Clifton, near Penrith, on the 18th. They were encountered by a party of volunteers, but the Highlanders soon dispersed these. A footman of the Duke of Cumberland was taken prisoner, and he said the duke was very close at hand. Lord George had only about a thousand men. He was resolved to wait an attack, even without reinforcements, for which he had applied. He took up a position between the hedges of the village and wall of Lord Lonsdale's park. The night was cloudy, with a feeble moonlight. Creeping along among the inclosures the dismounted dragoons of the royal army were advancing upon the Highlanders. Their main body was on horseback at some distance. Murray's own narrative of this skirmish is clear and spirited: "The dismounted dragoons had not only lined the bottom inclosures, but several of them had come up to two hedges that lay south and north; the others where we were, and the dragoons at the bottom, lay east and west. The Appin battalion were next the lane upon that side, and Cluny's farther to their left. We advanced, and had a good deal of fire on both sides. After the Highlanders on that side had given most of their fire, they lay close at an open hedge, which was the second in these fields. We then received the whole fire of the dragoons that were at the bottom, upon which Cluny said, 'What the devil is this?' Indeed the bullets were going thick enough. I told him we had nothing for it but going down upon them, sword in hand, before they had time to charge again. I immediately drew my sword, and cried, 'Claymore!' Cluny did the same, and we ran down to the bottom ditch, clearing the diagonal hedges as we went. There were a good many of the enemy killed at the bottom ditch, and the rest took to their heels, but received the fire of the Glengarry regiment."* There was no more firing. Murray had secured by his courageous stand a safer continuance of their retreat for the van. Half an hour after the skirmish he also ordered a retreat. "We travelled all night," says the chaplain MacLachlan, "though the moon set at twelve o'clock, and arrived at Carlisle early next day." The van had reached that city the same morning.

On the 20th of December, before break of day, the rebel army, with the exception of a portion of the English regiment raised at Manchester and some Scottish companies, quitted Carlisle. "I could never comprehend the reason," says De Johnstone, "for sacrificing these unfortunate victims." The Duke of Perth was unwilling, naturally enough, to leave any of his men. Murray told him, in the presence of Charles, that if the prince would order him, he would stay with the Athol brigade, though he knew his fate; for as soon as cannon could be brought up from Whitehaven the place would not be tenable. The works might have been blown up, Murray held. At any rate, if the Scottish army returned, Carlisle could not harm them. "I was little at the prince's quarters that day," says Murray, "but I found he was determined on the thing. It was very late next day before we marched. The prince had some difficulty about those who were to stay at Carlisle, who were very unwilling." Dr. King, who was in correspondence with Charles Edward for some years after these events, says, "I never heard him discover any sorrow or compassion for the misfortune of so many worthy men who had suffered in his cause."† Their sufferings, in his view, were nothing but the just tribute of loyalty to their rightful master. Upon the same principle he had no remorse in determining, against all remonstrance, to sacrifice a band of brave men to "that egotistic fanaticism, which made every calamity endured by his followers in the cause of his house a simple incident in their line of duty."‡ The callous obduracy with which Charles Edward resolved to leave this unhappy garrison to the first vengeance of the English, by military slaughter or civil proceedings against traitors, is, in our view, as odious as the barbarities which procured William of Cumberland the title of "the Butcher." The duke came up to Carlisle on the 21st. He invested the place, which resisted with its small means of defence; but there was no artillery to compel an immediate surrender. Large guns, as Murray had expected, were brought up from Whitehaven. Ray records his own share in procuring these means of attack: "I was sent to Whitehaven, to order the battering cannon from thence. The people rose in a body, and got horses and carriages with all expedition. They were ten pieces of eighteen-pounders, of which four were drawn by forty horses of Sir James Lowther, which went along pretty briskly; but I saw sixteen or eighteen of the country horses to a gun, and often set, the roads being very soft."§ When Ray returned on the 22d he found Carlisle invested on all sides. "A great many people," he says, "came out of the country to assist the duke's army, with clubs and staves, and such other weapons as they had; the game-laws forbidding the use of firearms. The countrymen being most of them no use, and their number being about ten thousand, his royal highness ordered them all to return home, except a few who were employed in cutting fascines for the batteries. The duke's regular forces at this time were about four thousand." The bombardment of Carlisle began on the 28th. "The rebel garrison," continues the Volunteer, "were as much surprised as if they had felt the shock of an earthquake, wondering from whence these roaring guns came." It has been alleged as an excuse for the sacrifice of this garrison by Charles Edward, that he believed the duke "had no battering artillery at his disposal." On the 30th a white flag was hung out from the walls. The firing ceased. John Hamilton, the governor, asked to know what terms would be given upon the surrender of the city and castle of Carlisle. The stern answer was, "All the terms his royal highness will or can grant to the rebel garrison of Carlisle, are that they shall not be put to the sword, but be reserved for the king's pleasure." The garrison capitulated. The number of prisoners was a hundred and fourteen English, two hundred and seventy-four Scotsmen, and eight Frenchmen. This enumeration, made by Ray, sufficiently confutes the calumnious charge that the abandonment of this garrison by Charles Edward "originated in a spirit of vengeance against the English nation, as no one of all the persons of distinction in England, who invited the prince to make a descent in Great Britain, had declared themselves openly in his favor, by attaching their fortunes to his, as the Scots had done." *

The Duke of Cumberland, after the surrender of Carlisle, was summoned to London to take the command of the forces that were assembled to guard the south coast against a threatened French invasion. A portion of the army of the duke was left under the command of General Hawley, to advance into Scotland. Marshal Wade's troops were to return to their post at Newcastle. On the 20th of December the Highland army quitted England. This day was the anniversary of the prince's birth. When the impulsive race whom he had led to a promised conquest—those who had gloomily turned back from the rich prize which they fancied within their reach—had crossed the border-river Esk, wading up to their arm-pits, "the bagpipers having commenced playing, the Highlanders began all to dance, expressing the utmost joy at seeing their country again." They forgot the chagrin "which they had continually nourished ever since their departure from Derby." † Passing through Dumfries—a town described by De Johnstone as full of fanatical Calvinists, who had seized some ammunition wagons, and who now were punished by a considerable fine—they reached Glasgow on the 24th. When the Highland army was in the neighborhood of that city in September, a demand of fifteen thousand pounds was made under the sign-manual of the prince, as the price the citizens were to pay to save themselves from confiscations enforced by Highlanders in arms, who had long been their terror. They compromised the matter by a payment to the amount of five thousand five hundred pounds, part in money and goods, and part in bills. Their enemies had now come to make heavier demands in the shape of thousands of Highland coats, shirts, shoes, tartan hose, bonnets, and money. There was no escaping. They were told that they were rebels. Parliament afterward voted ten thousand pounds as a compensation to the loyal traders.

After remaining a week at Glasgow, the Highland army marched to Stirling. They were sturdily opposed by the people; but they got possession of the town. General Blakeney, the governor of the castle, met them with defiance. The prince had now been joined by large numbers of Highlanders from Perth, under the command of Lord Strathallan; and by refugees who had been landed from France. His army now reached nine thousand men. He was turned aside from the siege of Stirling by the intelligence that General Hawley had marched from Edinburgh, through Linlithgow, and had reached the neighborhood of Falkirk. Hawley, who had fought under Argyle at the battle of Sheriffmuir, and had served in Flanders in the army of the Duke of Cumberland, was appointed—perhaps more on account of his repute for ferocity than for his military talents—to the most important command at this juncture. "He is called lord chief justice," says Horace Walpole; "frequent and sudden executions are his passion. . . . He is very brave and able; with no small bias to the brutal." ‡ His ability was tested in the field of Falkirk. He set out to meet the Highland army with a presumptuous contempt for what he called "undisciplined rabbles." He must have recollected something of the mode in which Highlanders fought, and of the extreme caution with which it was necessary to guard against their rapid surprises of an enemy. He was satisfied that with his disciplined troops he could easily destroy the insurgents. De Johnstone truly observes that the Highlanders "proved that bravery may supply the place of discipline at times, as discipline supplies the place of bravery;" and that the Highland mode of attack "is so terrible that the best troops in Europe would with difficulty sustain the first shock of it." * Hawley took no care to enable his men steadily to bear the first shock. He neglected the ordinary prudence of so disposing his troops that the Highlanders should not have that advantage of situation which they always sought for, and that no sudden attack by his enemy should produce a panic equivalent to a victory.

John Home, who joined General Hawley's army as a lieutenant in the Glasgow volunteers, has described the battle of Falkirk with care and impartiality. On the morning of the 17th of January Hawley's army had been joined by a regiment of dragoons, and by a thousand Highlanders under the command of Colonel Campbell, afterward Duke of Argyle. When they encamped near Falkirk some Highland horse and foot were seen moving about with their colors displayed, upon the high-road from Stirling to Falkirk, through the middle of the Torwood. The parade thus made was a stratagem to divert attention from the principal attack, which had been skilfully planned. About one o'clock two English officers climbed a tree, and saw the main body of the Highlanders marching toward them, by the south side of the Torwood. Hawley was spending a pleasant morning at Callander House, and being apprised of this movement of the enemy, he said the men might put on their accoutrements, but there was no necessity for them to be under arms. The report of the officers who had climbed the tree was confirmed by horsemen well mounted, who came in upon the spur. The troops became alarmed. The officers were heard to exclaim, again and again, Where is the general? In his continued absence, they formed their regiments in front of the camp. The general at last came, and ordered three regiments of dragoons to march to the moor, and take possession of the high ground between them and the advancing enemy. The infantry were commanded to follow. "At the very instant," says Home, "the regiments of foot began to march, the day was overcast; and by and by a storm of wind and rain beat directly in the face of the soldiers, who were marching up the hill with their bayonets fixed, and could not secure their pieces from the rain. The cavalry was a good way before the infantry, and for some time it seemed a sort of race between the Highlanders and the dragoons, which of them should get first to the top of the hill." The rebel army was marching in two columns. Three Macdonald regiments, who were at the head of the columns to the north, got to the top of the hill before the dragoons, and, taking ground where they had a morass on their right flank, turned their backs to the storm. This struggle for the advantage of position determined the course of this sudden contest. The Highland columns were formed in two lines, with a reserve in the rear, among which the prince was stationed. The royal army was also formed in two lines, with a reserve. The hurry in which the troops on both sides were formed, the inequality of the ground, and the darkness of the storm, produced a scene of confusion which could scarcely be called a battle. It was, says Sir Walter Scott, "as confused an affair as can well be imagined." † Before the infantry of Hawley's army were completely formed, he sent an order for the cavalry, in number about seven or eight hundred, to attack the two lines of eight thousand Highlanders. The bold general had seen at the battle of Sheriffmuir the discomfiture of the flank of the rebel army by a charge through a morass. He repeated the movement at Falkirk. There was a slight difference of circumstances. At Sheriffmuir a severe frost had rendered the morass passable. At Falkirk the dragoons plunged into a bog "where," says Scott, "the Highlanders cut them to pieces with so little trouble that, as one of the performers assured us, the feat was as easy as slicing baacon." ‡ It was then nearly four o'clock. The storm continued. The darkness rendered the movements of either army scarcely perceptible. But the Highlanders, pursuing the discomfited dragoons, received the fire of the English infantry, which they returned, and then, throwing away their muskets, attacked after their fashion with broadsword and dirk. "It seemed a total rout," says Home, "and for some time General Hawley did not know that any one regiment of his army was standing." But one regiment remained steady, and, being joined by other infantry, drove back the pursuers. The Highlanders now, in turn, fancied themselves defeated. "Part of the king's army, much the greater part, was flying to the eastward, and part of the rebel army was flying to the westward." Hawley, before it became quite dark, tried to set fire to his tents, but they would not burn; and he retreated to Linlithgow, through Falkirk, leaving his baggage and his guns. The next day he marched to Edinburgh with an army not greatly reduced in numbers, but sadly degraded in the senseless conduct of this battle of half an hour. The leaders of the rebel army scarcely exulted in their victory. They blamed each other for its incompleteness. Hawley took no blame to himself, but caused several officers and soldiers to be tried by court-martial, of whom two soldiers were condemned to be shot, and more than one officer was cashiered. In a letter from General Wightman to Duncan Forbes, he says, "everything would have gone to wreck, in a worse manner than at Preston, if General Huske had not acted with judgment and courage, and appeared everywhere. Hawley seems to be sensible of his misconduct; for when I was with him on Saturday morning at Linlithgow, he looked most wretchedly; even worse than Cope did a few hours after his scuffle, when I saw him at Fala." * The writer of this letter says, "This is an odd scene of things, and altogether an unexpected occurrence; and will doubtless shock the king and the ministry, as well as the whole English nation." The king and the ministry sent off the Duke of Cumberland to Scotland, in the confidence that he would retrieve this disaster. The English nation was not greatly shocked, if we may accept an interesting passage in a letter of Gray to Walpole as an evidence of the general feeling: "Our defeat, to be sure, is a rueful affair for the honor of our troops; but the duke is gone, it seems, with the rapidity of a cannon-bullet to undefeat us again. The common people in town at least know how to be afraid: but we are such uncommon people here † as to have no more sense of danger than if the battle had been fought when and where the battle of Cannæ was. The perception of these calamities and their consequences, that we are supposed to get from books, is so faintly impressed, that we talk of war, famine, and pestilence, with no more apprehension than of a broken head, or of a coach overturned between York and Edinburgh."

In the accounts of the battle of Falkirk we find mention of Lord Lovat's regiment as one of those which repulsed the dragoons. Simon Fraser, Lord Lovat, was not with his clan, but his son was with them. The chief of the clan, who had exhibited the passions of an untamed savage in his youth; who, in his maturer age, pursued the same system of barbarian violence in his transactions with his neighbors; now, in his extreme old age, covered his actions with what he considered an impenetrable shield of craft. It was still the cunning of the uncivilized man rather than the honorable reserve of a gentleman engaged in high and dangerous political enterprises. There are no more curious exhibitions of human character than the letters of this remarkable person, at the crisis of 1745. After the landing of Charles Edward, Lovat wrote to the lord advocate, that he was ready to serve the king and the government as in 1715, when he did more in suppressing that rebellion than any other man of his rank. But he begged to have a thousand stand of arms delivered to him and his clan at Inverness.‡ To Lochiel he wrote at the same time: "My service to the prince. I will aid you what I can, but my prayers are all I can give at present." In a letter of the same period to the lord president he calls the landing of Charles "a mad enterprise;" and weeps to think that "this desperate prince" would be the cause of much bloodshed. When Cope was beaten at Preston Pans, Lord Lovat thought the Stuart cause would prosper; and he compelled his son, by threats and entreaties, to join the insurgents. The Master of Lovat, as he was styled, was too late to join the march into England. He remained, with other clans, at Perth. Meanwhile the old man, still doubtful which might be the winning side, poured forth his protestations to Duncan Forbes that he himself was entirely innocent of his son's proceedings: "I do solemnly declare to your lordship that nothing ever vexed my soul so much as my son's resolution to go and join the prince." * In another letter he says, "Since my son was determined on that mad foolish project, I never spoke to him about it but he always flew in my face like a wild cat." † We may thus explain how Lord Lovat's regiment was at the battle of Falkirk, when the old man had himself been playing fast and loose. After the retreat from Derby he tried to make his son faithless to the cause he had himself driven him to adopt. The honor of the son, in clinging to the side on which he was fighting, is a pleasing contrast to the habitual perfidy of the father.

The Duke of Cumberland, travelling post night and day, arrived at Edinburgh on the 30th of January. All London was in anxious expectation to hear news of another battle. "Nothing," says Walpole, "was talked of but the expectation of the courier." The duke set out on his march on the 31st to raise the siege of Stirling. That siege had been very inefficiently conducted. There was little hope that the French engineers would be able to silence the fire of the castle by their ill-constructed batteries. The prince, with his own immediate advisers, was for protracting the siege, and remaining to fight the Duke of Cumberland. More prudent counsel enforced the necessity of a retreat. A paper was addressed to him on the 29th of January, signed by Lord George Murray, Lochiel, and six other chiefs, pointing out that the army had been much reduced by desertions, and that if the enemy should march before the reduction of Stirling, they anticipated a speedy destruction through the inequality of their numbers. John Hay, who was officially employed by the prince, says that Charles being in bed, he went into his room with this dispatch; and that when the prince read the paper "he struck his head against the wall till he staggered, and exclaimed most violently against Lord George Murray. His words were, 'Good God! have I lived to see this!'" Hay adds that the number of men said to be absent was greatly exaggerated. The Chaplain MacLachlan has recorded that, on the night of the battle of Falkirk, some of the men went off in the hurry; that three of the prince's aides-de-camp entreated him to rally them, because he could speak Erse to them; that he succeeded with many; and that he then rode off to the Duke of Perth, to entreat him to place a strong guard at the fords of Frewe to intercept these deserters.‡ The amount of desertion was increased by a circumstance peculiarly characteristic of Highland clan jealousies. One of the Clan Clanranald accidentally shot a younger son of Glengarry. It was not sufficient to appease the anger of the Glengarry tribe that the poor fellow who fired a musket, without knowing that it was loaded, was condemned and shot. They went off in a body to their mountains. The prince had no choice but to yield to the advice of the chiefs who had counselled an immediate retreat. But he is held to have shown his anger, like a petted child, by deranging all the precautions that had been taken for an orderly march. In their hurry to destroy their magazine of powder, the rebels blew up a church in which it had been deposited. MacLachlan says this was the act of a rash young fellow who, without any orders, fired a pistol at the powder, by which folly he killed himself, and killed and wounded others. Murray records that, at a council of war held at Crieff, he "complained much of the flight, and entreated to know who had advised it. The prince did not incline to lay the blame on anybody, but said he took it on himself." § When the news arrived in London that "the moment the rebel army saw the duke's they turned back with the utmost precipitation," it was concluded that this flight, as Murray termed the retreat, "looked exceedingly like the conclusion of this business." ‖ Unhappily there is more of this business to be related; and much of it of a painful nature, from which we would gladly turn our view.

The Highland army, marching rapidly in two divisions—one by Blair Athol and one by the coast—reached Inverness on the 18th of February. The Duke of Cumberland, moving much more slowly, took up his head-quarters at Aberdeen. Five thousand Hessian troops had arrived to strengthen the forces of the British government. While Cumberland remained inactive at Aberdeen, Charles had taken the citadel of Inverness; and Fort Augustus had been destroyed by one of the Highland parties. Fort William and Blair Castle held out against him. The interval which elapsed between the prince's arrival at Inverness and the duke's advance to attack him was unfavorable to the success of the insurrection. The insurgents were cut off from the abundant supplies of the Lowlands. The king's ships intercepted the provisions and the gold which were occasionally dispatched from France. The active and hardy mountaineers engaged in various expeditions; but the advantages which they gained were of little importance in the great issue which was approaching. Time was working to their destruction. The Highland army was without pay; and they sold their allowances of oatmeal "for their other needs, at which the poor creatures grumbled exceedingly."* They were certainly not in the best fighting condition when, on the 8th of April, the Duke of Cumberland commenced his march from Aberdeen. As he advanced along the coast, his army of about nine thousand men were abundantly provided from the transports, which "moved along shore with a gentle breeze and a fair wind."† On the 11th the army reached the Spey. As the duke approached, Lord John Drummond, who was posted to guard the passage of the deep and rapid river, fell back. The Highland officer says in his journal, "To guard the Spey was an easy matter." Volunteer Ray confirms this opinion, in his description of the passage of the English troops: "I was in my station at the head of the regiment, where I very narrowly escaped being shot; for some of the rebels fired at us across the river, kneeling and taking sight as at a blackbird. We entered the river with a guide wading on foot to show where the ford lay; which was bad enough, having loose stones at the bottom, which made it very difficult for man or horse to step without falling, the water belly-deep and very rapid. The ford not lying right across, we were obliged to go midway into the river, then turn to the right, and go down it for about sixty yards, and then turn to the left, inclining upward to the landing-place. In this situation, had the rebels stood us here, it might have been of bad consequence to our army, they having a great advantage over us, and might have defended this important pass a long time, to our great loss; but they wanted to draw our army over, and farther into their country, from whence, in their imagination, we were never to return. When we got up the banks on the other side of the river, the rebels were all fled, and appeared on a hill about half a mile distant, from which they retreated out of sight as we advanced."‡ On the 15th the duke's army reached Nairn, and there halted. The prince's army was encamped on Culloden Moor, about twelve miles distant. The greater part of the moor is in the parish of Daviot. The district is not mountainous. "The land rises like a broken wave from the sea, in some places with a bank of considerable steepness and height; then sinks into a vale of moss land (from which, till reduced to cultivation, the town of Inverness used to be supplied with rushes); thence it ascends again to the parish of Croy and the Moor of Culloden, which extends along the ridge."§ On this flat moor, so unsuited to their peculiar tactics, the Highland army awaited the coming struggle. But doubts came over their leaders, and something bolder might be attempted.

In the afternoon of the 15th a night attack upon the royal army was resolved upon. The English, it was deemed, would be sleeping, after the drunken revels of the duke's birthday, which they had halted at Nairn to celebrate. The Highland officer says, "We set out about eight o'clock that night, with express orders to observe the profoundest silence in our march. Our word was 'King James the Eighth.' We were likewise forbid in the attack to make any use of our firearms, but only of sword, dirk, and bayonet; to cut the tent strings, and pull down the poles, and where we observed a swelling or bulge in the fallen tent there to strike and push vigorously."* The project utterly failed. The darkness of the night made the way uncertain over the rough and swampy waste. The men were weary and half famished. Lord George Murray had the command of the van. About two o'clock he halted; for there were four miles still to march, and there was a great interval between the two columns. A surprise had become impossible. "It was found impracticable," says Lord George, "to be near the enemy till it was within an hour of daylight; and as our only hope was surprising them, and attacking them before day, we were forced to give it up and return to Culloden, where we got about five."†

On Monday, the 14th of April, says a narrative of the period, "the young chevalier mustered his troops in the town of Inverness, and marched along the lines, encouraging them as he passed. Never were men in more exalted spirits."‡ On the 15th, writes the chaplain, MacLachlan, in his journal, "our prince royal had a review in the Muir of Culloden. And as I chanced to come close to him stepping up the hill, I saluted him in my ordinary way, 'God bless and prosper your royal highness.' To which he vouchsafed a reply in a familiar manner, and with a charming smile, 'It will be Gladsmuir, wherever it be.'" Never under any circumstances did this confidence in his destiny appear to have deserted the adventurer—a confidence that might have betrayed him earlier to his ruin, had he not been surrounded by men of judgment and experience. The projected surprise at Nairn would probably have terminated fatally had the attack upon the royal camp been made after the sun had risen—if the desire of the prince to attack at any hour had been complied with. The jaded men who returned to Culloden Moor after that night march were in a very unfit condition for the final struggle of the morning of the 16th. Great exertions were made to procure them food upon the dreary waste; but many had gone to Inverness to seek refreshment for themselves. The Duke of Cumberland was close at hand. Murray had been convinced the day before that the open muir "was certainly not proper for the Highlanders." He caused the ground "on the other side the water of Nairn" to be viewed. "It was found to be hilly and boggy, so that the enemy's cannon and horse could be of no great use to them there."§ When it was proposed to take this better position, the old confidence in some miraculous success prevailed, and the insurgents prepared for battle.

It was eleven o'clock when the king's army was seen advancing. It was formed in three lines, one of which was a reserve. The two foremost lines were so disposed that if the first line were broken by the Highland charge, the second line should stand firm. Cannon were placed between the battalions, and cavalry on the flanks. The men had been trained to remain steady under a rush such as that which had been so fatal at Preston Pans; and they had been instructed to direct the bayonet against the right breast of each opposing Highlander, so as not to be met by his target. The battle-field, so unfavorable to Highland onslaughts and surprises, rendered these precautions in some degree unnecessary; but they evince the judgment of the young commander, who had profited by the fatal lessons of the past. Charles Edward, according to some accounts, was in considerable danger while in the heart of his ranks, which had been drawn up in two lines. "As soon as the duke's cannon were placed, he began cannonading; which was answered by the prince's, who rode along the lines to encourage his men, and posted himself in the most convenient place to see what passed, where one of his servants was killed by his side."‖ The chaplain, MacLachlan, one who from his pushing character always endeavored to be near the prince, says, "From the time I entered the field, especially after the action began, I sat on horseback near our prince royal; and observing many cannon-bullets flying over our heads, whereof one did knock dead his highness's principal groom that stood at twenty paces distance behind us, I rode up to Sir Thomas Sheridan, and begged of him to take notice of the imminent danger the prince was exposed to, without any occasion for it, and therefore to persuade him to withdraw a little. Whereupon Sir Thomas addressed him, and prevailed with him to retire." This is scarcely compatible with the statement that after the servant was killed, while the prince was in the lines, "he coolly continued his inspection."* The cannonade upon which Cumberland wisely relied, in the first instance, to renew in the Highlanders that awe of artillery which they had once felt, had caused deadly havoc in their ranks, before a charge was ordered. It was made at great disadvantage, for a violent storm was driving hail and sleet in their faces. But that terrible onset, which few disciplined troops could stand, carried the Highlanders partly through the first line. The second line stood firm. Then one volley from the unbroken ranks, three deep, utterly disordered the right and centre of the rebel army. They fled in irredeemable confusion. The Clan MacDonald, which had been placed in the left wing, and were offended, to use the words of one of their officers, at not having "this day the right hand in battle," the honor which "Robert the Bruce bestowed upon Angus MacDonald, Lord of the Isles"†—refused to make an onset. Their chief, Keppoch, fell, exclaiming, "My God! have the children of my tribe forsaken me!" The contest became an indiscriminate slaughter. The conduct of Charles Edward has been variously represented. He has been accused of want of courage; but the disproof of this charge was manifested on too many occasions to allow an implicit credit to the statement of Lord Elcho, in his manuscript memoirs, that he "requested the chevalier to charge in person at the head of the left wing, after the right was routed, and that on his not so advancing, Lord Elcho called him an Italian scoundrel, or a worse epithet, and declared he would never see his face more."‡ We again quote from the Chaplain MacLachlan, who followed the prince from the field: "I chanced to meet the Duke of Athol, coming off from his retreating brigade; and as I had the honor to be well known to him, he told me with an oath, 'The Highlanders are broken.' To which I replied, 'I am heartily sorry to hear it, my lord duke; I fear all is lost.' The prince, knowing of the disaster, stepped on, and a good number of retreaters followed him." This battle, which conclusively ended a dynastic contest of fifty-seven years, did not continue for fifty-seven minutes.

If we could here close the narrative of the battle of Culloden, and of the military proceedings which resulted from the victory of the established government, we should not have necessarily to excite the indignation of every reader against the author of barbarities which, happily, very rarely occur in the wars of civilized nations. We scarcely know how to deal with the details of those atrocities which a young prince of the house of Brunswick deemed it necessary to perpetrate. In the valuable collection of "Jacobite Memoirs," there are a hundred and seventeen pages headed "Barbarities after Culloden." To enter minutely into a view of these disgusting occurrences is scarcely necessary for any lessons of historical importance. To slur them over would be a vain attempt to cancel a very black page in our country's annals. We doubt, however, whether a rapid summary, or a minute exposition, of these facts, can have its use "in showing how liable an improved system of government, like that of the Brunswick family, is to fall into the worst errors of that which preceded it; and how liable the people are to be disappointed in their most sanguine expectations of political perfection."§ The editor of these memoirs would compare the atrocities after Culloden with "the tyrannical barbarity of the latter Stuarts," upon the principle of the one being "a good offset" to the other. It appears to us that the only real advantage to be derived from such narratives is to make us grateful that we live in times when "an improved system of government" has gradually produced such a state of public opinion that the ordinary tyrannies of the days of James II., and the exceptional cruelties of the days of George II., could not be repeated without more danger to the throne than the revolts which they sought to crush. The national prejudices of the English at that period, and at subsequent times when these prejudices were even more intense, never led them to countenance the barbarity after Culloden. It is some satisfaction to know that William of Cumberland was "during many years one of the most unpopular men in England."* The alderman of London, who, when it was proposed to present the duke with the freedom of some city company, exclaimed, "Then let it be of the butchers," anticipated the feeling of a better time, when bravery and compassion would be held as inseparable in the character of the great soldier. The people of the Duke of Cumberland's day dreaded that he might be the man to subject them to a military despotism. His nephews feared him. He was compared with the Crookback Richard, who murdered his nephews in the Tower. All this was unjust enough, no doubt, but it showed the feelings of the English nation with regard to the great blot upon the character of one who was blunt, brave, and honest, but who believed too much in the power of brute force in countries under military government. He lived for many years in the retirement of Windsor Great Park. He amused himself by planting hills with Scotch firs, and in making an artificial lake and a cascade, as if to produce a miniature resemblance of the scenery in which he had earned his glory and his twenty-five thousand a year. Perhaps in some moments his favorite Virginia Water, then a wild and uninclosed tract, might have suggested a compunctious remembrance of the solitary lakes, the woods and the wastes, among which he had hunted Highlanders as beasts of prey.

The slaughter of the wounded rebels upon the field of Culloden, the atrocious treatment of the prisoners, and the cold-blooded murders committed on the first and second days after the battle, are much too circumstantially detailed by many witnesses to allow us to believe that the odium which ultimately rested upon the Duke of Cumberland, was the effect of national or party violence. Indifferent to the disgrace he was bringing upon the English nation, he looked at the rebellion as a crime against his house, to be dealt with in a spirit of revenge. "I tremble," he wrote from Scotland, "for fear that this vile spot may still be the ruin of this island and of our family." In another letter he says that "a little blood-letting has only weakened the madness, and not cured it." The "little blood-letting" is the opprobrium which a century of equal justice to Scotland has scarcely yet obliterated. The accursed story may be thus briefly told.

On the day of the battle the wounded rebels that lay on the field received none of that aid which brave men usually offer to their vanquished enemies. The soldiers went up and down knocking such on the head as had any remains of life in them. The weather was cold; the dead, and those supposed to be dead, had been stripped. But, naked and starving, some wretched creatures were still alive on the morning of the 17th of April. A resident in Inverness, who claims to be regarded as a supporter of the government, writes to Bishop Forbes, that although the report of the cruelties was much aggravated, "it is certain that a resolution was taken, that it was not proper to load or crowd this little town with a multitude of wounded and incurable men of our enemy's; and, therefore, a party was ordered to the field of battle, who gathered all the wounded men from the different corners of the field, to one or two parts; and there, on a little rising hillock or ground properly planted, they were finished, with great dispatch; and this, as you and everybody else must own, was, as to them, performing the greatest act of humanity, as it put an end to many miserable lives, remaining in the utmost torture, without any hopes of relief."† This "greatest act of humanity" is termed a most bloody and ruthless deed by a more modern authority,‡ by whom it is stated that the wounded men still alive were collected in two heaps, and a six-pounder applied to each heap. The following evidence to the fact is then adduced: "One Mac Iver, a private, though mutilated in several parts of his body, survived this massacre, a dismal memorial of Cumberland's tender mercies. The man died near Beauly, about the year 1796, where many are still living who may have known him. But to put the bloody deed beyond the shadow of doubt, the writer of this account knew for several years a John Reid, who fought that day in the second battalion of the Royal Scots, and heard from his lips that he saw the cruel deed, and thanked God that he had nothing to do with the black wark. John fought at the battles of Dettingen and Fontenoy, and only died about the year 1807, in the 105th year of his age, and in the full enjoyment of all his mental faculties. He was a lively little man, and retained a correct and vivid recollection of what he had seen and heard."

The slaughter of the miserable survivors found in the field was not the only atrocity of that week of triumph and of shame. To a little cot-house, where goats or sheep used to shelter, about a quarter of a mile distant from the battle-ground, many of the wounded men had crawled in the night-time. They were found by the soldiers. The door of the hut was shut; fire was put to the frail building; and thirty-two persons, including some beggars who had come to the field for plunder, perished in the flames.* On the 18th, parties were sent to search the houses in the neighborhood of the battle; to remove the wounded, and to kill them. John Fraser, called Mac Iver, an officer in Lovat's regiment, with eighteen other officers, had been carried wounded to Culloden House, the residence of the Lord President Forbes. They were treated with kindness by his agent, "who performed acts of beneficence to the wounded in and about the house of Culloden, at the hazard of his life." These nineteen men were tied with ropes, thrown into a cart, carried some distance, and shot under the park-wall. Fraser, though left for dead, after some hours dragged his mangled carcass to a little distance. Lord Boyd, riding by, espied him; had him removed and concealed, and the poor fellow recovered, to remain a crippled memorial of these atrocities.

To go over the afflicting details of military executions—of men whipped to extort confession; of boys, women, and old men murdered and maltreated; of prisoners left to perish upon insufficient allowance in filthy dungeons—would be as disgusting to our readers as the perusal of the documents has been to ourselves. The folly of these proceedings is as manifest as their wickedness. A Londoner, who travelled in the north of Scotland in 1750, writes to his friend, "I happened to fall in with a venerable old gentleman, an honest Whig, who, looking me seriously in the face, asked if the Duke of Cumberland was not a Jacobite?' 'A Jacobite!' said I, 'how comes that in your head?' 'Sure,' replied the old gentleman, 'the warmest zealot in the interest of the prince could not possibly devise more proper methods for sowing the seeds of Jacobitism and disaffection than the Duke of Cumberland did.'" The same letter-writer relates two circumstances sufficiently characteristic of the temper and manners of some commanders of that day—their contempt for civilians, and for civil authority. We must indeed receive with the doubt that ought always to attach to hearsay evidence the anecdotes thus related. But if not strictly to be relied upon, they show something of the prevailing opinions of the time. The provost and aldermen of Inverness went to the levee of the Duke of Cumberland. One of their number, Mr. Hossack, a friend of Duncan Forbes, presumed to say, that he hoped mercy would be mingled with judgment; upon which Hawley cried out, "D—n the puppy! does he pretend to dictate here? Carry him away." Another cried, "Kick him out," and he was kicked out. Duncan Forbes—himself the wisest and truest friend of the Hanoverian government, who expended large sums in opposing the rebellion, which sums he was never repaid—in an interview with the Duke of Cumberland at Inverness, ventured to make mention of the laws of the country. The duke's reply, if we can rely upon the fact, was an example of the insolence that might have plunged England and Scotland into another civil war, had the power of princes to do evil not been sufficiently abridged in the tenure upon which the family of the unwise young man was called to the highest estate among a free people. This was the reputed answer to the Lord President of Scotland: "The laws of the country! My lord, I'll make a brigade give laws, by G—d." †

Among the papers of Duncan Forbes were found some thoughts upon the extent and degree of punishment that ought to be awarded to those concerned in the rebellion. He was for severity toward the leaders. He thought that severity toward the crowd of common people would do more harm than good, by raising pity, "the rather, that it is most certainly true that great numbers were compelled to join the active rebels, by threats which were justly terrible to them."* It would have been well if these sound views could have been more regarded by the members of the government, which had a task before them, where no passion or party zeal could furnish even the shadow of an excuse for excess of punishment. The opinion of dispassionate writers upon the legal severities that followed the rebellion of 1745, which were more extensive than those of 1715, was that they were really less necessary for any purpose of warning than at the former period. In England, Jacobitism, as the march to Derby had proved, was rather a form of discontent shown to the Whig ministries than any active partisanship for the exiled family. England, therefore, could only feel disgusted at wholesale hangings on Kennington Common, and at seeing crowds of plebeian heads on Temple Bar. In Scotland the commercial towns had been adverse to Charles Edward, and, as Forbes pointed out, the numbers of those of the clans who had not actually rebelled, although their chiefs were Jacobites, were greater than those who were in arms.† An act had been passed, suspending that portion of the law of high treason which required that bills should be found in the counties where the offence was alleged to have been committed. The object was to try Scottish prisoners in England. The first persons brought to trial were eighteen officers of the Manchester regiment who were left to their fate at Carlisle by the prince for whom they had risked their lives and estates. Mr. Townley, the colonel, and seventeen of his companions, were tried, and nine were executed on the 30th of July. James Dawson, the son of a Lancashire gentleman, the hero of the ballad of Shenstone, was among the number. The catastrophe which followed the determination of the lady to whom he was betrothed, to witness his execution, is not a poetical fiction:

"The dismal scene was o'er and pass'd,
The lover's mournful hearse retir'd;
The maid drew back her languid head,
And, sighing forth his name, expir'd."

Three of the Scottish officers who were left at Carlisle were condemned and executed at Kennington Common in August; and five others, taken at various places, suffered in November. A special commission was opened at Carlisle in August. There were three hundred and eighty-two prisoners in the castle; but they were allowed to draw lots, that one in twenty might be selected for trial. Thirty-three were executed. At York twenty-two were also subjected to the brutal penalties of high treason. We shall dismiss this painful subject with a brief relation of the fate of the rebel lords who were taken prisoners.

While the populace of London were gazing upon the heads of Mr. Townley and other Manchester rebels upon Temple Bar, "where people make a trade of letting spy-glasses at a halfpenny a look,"‡ three rebel lords were in the Tower awaiting their fate. The trials of Lord Kilmarnock, Lord Cromartie, and Lord Balmerino, began on the 28th of July. "London," wrote Walpole to Montagu, "will be as full as at a coronation." There was to be a show which, happily, England had not seen for more than thirty years. The anecdotes connected with this melancholy exhibition have a more enduring interest than the formal proceedings of the trials themselves. These proceedings took the usual course when the evidence is too strong to involve any doubt of the legal guilt of the accused. Their personal demeanor is, in such cases, the chief object of attention. Bills of indictment had been found by the grand jury of Surrey against the three noblemen, and they were tried by the Peers in Westminster Hall. Walpole says it was the greatest and most melancholy scene he ever saw, the whole ceremony being conducted with the most awful solemnity and decency. Walpole expected to look on without emotion. He thought of the crimes of the prisoners, and of the dangers that the country had passed. Their first appearance shocked him; their behavior melted him.§ Kilmarnock and Cromartie pleaded guilty. Balmerino stood his trial. Walpole describes him as "the most natural brave old man I ever saw; the highest intrepidity, even to indifference." He played with his fingers upon the axe. A little boy wanted to see what was going on, and he placed him near himself. Murray, the solicitor-general, after the Lords had pronounced Balmerino guilty, went up to him, and asked him how he could give the Lords so much trouble when he had been told that his plea was useless. Balmerino met the impertinence with a cool retort: "Oh, Mr. Murray, I am extremely glad to see you; I have been with several of your relations; the good lady, your mother, was of great use to us at Perth."* Kilmarnock, upon being brought up for sentence, expressed deep contrition for having joined the rebellion at a rash moment. Cromartie manifested a similar feeling of remorse. Balmerino simply desired the Lords to intercede for mercy. Gray, who was present at the trials, describes the conduct of these noblemen in a letter to Wharton: "Kilmarnock spoke in mitigation of his crime near half an hour, with a decent courage, and in a strong but pathetic voice. His figure would prejudice people in his favor, being tall and genteel; he is upward of forty, but to the eye not above thirty-five years of age. What he said appears to less advantage when read. Cromartie (who is about the same age, a man of lower stature, but much like a gentleman) was sinking into the earth with grief and dejection; with eyes cast down, and a voice so low that no one heard a syllable that did not sit close to the bar; he made a short speech to raise compassion. It is now, I see, printed, and is reckoned extremely fine. I believe you will think it touching and well-expressed; if there be any meanness in it, it is lost in that sorrow he gives us for so numerous and helpless a family. . . . As to Balmerino, he never had any hopes from the beginning. He is an old soldier-like man, of a vulgar manner and aspect, speaks the broadest Scotch, and shows an intrepidity that some ascribe to real courage, and some to brandy. . . . The Duke of Argyle, telling him how sorry and how astonished he was to see him engaged in such a cause, 'My lord (says he), for the two kings, and their rights, I cared not a farthing which prevailed; but I was starving; and if Mahomet had set up his standard in the Highlands, I had been a good Mussulman for bread, and stuck close to the party, for I must eat.'" This latter speech sounds like an invention of the day. Cromartie was pardoned. Kilmarnock and Balmerino were executed on Tower Hill, on the 18th of August. When the deputy-lieutenant, as they passed out of the Tower, cried out, according to the usual form, "God bless King George," Kilmarnock bowed; Balmerino exclaimed, "God bless King James." When the two parted, Balmerino embraced his companion in misfortune, saying, "My lord, I wish I could suffer for both." Walpole then relates a circumstance of some historical import. Balmerino, after their parting, desired again to see Kilmarnock, and then thus addressed him: "'My Lord Kilmarnock, do you know anything of the resolution taken in our army, the day before the battle of Culloden, to put the English prisoners to death?' He replied, 'My lord, I was not present; but since I came hither, I have had all the reason in the world to believe that there was such order taken; and I hear the duke has the pocket-book with the order.' Balmerino answered, 'It was a lie raised to excuse their barbarity to us!' Take notice, that the duke's charging this on Lord Kilmarnock (certainly on misinformation) decided this unhappy man's fate."† Kilmarnock suffered with resolution. Balmerino's behavior is noticed by Shenstone, as either "to have wanted coolness, or else to equal that of Adrian, Cato, Sir Thomas More, or any of those heroes who had spirit enough to make an ostentation of their unconcern." He wore the regimentals which he had worn in the rebellion—a blue coat turned up with red—(the dress which, curiously enough, was afterward known as the Windsor uniform of the time of George III.); and when on the scaffold he took off his periwig and put on a night-cap of Scotch plaid. "He died, says Walpole, "with the intrepidity of a hero, but with the insensibility of one too."

The last of the titled sufferers was Lord Lovat. In December, 1746, he was impeached by the House of Commons. His trial commenced before the Peers on the 9th of March. The chief evidence against him was John Murray, of Broughton; who had been secretary to Charles Edward, and, with Sir Thomas Sheridan, was held to be the adviser of many rash measures which the young prince obstinately pressed. It was a pitiful exhibition to behold this man giving evidence against the old chief, whose cunning could not save him from these treacherous disclosures of his long career of double dealing. Lovat's conduct upon his trial was as little dignified as his ordinary mode of life. He died decorously, quoting the line of Horace, which was a bitter satire upon his course of selfish tyranny and unprincipled ambition: "It is pleasant and honorable to die for one's country." There were forty-three persons attainted by parliament. Some of them were of noble families, but a large proportion were of inferior rank, including a few engaged in commercial and professional employments.

There was one fugitive from the field of Culloden whose adventures have the same sort of interest as those of Charles II. after the battle of Worcester. For the purpose of a general history of our country it is unnecessary here minutely to detail them. Charles Edward quitted the large body of horsemen who had accompanied him from the fatal moor, having resolved to make his way, with a few of his personal friends, to the west coast, in order to embark for France. He rested at Gortuleg, a house belonging to one of the Frasers, where, for the first time, he met Lord Lovat. According to one account, the old chief reproached the prince, when he avowed his intention to quit Scotland without hazarding another battle. Riding past the ruins of Fort Augustus, he halted at Invergarry, an almost deserted house of MacDonell of Glengarry. Here he was left to pursue his course, with two of his companions, and a poor Highlander, Ned Burke, who had been his guide from the battle-field. On the 24th of April he was sailing in a small boat from Loch Na Nuagh, where, nine months before, he had landed with few companions, but with the support of the most sanguine hopes. These solitary lakes and islands were now unsafe. Parties of soldiers penetrated into the most remote places, hunting down rebels, burning cabins, and chasing women and children from their desolate homes. Soon after the wanderings of Charles Edward had begun, the Duke of Cumberland fixed his head-quarters at Fort Augustus, in the very heart of the district where the young prince was hiding, for whose apprehension a reward of thirty thousand pounds had been offered. For five months did this ill-fated adventurer lead a life of constant privation and alarm; generally evading observation; sometimes known; but never betrayed. When he had gained a place of shelter in the house of the elder Clanranald, in the island of South Uist, he was soon disturbed by parties of militia who landed, and by vessels of war cruising about the coast. Obliged to quit his hospitable abode, he wandered alone among the hills, till he was enabled to escape to Skye. This he effected through the compassionate courage and sagacity of Flora MacDonald, a name ever to be numbered in the illustrious roll of heroic women. Charles was dressed as a female when, with Flora and a faithful Highlander, he went to sea in an open boat. They landed at last in the country of Sir Alexander MacDonald, who was opposed to the Jacobite cause. Flora boldly appealed to the sympathy of the wife of the chief, Lady Margaret MacDonald, and through her aid Charles was enabled to escape from the danger which he might have encountered in this hostile district. The kind Lady MacDonald employed her kinsman, Kingsburgh, to be his guide, in company with Flora. He thus safely got out of Skye; and, taking leave of his companions, he reached the Isle of Rasay, alone, disguised as a man-servant. Day after day the prince sustained new hardships. He returned to Skye, and early in July was conveyed in a boat to the mainland. He wandered long among the glens between Loch Shiel and Loch Hourn. He had to elude the sentinels who watched the head of the two lochs. He dwelled among freebooters in a cave, and lived on the plunder which they brought in. In August he returned to the Glengarry country, which was then cleared of troops. Finally, on the 20th of September, he, for the third time, sailed from Loch Na Nuagh; but he now sailed in a French vessel, accompanied by Lochiel and three other of his fugitive adherents.

The interval between the suppression of the Scottish rebellion in 1746, and the conclusion of the peace of Aix-la-Chapelle in 1748, is perhaps as little interesting in its details as any period of our history. Nor are there many exciting events to give spirit to a narrative of the remaining six years of that administration which was broken up by the death of Mr. Pelham in 1754. Opinion became torpid, after the excitement of the rebellion had passed away. Jacobitism slunk to its hiding-places. Patriotism looked out for pensions and sinecures. Party contests had nearly subsided into personal struggles for place and power, which those who are curious as to such mysterious affairs may drowsily meditate upon in the sober narrative of Coxe,* or laugh over in the sarcastic anecdotes of Walpole. During the agony of the rebellion, immediately after the defeat at Falkirk—at a time when it might be supposed that English statesmen would have cast away their petty ambitions—there came what is termed a ministerial crisis. Lord Granville (Carteret), although out of office, had the confidence of the king; while the Duke of Newcastle, and his brother, Mr. Pelham, his majesty's chief ministers, were not favorites with him. They resolved to try their strength. They demanded office for Mr. Pitt, rather from their fear of him than from their love. The king refused to give a place to one who had so bitterly thwarted his Hanoverian partialities. The Pelhams and the whole body of their Whig followers resigned. Granville became minister—for forty eight hours; for he could command no parliamentary support. The Pelhams returned triumphantly to power, upon their own terms, giving Pitt an office, but one which would not necessarily bring him into personal intercourse with the king. "Lord Granville left St. James's laughing," says Walpole.† After this victory the Pelhams had little to fear even from the dislike or the coldness of their sovereign. The cabinet had little to dread but jealousies and dissensions among its members. It continued its temporizing course through eight years of a monopoly of the real authority of the state. Opposition was hushed. The great parliamentary orators, Pitt, Fox, Murray, were propitiated into silence by office, and bided their time for power. The bitter opponents of Walpole and Carteret were no longer "the boys." Pitt professed to have cast away some of the extreme opinions of his nonage. "Never," says a reviewer of the Pelham administration, "was the tempestuous sea of parliament lulled into a profounder calm."‡ This is meant as commendation. Something of the calm was produced by the almost complete absence of publicity from parliamentary proceedings. Cave, the proprietor of "The Gentleman's Magazine," and Astley, the printer of "The London Magazine," were so terrified at the bar of the House of Lords in 1747, where they stood in custody of the usher of the Black Rod for publishing the proceedings on Lord Lovat's trial, that no glimpse of what Lords or Commons were doing met the public eye for several years; and then so briefly and obscurely that Pitt might, for any gratification of general curiosity, have as well harangued upon the sea-shore like his great model. But the parliamentary calm was chiefly produced by influences far more cunningly devised than the despotic privileges which controlled the public journals. Mr. Pelham and his brother divided the labors of administration pretty equally. The one quietly conducted parliamentary and treasury business; the other managed the more complex affairs of his private levee. Pelham was a skilful financier in the open management of the public money. Newcastle was the most adroit and experienced trafficker for seats in the House of Commons. He bought boroughs with a profuse employment of his own wealth, that made his family power almost irresistible. He bought members with the secret-service money, exercising a tact that put Walpole's coarser operations to shame. He cajoled; he promised; and, if wheedling and lying were in vain, he freely paid. This was Newcastle's peculiar talent. He hugged the dirty work to his bosom as if it were the great glory of his life. He would share with no man the distinction of bribing for votes. It can scarcely be matter of surprise that under such a system the nation resigned itself to the comatose symptoms which the opiates of the state-physicians were gradually producing. The scheme of corruption which Walpole instituted to keep things quiet, while the contests for the restoration of the Stuarts were truly formidable, was perfected under the Pelhams, when the danger had passed away. The agency which had been resorted to for the support of the crown was perpetuated for the aggrandizement of an oligarchy. The parliamentary domination of the great Whig families, divided as a party but united as a caste, had almost ceased to be regarded as unconstitutional.

The appointment under the Pelhams of William Pitt to an office, however secondary, is an event of historical importance. The king refused to nominate him secretary at war—a post in which his energy might have produced some more decided successes than were obtained previous to the peace of 1748 by the supine Pelhams. Pitt was first appointed vice-treasurer of Ireland, and within a few months was promoted to be paymaster-general. The character of Pitt, who, without wealth or high birth, had made himself the marked man of his time, was now developed in a way that must have been somewhat incomprehensible to the greedy aspirants for the emoluments of place. He received his salary; he disdained to pocket more than his salary. The paymaster-general used to retain a hundred thousand pounds as a balance in his own hands, which he invested in government securities, for his private benefit; the public thus paying interest upon their own money to their own salaried servant. Pitt sent every balance, as it accrued, to the Bank of England, to be available for its proper purposes. The indirect modes in which ministers of state grew rich, through other means than the legal receipts of their highly-paid offices, received another illustration from the self-denial of this extraordinary paymaster. When a subsidy was advanced to a foreign power, it had been customary for the itching palm of office to demand half per cent as its honorarium. Pitt astonished the King of Sardinia by sending him the sum without deduction which parliament had voted; and he raised his majesty's astonishment still higher when he refused a present as a compliment to his integrity. Pitt was a poor man; but he had higher aspirations than the "auri sacra fames" of a venal age. His pride, which betrayed him into many errors, saved him from the degradation of the meanest of passions. Amid their general contempt for the government, the people came to know that there was one man who professed some regard for public virtue.

When the British troops, and foreign troops in the pay of Great Britain, had been withdrawn from the Low Countries to put down rebellion and defend our own shores, the successes of the French were rapid and decisive. All the Austrian Netherlands submitted to their arms. On the other hand, the French were driven out of Italy by the Austrians and Sardinians. The year 1746 offered no prospect of a speedy termination of the war. In 1747 the maritime power of the country was signally asserted. Admiral Anson, on the 3d of May, captured, sunk, or destroyed the French fleet off Cape Finisterre. The fleet thus annihilated had for its principal object to attempt the recovery of Cape Breton, which had been taken from the French in 1745. Commodore Fox, on the 16th of June, took forty French ships, richly laden from the West Indies. Admiral Hawke, on the 14th of October, defeated a French fleet off Belleisle. England had acquired full confidence in the might of her naval arm. Her Channel fleet had rendered invasion almst impossible during the troubles of 1745. She had bold and skilful admirals. She had hardy seamen, confident in their national superiority if they were well commanded. The land operations of 1747 were of a different character.

The political importance of Holland had for some years been frittered away by an imbecile government. The republic was losing its ancient place among the European nations. Its thriving cities appeared likely, in the apparent decay of the old warlike spirit, to become the prey of the same enemy that had been driven back by the energy of William of Orange. Upon the death of that prince the office of hereditary stadtholder had been merged in that of grand pensionary. Louis XV. in 1747 sent an army of twenty thousand men to invade Brabant. The hearts of the Dutch people were roused as in 1672; and they sought the same means of deliverance as at that period. Prince William of Nassau was proclaimed stadtholder; and to him were intrusted the means of national defence. This young man had succeeded, as captain-general and lord high admiral, to the powers held by William III.; but the popular acclamation could not evoke in him those qualities which made his great predecessor the savior of his country. He was the son-in-law of George II. The favorite son of George, and the husband of his daughter, were to command the allied forces of British and Dutch. "Our two young heroes agree but little," wrote Mr. Pelham. "Our own is open, frank, resolute, and perhaps hasty; the other assuming, pedantic, ratiocinating, and tenacious." On the 2d of July, at Lauffeld, near Maestricht, the "two young heroes," with an Austrian army commanded by Marshal Bathiany, were to encounter the French headed by Marshal Saxe. The Duke of Cumberland with his British fought with desperation. "His royal highness's valor has shone extremely," says Walpole, "at the expense of his judgment. . . . His prowess is so well established that it grows time for him to exert other qualities of a general."* The Prince of Nassau, with his Dutch, got out of the fight as soon as possible. The Austrian marshal never moved from his intrenched position. There was a terrible slaughter of the British and the French. Sir John Ligonier, who had commanded the English cavalry, was taken prisoner. Louis XV., who was present at the battle, hinted to this general, who first came to England as a French Protestant refugee, that it would be better to think of peace than to witness the destruction of so many brave men. Marshal Saxe talked confidentially with the prisoner upon the same subject. The war still went on unfavorably for the allies, Bergen-op-Zoom having surrendered to the French in September. Louis expressed sentiments of moderation; and finally Ligonier was sent by the French king to the Duke of Cumberland, to intimate his desire that they should meet, and agree upon terms of peace. The English ministry did not believe that the duke was exactly fitted for a negotiator; and, much to his father's annoyance, sent the Earl of Sandwich to watch over him. But it was many months before peace was accomplished. The "two young heroes" wanted more fighting. George II. wanted to obtain some paltry advantage for his beloved Hanover which might be won by another campaign. A congress was opened at Aix-la-Chapelle in March, 1748; even while the war of British, Dutch, and Austrians against the French was going on in Flanders. In April it became pretty clear that Cumberland, always ready to fight, was no match for De Saxe, who fought only when he saw his advantage in fighting. The French marshal had so conducted his operations that for Cumberland to hazard another battle before Maestricht would have been a rashness too great for an English ministry to sanction. The pacific members of the cabinet outvoted the warlike; and Mr. Pelham wrote to Lord Sandwich, that as it was impossible to check the progress of the French army, or to reconcile the discordant pretensions of the allies, the king resolved to accept the conditions of peace proposed by France, without having the concurrence of the other powers. The preliminaries were signed by the plenipotentiaries of England, Holland, and France, at the end of April.

The king, in his speech on opening the session of the new parliament in November, 1747, had announced that overtures of pacification had been made by France. He looked back to the origin of the war: "By the advice of my parliament I entered into the war against Spain to vindicate and secure the trade and commerce of my subjects." The bells were ringing in October, 1739, upon the declaration of hostilities against Spain. They were ringing in April, 1748, upon the conclusion of the treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle, by which not a single point was gained for which England had been fighting with Spain and France for eight years. The peace was such as a nation makes when it is weary of blood-shedding; when its government can no longer trust to the repetition of the parrot words, "just and necessary war." All conquests, in all parts of the world, that had been made by any of the powers engaged in the war, were to be restored. The English grumbled about the restitution of Cape Breton. They grumbled more, that the right of search claimed by Spain off her American coasts should have been left precisely in its former position—a constant source of violence and animosity. One point was gained, which George and his ministers not unnaturally held of importance. The pretender and his descendants were to be renounced. Charles Edward was to be expelled from France. The French government intimated its intention to behave compassionately to the young prince who had dared and endured so much for his family. They proposed to establish him at Fribourg, with an adequate pension, and the honors that attached to the empty title of Prince of Wales. The young man, with characteristic obstinacy, refused to quit Paris. He was entreated; he was threatened; but he defied what he termed the orders of the house of Hanover. He was at last arrested as he was going to the opera, imprisoned for a few days at Vincennes, and then turned loose on the frontier of Savoy. He wandered about Europe for many years, bearing a fictitious name. He contracted debasing habits of intoxication. He outraged his few remaining supporters, by refusing to give up a mistress whom they regarded as a spy. There is a relation by Dr. King of a venturous visit which Charles Edward made to England in 1750. The Jacobite principal of St. Mary Hall, Oxford, saw the prince several times during the five days which he remained in London. "The impatience of his friends who were in exile had formed a scheme which was impracticable; but although it had been as feasible as they represented to him, yet no preparations had been made, nor was anything ready to carry it into execution. He was soon convinced that he had been deceived." To have remained long in England would have been rash beyond the usual rashness of the prince. The servant of Dr. King remarked the resemblance of the gentleman who had come to drink tea with his master, to "the busts which are sold in Red Lion Street, and are said to be the busts of Prince Charles."* The brother of the unhappy prince had been named a cardinal in 1747; and this was considered by Charles and his friends as a fatal barrier to the restoration of the house of Stuart to the throne of Protestant Great Britain—an event more fatal than the defeat of Culloden. †

The measures of the English government in relation to Scotland were of much greater importance to the security of the house of Brunswick than the humiliation of Charles Edward or the dedication to the papacy of Cardinal York. The pacification of the Highlands was gradually being accomplished by a series of enactments, one of which was of unquestionable public benefit. The disarming act of 1748, and that for the abolition of the Highland dress, might be regarded as unnecessary severities, and as sources of national irritation. But the great measure for the abolition of heritable jurisdictions was open to no objection beyond the complaints of a few interested nobles. It was carefully considered by the law authorities of England, and was carried through under the advice of the Scottish Court of Session. The sum of a hundred and fifty thousand pounds was wisely expended in buying up the emoluments which great and petty chiefs of clans derived from the exercise of their arbitrary and dangerous powers. The sheriff courts were taken as the foundation of local tribunals, where justice should be administered by responsible judges. The exclusive privileges which were thus abolished destroyed that power which, whether it be regarded as feudal or patriarchal, was a real tyranny, as dangerous to the state as oppressive to the people. There was one indication of an attempt to revive the disaffection of the Highland chiefs. In 1753 the execution of Dr. Archibald Cameron, upon a previous attainder, renewed some of the odium which attached to the severities of 1746. He had not come to Scotland solely upon his private affairs, as alleged, but "to inquire about a considerable sum of money which had been remitted from France to the friends of the exiled family," and he had a commission to hold intercourse with M'Pherson of Cluny, who kept up the correspondence between Charles Edward and his friends. Sir Walter Scott, who relates these circumstances, holds that the execution of Dr. Cameron might have been justified upon reasons of a public nature, had the king's ministers thought it prudent to develop the channel of information which they possessed as to the plots of Charles Edward.‡

The termination of the war was publicly celebrated as if it had been the glorious result of sagacious counsels and military bravery. On the 27th of April, 1749, there was an unequalled display of fireworks in the Green Park. Handel composed a grand overture of warlike instruments. An Italian artist designed a temple, a hundred and fourteen feet high, with statues and pictures—heathen gods and cardinal virtues; Neptune drawn by sea-horses; Mars drawn by three lions. The king was recorded in Latin inscriptions as having given peace to Europe, secured the faith of treaties, restored and enlarged commerce. Britannia joined hands with France and Spain, in renewed concord and for mutual benefit. The people were pleased, and cared little for caricatures in which the fireworks were called "The grand whim for posterity to laugh at." But the shouts of the multitude were not echoed in parliament. Mr. Pelham, who carried political candor somewhat beyond the point of prudence, spoke of the necessity for this peace in a tone which indicated very much of that prostration of national spirit of which there were too many evidences at this particular period. In a speech on the 5th of February, 1750, in reply to a motion of Lord Egmont on the article of the treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle respecting Dunkirk, Mr. Pelham, as head of the administration, said that the wonder was that England could have obtained such good terms as she did; that another campaign would have made the French masters of the Dutch provinces; that if the Dutch had joined France in alliance against this country, we should not long have preserved our superiority at sea, "the loss of which would soon have put an end to our sitting here, to debate about the demolition of Dunkirk, or any other point relating to the honor or interest of Great Britain." * This timid minister even went farther in the course of this speech: "I think myself in duty bound to declare, that in our present loaded condition, when the people are so burdened with taxes, and most of those taxes mortgaged for the payment of debts, it is my opinion that we are not able to stand single and alone in a war against the whole house of Bourbon; and the circumstances of Europe are such at present that it would be impossible for us to form a confederacy upon the continent that would not be a burden rather than an advantage to us." Pelham wrote in the same desponding temper to the Duke of Newcastle: "Dear brother, we are conquered; we have little strength of our own, and less of other people's." With such a humiliated spirit in the prime minister of a country, it is easy to understand how, during the years which remained of the Pelham administration, the nation was held to be sunk and degraded. A mighty change was produced by the genius of one man—he who, having been thrust upon the king as a subordinate member of the government in 1746, came gradually to be looked up to as the most influential man in the state, especially after the death of Henry Pelham in 1754. The extraordinary abilities of William Pitt at length rose above the control of incapable colleagues. In five years he raised a dispirited nation to an unprecedented height of honor and power. The history of this great man's administration is a history of which England may well be proud, even after a century has elapsed of events too wonderful, and of changes too vast, to have presented themselves to the imagination of the most sanguine believer in his country's future greatness, who lived in the last years of George the Second. But before we reach the history of that period, we have first to trace the less stimulating occurrences of six or seven years of peace. In those years Great Britain was husbanding the means of triumph. Her people were carrying forward their industry with a success which gave them the sinews of war. Some important social reforms were made; others were attempted, and were deferred through antiquated prejudices. A careful examination will show that, amid much that was rotten and corrupt, the nation was unusually prosperous; and that the common predictions of its decline were the fallacies of superficial observers.

The parliament which commenced its sittings in November, 1747, was continued through its full septennial period until April, 1754. This tenth parliament of Great Britain holds an honorable place in history for two measures of permanent utility—the Reform of the Calendar, and the Marriage Act. Other portions of its legislation are interesting as bearing upon some questions which are still not wholly settled, or as illustrating the state of public morality. During the remaining years of the Pelham administration we may follow the course of parliamentary proceedings as the best outline of the progress of the nation.

Mr. Pelham, though a timid war minister, was sufficiently bold as a financier. At the opening of the session the king recommended to the Commons "to be watchful to improve any opportunity of putting the national debt in a method of being reduced, with a strict regard to public faith and private property." In a fortnight the proposal of the minister was entertained, to reduce the 4 per cent annuities to a lower rate of interest. The whole unredeemed capital of the funded debt amounted, in round numbers, to seventy-one millions, of which forty-three millions were due to the Bank of England, the South Sea Company, and the East India Company, at varying rates of interest—namely: 4 per cent, 3½ per cent, 3 per cent. Of the other public debt, nearly nineteen millions were in 4 per cent annuities, and eight millions in 3 per cent consolidated annuities. Mr. Pelham proposed that all persons or bodies corporate entitled to any part of the redeemable national debt, which carried interest at 4 per cent, who should consent to receive interest at 3 per cent, commencing on the 25th of December, 1757, should receive 3½ per cent in the intermediate years. The scheme, according to Tindal, was regarded as a very bold and even dangerous measure by many friends of the minister. Smollett says that foreign nations looked on with wonder, to see such a proposition carried without disturbance, and asked where money could be found to pay off the dissentient fund-holders. But there were very few who chose to be paid off. The confidence in the government, and the convenience to many persons of these public investments with their certain dividends, enabled the minister to accomplish his plan without the disquiet which some had dreaded. The public benefit of the reduction of interest was sensibly felt when, after the death of Mr. Pelham, the nation became engaged in the Seven Years War. After languishing for a year or two, this contest was conducted to a successful close, with a lavish expense wholly unprecedented on the part of England. In 1749, when the funded debt was seventy-one millions, the interest was very nearly three millions. In 1759, when the funded debt was eighty-nine millions, the interest was still under three millions.*

In the middle of the eighteenth century such a change had taken place in the relations between employers and workmen that the old system of regimenting labor by prescribing the rate of wages and the hours of work was coming quickly to an end. Four hundred years before that time the labor question, as it is called, was putting strife between masters and servants. The laborers of the reign of Edward III., in consequence of a pestilence which had reduced the amount of labor seeking employment, demanded a rise in wages—as they justly might, according to the natural law which regulates wages. They founded their demand upon sound principles, although these were not reduced into a science. But it was held that the laborers of the time of Edward III. demanded what the employers considered excessive wages; and the legislature stepped in to compel a rate of hire, and to confine laborers to one locality. This was the stronger tyranny; and the precedent was ever at hand in future contests.† Statutes for the regulation of wages and the hours of labor went on multiplying, even against the growing conviction that they were inefficient. There was a constant and gradual tendency in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries for the prices of commodities to advance; and this inevitable result of the discovery of the precious metals in America baffled every attempt to fix a stationary scale of wages. A statute of 1548 endeavors to grapple with what it held to be two flagrant evils. Sellers of victuals were to be punished for conspiring and covenanting to sell their commodities at unreasonable prices. This was to be a boon to those who labored for subsistence. But, on the other hand, combinations of workmen were prohibited by this statute, under severe penalties. It would appear from this enactment that workmen, under a system of promises and mutual oaths, then engaged in a confederacy against the liberty of other workmen; and to this extent the legislators were right, even in enacting their harsh penalties of imprisonment and pillory. We here see the commencement of statutory regulations against combinations of workmen; which, however, were always punishable at common law as well as combinations of masters. We go on to the eighteenth century, and we then find special laws against combinations in particular trades. A statute of the 7th George I. is "for regulating journeymen tailors," especially those of London and Westminster,

"who have lately departed from their services without just cause, and have entered into combinations to advance their wages to unreasonable prices, and lessen their usual hours of work." A statute of the 12th George I. extends the penalties against combinations to "workmen employed in the woollen manufacture." The next step is the Act of 1749, which especially extends the provisions of the two previous statutes to those employed in hat-making, and to the workers in all textile substances, and in leather; and, moreover, provides the usual supposed remedies of legal punishments against all combinations of workmen whatever. It required the experience of three quarters of a century to show that such legislation was essentially a mistake. The statutes against combinations had been so multiplied that when these laws were repealed in 1824 they amounted to thirty-five different enactments. It was inconsistent with the principle of justice to all classes that they should continue on the statute-book in their original arbitrary and unequal provisions. Adam Smith, in 1776, proclaimed this inequality: "We have no acts of parliament against combining to lower the price of work, but many against combining to raise it."* The injustice has been remedied, and workmen are free to combine not to work under certain wages, and to regulate the hours of work; always provided that they do not by violence, threats, or otherwise, interfere with the freedom of action in other workmen. We shall have to note hereafter the repeal of the combination laws and the effects of that repeal. This change and its consequences form an important consideration in the history of our social state, and in any estimate of its possible future. The change could not be avoided. But the rude contest of four centuries ago still subsists under different forms scarcely less rude. Legislation is not competent to deal with the evil. Its remedy can only be found in a better appreciation by employers and workmen of their mutual rights and duties. The preparation for a happier system than that which results in the ruin and misery of strikes is to be sought in the real and solid instruction of all classes in the great natural laws by which the relations of capital and labor must inevitably be adjusted, whatever be the disturbing forces which interfere with an adjustment. The gross ignorance of these laws exhibited by the legislators of trades-unions, in the middle of the nineteenth century, is even more deplorable than that of the lawgivers of the nation in the fifteenth century. Untaught workmen of the time of Edward III. had the laws of political economy with them when they demanded an increase of wages in consequence of the decrease in the number of laborers. Half-educated artisans of the days of Queen Victoria demand an increase of wages because the number of laborers has increased. On the other hand, we are not to conclude that the ignorance, grosser than that of the dark ages, which says, "If political economy is against us, we are against political economy," and the tyranny against fellow-workmen by which that ignorance is upheld —that these are to be met by the capitalist, in a partial triumph over combinations, requiring conditions which appear to interfere with the free action of the individual laborer. Let us have no class despotism, on one side or the other; no arbitrary regulations, if not quite as odious, certainly as ineffectual, as the partial and unjust distinction of the days of the first and second Georges between the rights of capital and the rights of labor.

The question, so often raised, and on which different opinions are still continued to be held—the question of parliamentary privilege—agitated the nation in 1750 and in 1751. On the 22d of November, 1749, an election was held for Westminster, in which the ministerial candidate, Lord Trentham, was opposed by Sir George Vandeput, supported by a strong body of persons calling themselves the Independent Electors. A scrutiny was demanded, upon Lord Trentham being returned. On the 22d of February, 1750, no return having been made to the writ, the high bailiff was called to the bar of the House of Commons; but he was dismissed, upon his assurance being given that he would use his endeavors to expedite the election. Parliament was prorogued before the return was made, which return was in favor of Lord Trentham. Soon after the opening of the session in 1751, a petition was presented from the inhabitants of Westminster, complaining of an undue return, arising out of the partiality of the high bailiff. This officer accused three gentlemen, Mr. Crowle, the Hon. Alexander Murray, and Mr. Gibson, of having illegally interfered to obstruct the proceedings on the scrutiny, and to influence him in the return. Crowle was reprimanded and discharged. Gibson was sent to Newgate. When Murray was brought to the bar, to receive his sentence of a close committal to Newgate, he refused to kneel, as commanded by the speaker. Horace Walpole has related the scene which took place: "He entered with an air of confidence, composed of something between a martyr and a coxcomb. The speaker called out, 'Your obeisances! Sir, your obeisances!' and then, 'Sir, you must kneel.' He replied, 'Sir, I beg to be excused; I never kneel but to God.' The speaker repeated the command with great warmth. Murray answered, 'Sir, I am sorry I cannot comply with your request; I would in anything else.' The speaker cried, 'Sir, I call upon you again to consider of it.' Murray answered, 'Sir, when I have committed a crime, I kneel to God for pardon; but I know my own innocence, and cannot kneel to anybody else.' The speaker ordered the sergeant to take him away and secure him."* In April Murray was brought by Habeas Corpus into the King's Bench, where his case was argued. But the validity of his commitment being affirmed by three judges, he was remanded to Newgate. Upon the prorogation of parliament he was conducted in triumph to his own house, attended by the sheriffs of London. In the next session of parliament a motion was made that Murray should be apprehended, and again committed to Newgate for contempt of privilege. It was fortunate for the honor of parliament that, upon the motion being carried, Murray absconded. A reward of five hundred pounds was offered for his apprehension, but without effect. A prosecution against the publisher of a pamphlet on this subject was ordered by the house. A London jury acquitted the defendant. The public sympathy with Murray was a manifestation of the growing temper with which the proceedings of their representatives had come to be regarded by the people—a temper which in a few years was to convulse the nation almost to the verge of anarchy.

The Reform of the Calendar, in 1751, is a measure of which no one can be more sensible of the advantage than he who has to write the annals of his country. The change which Pope Gregory XIII. had introduced in 1582 had gradually been adopted by all European states except England, Russia, and Sweden. Thus, in reading a French historian, we not only find an event bearing date ten or eleven days in advance of the date of an English narrative, but the year is made to begin from the 1st of January in the foreign annalist instead of the 25th of March, as in the English. To prevent mistakes arising out of this confusion requires perpetual vigilance in the historical writer. To attempt to reconcile these discrepancies in all cases would be needless; and most annalists are generally content to take the dates as they find them. The energy of Lord Chesterfield—a man of great and various ability, who had filled high offices, but in 1751 had retired from ministerial business—carried this reform through, with the learned aid of Lord Macclesfield, who was afterward president of the Royal Society. The commencement of the year on the 1st of January was not calculated to disturb any popular prejudice; for the 25th of February, 1751, on which day the bill was introduced into the House of Lords, was ordinarily written, 25th February, 1750-51. But the necessity for another change was thus indicated by Lord Macclesfield: "The same day which, in each month, is with us the first, is called the twelfth day of the month throughout almost all the other parts of Europe; and in like manner through all the other days of the month, we are just eleven days behind them." To make the legal year correspond in all future time with the solar year was the result of scientific calculations, the rationale of which is now generally understood. It was necessary also to make a change in the calendar as to the time of finding Easter. There were many minor regulations essential to be provided for in consequence of the great change. The payments of rents, annuities, and salaries for public service were not to be accelerated; and thus the 5th of July, the 10th of October, the 5th of January, and the 5th of April, long held their place as rent days; and the dividends upon stock are still paid at those periods. It may be supposed that such a reform, however valuable, would not be made without some popular discontent. The timid Newcastle told Chesterfield that he hated new-fangled things—that he had better not meddle with matters so long established. The witty earl was wiser. He made a speech of which he has given a most ingenuous account in a letter to his son: "I consulted the ablest lawyers and the most skilful astronomers, and we cooked up a bill for that purpose. But then my difficulty began. I was to bring in this bill, which was necessarily composed of law-jargon and astronomical calculations, to both which I am an utter stranger. However, it was absolutely necessary to make the House of Lords think that I knew something of the matter; and also make them believe that they knew something of it themselves, which they do not. For my own part, I could just as soon have talked Celtic or Sclavonian to them, as astronomy, and they would have understood me full as well; so I resolved to do better than speak to the purpose, and to please instead of informing them." The Peers were amused by Chesterfield; the thinking part of the nation were convinced by Macclesfield, who published his speech. Hogarth has immortalized the vulgar opposition to the reform of the calendar in his picture of an election feast, in which the popular prejudices are flattered by the Whig candidate in his banner inscribed with "Give us our eleven days."

In 1751 an event occurred which for some time disturbed all the calculations of the scheming politicians of this intriguing age. Frederick, Prince of Wales, died after a short illness on the 20th of March. Leicester House, his town abode, had long been the central point of opposition to the government. We have seen how far the unhappy estrangement of the prince from his parents was carried before the death of Queen Caroline. Years had passed over, and yet the animosities between the reigning king and the heir-apparent were never subdued. In 1751 George II., although a hale man, was in his sixty-eighth year. The worshippers of the rising sun grew bolder in their devotion. Bubb Doddington, the treasurer of the navy, resigned his office in March, 1749, having received a message from the prince that the principal direction of his royal highness's affairs should be put in the skilful intriguer's hands. He saw the prince at Kew, and was told that "what he could not do for me in his present situation must be made up to me in futurity." The prince further said, "that he thought a peerage, with the management of the House of Lords, and the seals of secretary of state for the southern provinces, would be a proper station for me, if I approved of it." * Such was the mode in which England was to be governed by favoritism had she endured the misfortune of a King Frederick I. A worthy junto took counsel with the prince as to "the immediate steps to be taken upon the demise of the king, more particularly in relation to the civil list." † The prince directed the movements of the opposition through the indefatigable borough-monger who had now the chief direction of his affairs; suggesting, among other modes of embarrassing his father's ministers, that the business of Dunkirk "was an opportunity to abuse them." ‡ This system was broken up by the event of the 20th of March. The king felt the premature death of his son rather keenly, and appeared desirous that the remembrance of their differences should pass away. The managers of state ceremonials otherwise interpreted the sovereign's wishes. Frederick was interred without all the usual honors bestowed upon the remains of the first prince of the blood royal. None of his family followed him to the grave; and, except certain lords appointed to hold the pall, the whole tribe of courtiers studiously kept away:

A tear to grace his obsequies."

He had bid high for popularity; but even the patriots of the city soon forgot their idol. The public sympathy was directed toward the princess dowager and her eight children. She conducted herself with great prudence, refusing to enter into any of the cabals of those called her husband's friends, and throwing herself entirely upon the guidance of the king. George, her eldest son, was created Prince of Wales. The princess had an adequate revenue assigned to her; and the education of the heir-apparent, now twelve years of age, was provided for by the appointment of a governor and sub-governor, a preceptor and sub-preceptor. A Bill of Regency excited great public attention, and produced long and agitating debates in both houses. The king wished the unpopular Duke of Cumberland to be sole regent. The princess dowager had the public feeling in favor of her claims. The matter was compromised by the act of parliament, which provided that in the event of the demise of the crown before the Prince of Wales attained the age of eighteen, his mother should be guardian of his person; but, as regent of the kingdom, she should act with the advice of a council, composed of the Duke of Cumberland and nine principal officers of state.

By the death of Frederick, Prince of Wales, the organization of a parliamentary opposition was broken up. But as long as there were places to be filled—as long as there were rivalries in the struggles for office, and jealousies among its possessors—there would be personal contests, which had their interests for their little hour, and may still interest those who believe that in getting hold of the clew to court and ministerial intrigues they are in the road to historical discovery. There was a partial change of ministry in 1751, when the Duke of Newcastle desired to be rid of his brother secretary of state, the Duke of Bedford. These great peers, from the very nature of their offices, were not likely to act with perfect union, unless they were warm friends. The one held the seals of the southern department, the other of the northern department—a division of labor which involved correspondence of the one secretary with one half of Europe, and of the other secretary with the other half. Lord John Russell has described this arrangement somewhat humorously: "It was as if two coachmen were on a box of the mail-coach, one holding the right-hand rein the other the left." * Newcastle wanted a partner on the box who would only pretend to hold the one rein. Bedford was therefore got rid of, and a very tractable successor appointed in his place, who would make no pretence to the management of the rein or the whip. Those who are curious to know how this change was effected may find it agreeably told by Horace Walpole.† We turn to more vulgar matters. We advert to those legislative proceedings which were designed to remedy the grosser immoralities, and to check the atrocious crimes, which were as characteristic of this period as the political corruption and the loose examples of the higher orders of society.

In 1752 an act was passed "for the better preventing thefts and robberies, and for regulating places of public entertainment, and for punishing people keeping disorderly houses." In the same year an act was also passed, directing that in cases of wilful murder immediate execution should take place after the criminal had been sentenced, and that his body should be given to the surgeons to be dissected and anatomized. The Surgeons' Theatre in the Old Bailey was built for the convenience of this process. Hogarth's print of the Progress of Cruelty shows how the practice was popularly regarded. The real cruelty to society consisted in causing dissection to be viewed as an infamy, when it was essentially necessary for that instruction in anatomy which was to make skilful surgeons and competent physicians, that some of the dead should thus benefit the living. These views of a more enlightened age repealed the law which was so short-sighted in its aim. The enactments of 1752 appear to have in some degree been consequent upon the publication in 1750 of Henry Fielding's "Inquiry into the Causes of the late Increase of Robbers." In that treatise the first section is devoted to a view of the consequences "of too frequent and extensive diversions among the lower kind of people." He proposes "to stop the progress of vice by removing the temptation. . . . Now what greater temptation can there be to voluptuousness than a place where every sense and appetite of which it is compounded are fed and delighted; where the eyes are feasted with show, and the ears with music, and where gluttony and drunkenness are allured by every kind of dainty; nay, where the finest women are exposed to view, and where the meanest person who can dress himself clean may in some degree mix with his betters." The places of entertainment, he says, are almost become numberless. There are not only places where the nobleman and his tailor, the lady of quality and her tire-woman, form one common assembly; but others, "where the master of the house, the wells, or gardens, catches only the thoughtless and tasteless rabble." When we see written up on a public house or garden, "Licensed for music under the act of 25th George II.," we see the relics of this somewhat inadequate provision for the morality of the people. Experience has shown how limited in their usefulness are such restraints upon vice; how, if they were strictly enforced, they would be positively injurious. If allowed to interfere with harmless recreations, such as the intellectual pleasure of cheap music in public places, the gross, sensual gratifications, such as drunkenness, would have a stronger hold upon many who now turn aside from that temptation.

Fielding's second section treats of drunkenness. Against gin he directs his strongest reprobation. "The legislature must once more take the matter into their hands." Of the evils of gin, as the parent of crime, he adduces his experience as a magistrate. "Wretches are often brought before me, charged with theft and robbery, whom I am forced to confine before they are in a condition to be examined; and when they have afterward become sober, I have plainly perceived, from the state of the case, that the gin alone was the cause of the transgression." The consumption of gin had increased to a frightful extent under the prohibitory act of 1736, which was impossible to be enforced; and the statute of 1743, which reduced the excessive duty, was in operation when Fielding wrote. In 1751 Mr. Potter, a rising member of parliament, "produced several physicians and masters of workhouses to prove the fatal consequences of spirituous liquors, which laid waste the meaner parts of the town, and were now spreading into the country." * He proposed an increase of the duty. Mr. Pelham believed no remedy could be found for the evil. Additional duties were imposed from time to time; and the consumption of the liquid fire became gradually diminished, not so much, perhaps, by the operation of the duties as by the general improvement of all classes of society. Drunkenness in the time of George II. was the vice of the high as well as of the low. When it became a disgrace for a gentleman to be drunk, it might reasonably be expected that the artisan would see that his own character and his own happiness were compromised by drunkenness. It has been most wisely said, with reference to habits of intoxication, by a magistrate than whom no one has more nobly labored for the repression of crime by prevention rather than by punishment, "From whatever point of view we regard the subject, we shall see that our hopes of improvement have no solid foundation except in the enlightened sentiment of the people." †

"Gaming among the vulgar" is placed by Fielding as one of the causes of robbery. He honestly touches upon the pestilent example of the great, and recommends a more laudable method of employing their time to "the nobility and gentry." He might well do so, when peers went out of town to Richmond, to play at whist on Saturday and Sunday; and Lord Sandwich, a minister of state, when he hunted with the Duke of Cumberland, carried dice in his pocket, to throw a main under a tree when the hounds were at fault. ‡ Fielding held that the magistrate was armed with sufficient power to destroy all gaming "among the inferior people." This was the creed of that age with regard to every vice; and was one of the chief causes that the inferior people so stoutly rebelled against the Gin Act of 1736.

The statutes for the further prevention of thefts and robberies, and for putting a mark of infamy, in addition to the punishment of death, upon the crime of murder, were preceded in 1750 by a royal proclamation, offering a reward of a hundred pounds for the discovery of any offender who had committed a murder, or a robbery with violence, within London and Westminster, or five miles round. Fielding had said, "I make no doubt but that the streets of this town, and the roads leading to it, will shortly be impassable without the utmost hazard; nor are we threatened with seeing less dangerous gangs of rogues among us than those which the Italians call the banditti." But he in the same page declares, "that there are at this time a great gang of rogues, whose number falls little short of a hundred, who are incorporated in one body, have officers and a treasurer, and have reduced theft and robbery into a regular system." This testimony from a police magistrate, who made most unusual exertions for the discovery of offenders, shows how completely the metropolis was without a police; how, when the gallows was the only instrument of repression and the great teacher of honesty, crime flourished to an extent which makes us look back upon the polite days of Lord Chesterfield, and the glorious days of the first Pitt, as a period not far removed, in some respects, from barbarism. The folly of the public was quite equal to the atrocity of the robbers. M'Lean, a highwayman, who mixed with genteel society, was sentenced to be hanged. "The first Sunday after his condemnation three thousand people went to see him; he fainted away twice with the heat of his cell. You can't conceive the ridiculous rage there is of going to Newgate; and the prints that are published of the malefactors, and the memoirs of their lives and deaths set forth with as much parade as—as—Marshal Turenne's—we have no generals worth making a parallel." * What could legislation do in such an age for the better preventing thefts and robberies?

The opposition to the measure known as the Jew Bill, and the ultimate fate of this attempt to render some justice to an industrious and thriving portion of the community, is one of the many proofs of the difficulty which attends a government when it is more enlightened than the people it governs. A bill was introduced in the Commons, in the session of 1753, "which enabled all Jews to prefer bills of naturalization in parliament, without receiving the sacrament, as ordained by statute 7 Jac. I." † It was not a sweeping bill for the naturalization of the whole body of Jews at once. The clamor which arose against this measure was not more illiberal than the arguments by which it was opposed in parliament. "If the Jews should come," said the city member, Sir John Barnard, "to be possessed of a great share of the land of the kingdom, how are we sure that Christianity will continue to be the fashionable religion?" But the worthy merchant delivered a sentiment which would come more home to his fellow-citizens: To put Jews, or any other foreigners, upon an equal footing with natives, would be only to take the bread out of the mouths of our own people, without adding anything to the national commerce. To naturalize Jews, said another member, was to rob Christians of their birthright. To allow Jews, said another, to purchase and hold land estates, was to give the lie to all the prophecies of the New Testament: they are to remain without any fixed habitation until they acknowledge Christ to be the Messiah. The bill was passed in the Commons by a majority of forty-one. In the Lords it was also carried, and received the support of many bishops. The prelates who had thus the courage to advocate this truly Christian measure were libelled by pamphlets and hooted by mobs. The Duke of Newcastle was so terrified by this outburst of popular ignorance that on the opening of the next session of parliament he moved for the repeal of the obnoxious statute. The cowardice of the government resulted from the dread of the effects of an honest perseverance, if the prevailing cry of "No Jews" should be raised against their candidates in the elections for a new parliament that would take place in 1754.

The Marriage Act of 1753 was almost as unpopular as the Act for Jewish Naturalization. The bill introduced by the Chancellor, Lord Hardwicke, required that a marriage should be preceded by the publication of banns in a parish church, and that the marriage should be there celebrated; that a license might be granted for a marriage to take place also in a parish church, but with the consent of parent or guardian if granted to a minor, or minors; that special licenses might, as previously, be granted by the archbishop of a diocese. The proposed measure passed the Peers; but in the Commons it was resisted with a violence which is amusing to look back upon. Mr. Fox, who had clandestinely married the daughter of the Duke of Richmond, was among the most strenuous of its opponents. It was carried, however, by a large majority. Goldsmith, who published his History of England in 1771, sums up, with much gravity, his belief in the injurious consequences to society which this measure had produced: "The poor, by being prevented from making alliances with the rich, have left wealth to flow in its ancient channel, and thus to accumulate, contrary to the interests of the state. It has been found to impede marriage, by clogging it with unnecessary ceremonies. Some have affirmed that lewdness and debauchery have become more frequent since the enactment of this law; and it is believed that the numbers of the people are upon the decline." Goldsmith had no foundation for his assertion that the law had been found to impede marriage. "The number of marriages before the act of 1753 is not known. Since the act came into operation the registers of marriage have been preserved in England, and show an increase from 50,972 in the year 1756, to 63,310 in 1764." * One thriving occupation was seriously damaged by the new Marriage Act; and we do not find that any compensation was voted to the sufferers. Mr. Robert Nugent, one of the parliamentary orators against the act, said, "How fond our people are of private marriages, and of saving a little money, we may be convinced of by the multitude of marriages at Keith's chapel, compared with the number at any parish church." The Reverend Alexander Keith originally officiated in May Fair; but being excommunicated, and committed to the Fleet, he continued to carry on the old trade by the agency of curates. According to Mr. Nugent, "at Keith's chapel there have been six thousand married in a year." Keith published a pamphlet during the progress of the bill, in which he said that the pure design of the measure was to suppress his chapel—a very worthy design, however Mr. Nugent might approve of the celerity and cheapness of Keith's ceremonials. May Fair was the fashionable "marriage shop;" but the Fleet Prison had the advantage of being open to the humblest seekers of conjugal happiness. Keith generously records of this rival establishment, "I have often heard a Fleet parson say that many have come to be married when they have had but half a crown in their pockets, and sixpence to buy a pot of beer, and for which they have pawned some of their clothes." The motto which worthy Mr. Keith affixed to his pamphlet was, "Happy is the wooing that is not long a-doing;" and he avers that of the many thousands he had married, the generality had been acquainted not more than a week, some only a day, or half a day.†

The Marriage Act of 1753 has been justly regarded as the great step in the improvement of the conjugal relations of the people of England, high and low. Marriage was to become a solemn contract in every case; not to be rushed upon without deliberation; not to be ratified without witnesses and public record. Like every other improvement in manners, the social tendency had preceded the legislative action to some limited extent; and then the legal reform hastened on the social amelioration. To the great change in the family relations of this country, of which the Marriage Act was an exponent as well as a cause, has been attributed the wondrous growth of the population in the short space of one century. A minister of state, gifted with prophetic power, has been imagined thus to address the people of Great Britain, in 1751: "These islands, and Ireland, are occupied by the men of many separate states that are now happily united. After the settlement on the land of tribes, fleets, and armies of Celts, of Saxons, of Danes, and of Normans, and after centuries of patient culture, its fertile soil sustains seven millions of people in its whole length from the Isle of Wight to the Shetland Islands. We cannot—for the mighty power is not given us—say, let there be on the European shores of the Atlantic Ocean three Great Britains. But the means exist for creating on this land, in less than a hundred years, two more nations, each in number equal to the existing population, and of distributing them over its fields, in cottages, farms and towns, by the banks of its rivers, and around its immemorial hills; and they will thus be neither separated by larger roads, nor wider seas, but be neighbors, fellow-workers, and fellow-countrymen on the old territory; wielding by machines the forces of nature, that shall serve them with the strength of thousands of horses, on roads and seas—in mines, manufactories, and ships. Subsistence shall be as abundant as it is now, and luxuries, which are confined to the few, shall be enjoyed by multitudes. The wealth of the country—its stock and its produce—shall increase in a faster ratio than the people. All this shall be accomplished without any miraculous agency, by the progress of society—by the diffusion of knowledge and morals—by improvements—and improvements chiefly in the institution of marriage—'that true source of human offspring,' whence,

> 'Founded in reason, loyal, just, and pure,
> Relations dear, and all the charities
> Of father, son, and brother, first were known.'" ‡

NOTE ON THE STUART FAMILY.

After Canova's return from England to Rome, in 1816, a monument was erected by him to the three last members of the Stuart family. James Francis Edward, called the elder pretender, died at Rome in 1765. Charles Edward, who in the latter years of his life took the title of Count of Albany, died on the 31st of January, 1788. His younger brother, Henry Benedict, who became Cardinal York, survived till 1807. He died at Rome, at the age of eighty-two. By his will he directed that the title of Henry IX. should be inscribed on his tomb.

CHAPTER CLX.

Death of Mr. Pelham — Newcastle's ministry — Negotiations with Fox—Pitt passed over—Parliament meets—Fox a cabinet minister—Retrospect of Indian affairs—Clive—Capture and defence of Arcot—North American colonies—Contests on the Ohio—Naval victories—Subsidies agreed upon by the king—Parliament—Great debate—Single-speech Hamilton—Pitt—Fox secretary of state—Pitt dismissed from his office of paymaster—Earthquake at Lisbon.

The prime minister, Mr. Pelham, died on the sixth of March, 1754. Horace Walpole, who underrates the public services of this statesman, has this tribute to his moderation and disinterestedness: "Let it be remembered that, though he first taught or experienced universal servility in Englishmen, yet he lived without abusing his power, and died poor." * The king clearly saw what a hubbub of conflicting ambitions would result from the necessity of a new cast of characters for the political drama. "I shall now have no more peace," exclaimed the old man. The Duke of Newcastle achieved the great object of his ambition, in succeeding his brother as the head of the treasury. If experience could give a politician claims to be the ruler of a great nation, and moreover of a nation very difficult to manage, Newcastle had claims above most men. He had been secretary of state in 1724, under Sir Robert Walpole. Carteret had kept him in the same office, though he despised him. His thirst for power was insatiable. He impaired his estate to maintain and extend his parliamentary influence; and thus, whoever was turned out, Newcastle always kept in. Jealous of every man of ability to whom it was necessary to intrust some share of authority, he was always in terror that his subalterns might be called to command, although ever professing his anxiety for their promotion. Always seeking the doubtful support of "troops of friends," he never offended any man by a plain "No," and was often "under the same engagements to at least ten competitors," as Lord Waldegrave affirms. But he was in many respects incompetent to manage any public business that required resolution and steadiness; and his ignorance was so manifested in his flighty and inconsistent talk that what looks like a joke in Smollett's novel has been received as a reliable fact. He had heard that thirty thousand French had marched to Cape Breton. Where did they get transports? was asked. "Transports," cried he, "I tell you they marched by land." "By land to the island of Cape Breton!" "What! is Cape Breton an island?" It was pointed out in the map; and the delighted minister, hugging his informant, ejaculated, "Egad! I'll go directly, and tell the king that Cape Breton is an island." †

In the House of Lords the duke's performances are thus described by a just and impartial observer: "Hear him speak in parliament, his manner is ungraceful, his language barbarous, his reasoning inconclusive. At the same time he labors through all the confusion of a debate without the least distrust of his own abilities; fights boldly in the dark; never gives up the cause; nor is he ever at a loss either for words or argument." ‡ He has had many successors in this line; but at that period the House of Commons required to be managed by a different species of oratory. Three of the great masters of eloquence were in that house—Pitt, Fox, and Murray. Newcastle offered the seals of secretary of state, with the lead of the Commons, to Mr. Fox. The offer was fully justified by the ability and the experience of this gentleman, who started in public life—"a needy political adventurer," as he has been called—"at a time when the standard of integrity among statesmen was low." § This adherent of Sir Robert Walpole would not shrink from any participation in the corruption which gave ascendency to the Duke of Newcastle.

Fox desired to be actively engaged in working the parliamentary system. As secretary of war he had no seat in the cabinet; no responsibility beyond the routine duties of his office. The prospect of a place which would give him real power raised all the ambition of Fox, who, says Lord Hardwicke, "within a few hours of Mr. Pelham's death had made strong advances to the Duke of Newcastle and myself."* But there was a hitch in the completion of the arrangement proposed by Newcastle, which is singularly indicative of the political degradation of those times. Fox agreed to accept the secretaryship and the management of the House of Commons. He very reluctantly gave up the disposal of the secret-service money, but he stipulated that he was to know how the bribes were disposed of. The next day Newcastle receded from this condition. How am I to understand, said Fox, how to talk to members of parliament, when some have received "gratifications," and others not? His brother, said Newcastle, had never disclosed these things, nor would he. How, asked Fox, are the ministerial boroughs to be filled up? That is all settled, said the duke. Fox rejected the secretaryship; and Newcastle had to look out for a more pliant tool.†

The prime minister and the lord chancellor appear now to have turned their thoughts to Mr. Pitt. There are apologetical letters to him from these great personages obscurely intimating the difficulties which they had encountered in their abortive endeavors to add his strength to their party. Sir Thomas Robinson, a dull diplomatist, was appointed to the office which Fox had rejected. Pitt was indignant. The humiliation of his proud spirit may be read in this passage of a letter to Lord Hardwicke: "The weight of irremovable royal displeasure is a load too great to move under; it must crush any man; it has sunk and broke me. I succumb; and wish for nothing but a decent and innocent retreat, wherein I may no longer, by continuing in the public stream of promotion, forever stick fast aground, and afford to the world the ridiculous spectacle of being passed by every boat that navigates the same river."‡ Pitt found his consolations in a happy marriage with Lady Hester Grenville, a sister of Earl Temple. The calm of the domestic life of this eminent man presents a refreshing contrast to the agitations of his public career. Whenever we have glimpses of him in his country retreat at Hayes, we see him in the full enjoyment of as much tranquil pleasure as his infirm health would allow—exercising his taste in improving his little property: reading; educating his children; an exemplary husband and father in a dissipated age. Of those wonderful powers which gave him, without vanity, the right to claim the highest position among public men, his contemporaries were fully aware. We cannot judge, as they could, of that eloquence of which the admiration may appear to us overcharged, when we regard the fragmentary state in which it has come down to us. His faults were patent to all the world. They have been much paraded of late years—his haughtiness, his intractability, his self-assertion. But after a century has passed, and all the petty men and paltry interests of the first William Pitt's time are hastening to oblivion, his grand figure stands out—a giant among pigmies. In the words of Frederick of Prussia, England had at length brought forth a man.§

The Newcastle ministry, formed out of very fragile materials, had some months of respite from parliamentary opposition. The septennial term of parliament was nearly out when Mr. Pelham died. It was dissolved within a month of his decease. The new parliament met on the 14th of November. Pitt and Fox continued in their subordinate offices—Pitt as paymaster, Fox as secretary of war. But they each writhed under the arrangements by which Robinson had taken the management of the House of Commons. "The duke might as well send his jack-boot to lead us," said Pitt to Fox. They could not decently obstruct public business, but they might attack persons. The feeble leader of the Commons had an uneasy time between these two malcontents. "They have already mumbled poor Sir Thomas Robinson cruelly," writes Walpole on the 1st of December. But about this time a scene was acted which startled the House of Commons out of its habitual slumber. An election petition is presented, which the younger Mr. Delaval ridicules; and the house is in fits of laughter about a complaint of bribery and corruption. Pitt is sitting in the gallery. He rushes down, and instantly rises to speak. "Do members laugh on such a subject as bribery? Do we try within the house to diminish our own dignity, when such attacks are made upon it from without?" "At his first two periods he brought the house to a silence and attention that you might have heard a pin drop."* He called upon the speaker to extend a saving hand to raise the character of the house. "He called on all to assist, or else we should only sit to register the arbitrary edicts of one too powerful a subject."† Newcastle was as much terrified by "this thunderbolt thrown in a sky so long serene," as the audience of Pitt were confounded. The minister contrived, by giving Fox a seat in the cabinet, to detach him from his concert with Pitt. Pitt felt the desertion; and told Fox that "they were upon different lines." It appears that the devotion of Fox to the will of the Duke of Cumberland, "whose soldier Mr. Pitt was not," was an additional cause for this separation of their political action.‡ Newcastle had silenced one of his formidable opponents. The other gave him no trouble for the rest of the session.

Events were maturing at this period which rendered it essentially important that England should have a firm and capable government. On the 25th of March, 1755, the king sent a message to both houses, to acquaint them that "the present situation of affairs makes it necessary to augment his forces by sea and land, and to take such other measures as may best tend to preserve the general peace of Europe, and to secure the just rights and possessions of his crown in America." The danger to America was from France, with whose colonists there had been perpetual disputes as to boundaries and alleged rights, from the period of the peace of Aix-la-Chapelle. In another part of the world there had been similar disputes, amounting to actual warfare. But the affairs of the East Indies were held to belong rather to a trading company than to the government, and were therefore allowed to follow their own course, without being regarded as a matter of national policy. It may be useful if, in this place, we take a review of the affairs of India and of those of America, as they affected British interests. We begin with India.

We have incidentally traced, at various periods, the progress of the East India Company, from the first establishment of a factory in Surat, in 1612,§ through the various contests between rival interests which ended in the union of two companies in 1702. The company gradually acquired great wealth and influence, lent large sums of money to the government, and received corresponding charters and privileges. The Mogul power was hastening to decay, while its viceroys or subahdars had become independent, or yielded only a very limited submission to a phantom of sovereignty at the court of Delhi. A settlement had been made at Madras in 1640. Bombay had been ceded to Charles II. by the Portuguese, as a part of the dowry of Catherine of Braganza, and had been assigned by the king to the East India Company. Dutch, Portuguese, and English had settled on the River Hooghly, a branch of the Ganges; and after some imprudent contests in the time of Aurungzebe, the English finally obtained a grant of land in 1698, where they built Fort William, and laid the foundation of Calcutta. These were the three presidencies, each having a president and council, appointed by the court of directors. A formidable rivalry arose, in the time of Louis XIV., in a French East India Company. This company had a station at Chandernagore on the Hooghly, and another station on the coast of the Carnatic, where their fort was called Pondicherry. The French possessed also the Isle de France (Mauritius) and the Isle de Bourbon.

From the period of the breaking out of the war between England and France, in 1744, to the peace of Aix-la-Chapelle, in 1748, the English and French settlers had been in active hostility. The advantages in this warfare were decidedly on the side of the French. La Bourdonnais, the Governor of the Presidency of the Isle de France, carried a force of three or four thousand Frenchmen, sepoys, and negro slaves, in French vessels across the Indian Ocean, and suddenly attacked Madras, in September, 1746. He bombarded Fort St. George for five days, which then capitulated. La Bourdonnais stipulated to restore the settlement to the English company upon the payment of a ransom. Dupleix, the Governor of the Presidency of Pondicherry, expressed great wrath at the terms of the capitulation. Madras was within his jurisdiction, and he would not ratify the treaty. He looked forward to the expulsion of the English from India, and desired to see their thriving settlement of Madras razed to the ground. Dupleix annulled the capitulation, and insolently carried the Governor of Fort St. George, and other officers, in triumph to Pondicherry. In the counting-house of a merchant at Madras was a young Englishman, Robert Clive, who at the time of the capitulation was in his twenty-first year. He fled to the settlement of Fort St. David, a dependency of Madras, and there obtained an ensign's commission in the company's service. The war of the two companies was becoming serious; and a considerable force was sent from England in 1748. With a larger European army than had appeared in India in modern times, the siege of Pondicherry was undertaken. After a great loss, the English raised the siege. The peace came, and under its conditions Madras was restored. But the English and French, although no longer able to fight as principals, could carry on their hostilities as supporters of rival native princes. Dupleix had more ambitious views than the heads of the English presidencies, or than the court of directors in Leadenhall Street. They looked to the extension and security of trade. The bold Frenchman aimed at empire. The Nizam of the Deccan died in 1748. The succession of his son, Nazir Jung, was disputed by a claimant to the throne. In the Carnatic, a province dependent upon the Deccan, the reigning prince was also assailed by a rival. Dupleix gave his well-timed assistance to the two pretenders. In a battle in August, 1749, the Nabob of the Carnatic was slain. His son, Mahomed Ali, fled to Trichinopoly, and Arcot fell into the hands of the Nabob set up by Dupleix. The same success attended the pretender to the throne of the Deccan. Nazir Jung was slain by treachery, as he sat upon his elephant at the head of his army, looking with contempt upon the few French who were drawn up in battle to oppose him. Dupleix received the new Nizam at Pondicherry, and was declared governor, under the Mogul, of the country upon the eastern coast, from the River Kistna to Cape Comorin. There never was a period in the previous history of our commercial relations with India when it was more probable that the power of the English company, like that of the Dutch, was hastening to an end. And yet, within a third of a century, a great orator in the House of Commons took the English dominion over the vast peninsula as a theme for reflection on the inconstancy of human greatness, and the stupendous revolutions that had happened in an age of wonders. "Could it be believed, when I entered into existence, or when you, Mr. Speaker, a younger man, were born, that on this day, in this house, we should be employed in discussing the conduct of those British subjects who had disposed of the power and person of the Great Mogul?" *

The boy who fled from Madras, when Dupleix violated the capitulation of Fort St. George, was destined to lay the foundation of the British empire in India. In Trichinopoly Mahomed Ali prolonged a feeble resistance to Chunda Sahib and his French allies, in their rapid steps toward the complete dominion of the Carnatic. The last stronghold was invested. There was no force to attempt raising the siege. There was no officer at Madras to head the handful of English and native troops to any such daring enterprise. Ensign Clive had now become Captain Clive, and his abilities had procured him the employment of commissary to the troops in the Presidency of Madras. The inspirations of military genius in cases of great emergency are bold even to rashness. The young captain of twenty-five, who had never seen a field of battle, but who rightly estimated what daring might effect, in the first place, and who knew the possibility of combinations with native powers to secure what daring might win, conceived the plan of attacking Arcot, the capital of the Carnatic. A circumstance almost as extraordinary as Clive's bold project is, that the heads of the presidency listened favorably to his plans, and gave him the command of an expedition, consisting of three hundred sepoys and two hundred Europeans. He had eight officers under him, four of whom were factors of the company. Clive and his little band marched up to the gates of Arcot, while a violent storm terrified the superstitious natives who composed the garrison. He entered the city of a hundred thousand people without striking a blow. His success induced the besiegers of Trichinopoly to detach a large force, which finally amounted to ten thousand men, to attack the ruinous fort at Arcot in which Clive had established his small garrison. The siege went on, week after week, with little hope of succor from the company's settlements of Madras and St. David's, where scarcely troops enough were left for their own defence. But Clive thought of a wavering Mahratta chief, who might become his ally. He put himself in communication with Morari Row, who was encamped on the hills of Mysore. Their captain's courage and sagacity inspired all around him with confidence. The garrison began to feel the assaults of hunger. His sepoys begged, not for more food, but that they, who could subsist on scantier fare than the Europeans, might have the liquid in which the rice was boiled, while their fellow-sufferers ate the grain which they more needed. The Mahratta chief, the head of a tribe ever conspicuous for bravery, was touched with the resolution by which Arcot was defended. He never thought before, he said, that the English could fight, but now he would help them. Rajah Sahib, who commanded the besiegers, offered Clive a large bribe if he would surrender; but threatened inevitable death to the commander and his garrison if they should compel him to take the fort by storm. Clive sent him a message of defiance. The 14th of November, the fifteenth day of the siege, was the great festival of Hossein, when all true believers are assured that they who died on this day, battling against the infidels, would be forgiven all the sins of their lives, and enter upon every joy of the Mohammedan paradise. Fired with superstition, and not less with stimulating drinks, crowds rushed to the assault of Arcot. Elephants with plates of iron on their foreheads were driven against the gates. Terrified by the musketry from the walls, they turned upon the multitudes that followed them, and trampled them down. Clive was the soul of the defence. He even took the management himself of a piece of artillery, and destroyed the assailants who were crossing the ditch on a raft. In an hour the attack was at an end. At two o'clock the next morning the besiegers were no more seen.

The wonderful success of the inexperienced captain inspired a confidence in Madras that was justified by the result. Large reinforcements were sent to him, and he went forth to attack Rajah Sahib in the open field. The victory of Arnee opened the way to more successes. The contest was prolonged by Rajah Sahib, who marched upon Madras in January, 1752, and committed some ravages. But Clive was at hand, and again he won a great victory. Trichinopoly was feebly defended, although the siege had now become a mere blockade. Clive was appointed to head a new expedition to raise the siege; but his senior officer, Major Lawrence, having arrived from England, took the command. The two acted together without jealousy. The besiegers of Trichinopoly capitulated, and Chunda Sahib was put to death by the Mahrattas. But Dupleix continued to struggle against the powerful rivals whom he thought to have swept from the Indian territory. Clive, after less important successes, found his health fail. He returned to England, with the lady he had married, a sister of Maskelyne, the eminent astronomer. Honors awaited him; and he had acquired a large amount of prize money. His presence in India had become unnecessary; for in 1754, under the direction of English and French commissioners, hostilities had been suspended; and it was agreed that the rival companies, and the subjects of both nations, should in future abstain from interference in the affairs of the native princes. It was a vain stipulation; for it was perfectly clear that upon the renewal of a European war, hostilities, whether as principals or auxiliaries, would be renewed by the English and French in India. The man upon whom reliance could be placed in such a contingency was Clive. In 1755 he was appointed Governor of Fort St. David; and he received from the king the commission of lieutenant-colonel in the British army before he sailed for India. Dupleix had been superseded by his government; and he returned to France, to be neglected and to die in poverty.

The North American colonies of Great Britain were looked upon as possessions to be defended at all cost from foreign assault. Any invasion of their territorial limits was regarded as a just cause of hostility. Any settlement near their boundaries was viewed with intense jealousy. Their inhabitants were, for the most part, of the same race as the English nation; speaking the same language; governed by laws nearly identical; imbued with the same love of liberty. The original settlers of the New England States had left their own land, to found communities where freedom and toleration might flourish in a more congenial region than that governed by the Stuarts. An American historian has shown, by minute investigations, that twenty-one thousand Englishmen had settled in these New England States before the time of the Long Parliament; that the number of subsequent settlers from Britain, or any other part of Europe, after 1640, to some time beyond the commencement of the present century, was very inconsiderable; and that from these stout-hearted Puritans are descended one third of the present vast population of the United States.* Many of the people of New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, and Connecticut † had thus, in their English origin, old family associations, if not existing family connections, with the parent country. Their commercial intercourse kept up among all classes a mutual interest in a common prosperity. Of the Middle States, Pennsylvania ‡ and Maryland had the same English origin, and were bound to England by the same ties. New York had been settled by the Dutch, and New Jersey by Danes and Swedes; but each of these States had been ceded to England before the close of the seventeenth century. Of the Southern States, Virginia was the earliest English settlement, as Georgia was the latest. The two Carolinas were settled in the middle of the seventeenth century.§ These were the colonial possessions on the North American continent which the English government had to defend and protect at the period when the peace, or rather armistice, of Aix-la-Chapelle was likely to be broken. Though all the colonists had occasional causes of complaint, they showed no doubtful allegiance to the British crown. Nova Scotia, or Acadia, as it was called by the French, who had been several times its masters, was held by Britain after 1711. In 1749 a large grant was made by parliament for the encouragement therein of a new settlement. Four thousand emigrants, with their families, established themselves in the province; and by them was Halifax founded. This settlement was made in the belief that France was again looking to the possession of Nova Scotia, and that those of the French race who occupied considerable portions of the territory, and took the name of neutrals, would, with the aid of the Indians, overpower the small British garrison kept at the port of Annapolis Royal. New Brunswick, ceded at the peace of Utrecht by France, was a mere fishing station. Newfoundland was colonized by England under a charter of 1610. Numerous British settlements were made on its east coast; and the French had their settlement of Placentia on the south. By the Treaty of Utrecht the island was ceded to Great Britain, but a limited right of fishery was reserved to the French. Here, therefore, was a cause of perpetual dispute. Prince Edward Island received its present name in honor of the father of Queen Victoria. Before 1799 it was called St. John's Island. We may here add that, at the peace of Aix-la-Chapelle, the West Indian possessions of Great Britain were the islands of Antigua, Barbadoes, Jamaica, Montserrat, Nevis, St. Kitt's, Tortola and Anguilla, Bahamas, Bermudas, Honduras. The East India Company possessed St. Helena at this period; and in Africa there was a settlement in Gambia, and there were some forts on the Gold Coast.

The possession of Canada by France was a perpetual source of disquiet to the British colonists of New England, and of Virginia and Pennsylvania. The French Canadian settlers had penetrated to the Ohio, and had there built a fort which they named Duquesne. On the Ohio the Virginians had also a fort called Block's Town. The settlement of Virginia, at this period, extended about two hundred miles from the seacoast, and spread over about one third of the State, according to its present limits. Its population was about two hundred thousand, of whom more than a fourth were slaves. The territory then unoccupied by the descendants of the colonists of the reign of James I. was the hunting-ground of Indians; and the Virginians upon the Ohio were traders in skins. The French, also, were seeking a participation in that commerce which quickly perishes as the extension of civilization creates more profitable industries. The old families of Virginia were engaged in far more lucrative and less adventurous occupations than in exchanges with the Indians. They were cultivating tobacco upon every estate. Their tobacco-fields were the Potosi of the first settlers of North America. Tobacco was their sole article of export. It brought them all the comforts and luxuries which England and Scotland could supply. It was the general measure of value, and the principal currency. Public officers, ministers of the Church, had their salaries paid at so many annual pounds of tobacco. In 1758 the colony exported seventy thousand hogsheads of the precious weed, equivalent to seventy millions of pounds. The price was ten times higher than the present rate. Virginia was thriving. Her planters lived luxuriously on their estates, surrounded by their slaves, and affecting the aristocratic habits of grand old English families, from which many of them claimed to have sprung. Hospitable they were to profusion.* In such a state of society was George Washington born; who, in 1754, then a young man of twenty-two, was fighting for the integrity of the colonial territory against the aggressions of the French. At the age of nineteen he became an adjutant-general, having the rank of major, and taking the direction of one of the military districts into which the province of Virginia was divided for the purpose of resisting the encroachments of the French and the depredations of the Indians. These divisions were reduced to four, in 1752, and the young major had the command of the northern division. In the capacity of commissioner, in 1753, he went into the territory occupied by the French, to negotiate with their commander. He had no success in his diplomacy; but he brought back with him a plan of the fort which the French had constructed in the neighborhood of Lake Erie. He had been employed, when at the age of sixteen, as a public surveyor, and in the wild district of the Alleghanies had acquired that practical mode of viewing large tracts of country which was of essential importance to him in his future great career. In 1754, under the command of an English officer, Colonel Fry, he was sent to occupy the British posts of the Ohio, in the presence of a French force. He defeated a detachment of the enemy, but was finally compelled to capitulate to superior numbers, who surrounded his intrenched fort. He was allowed to retreat with his men, with what are termed military honors. The feuds of the two nations were the subject of official discussions in Paris; but it was clear that this sort of half-warfare in America could not long endure.

In January, 1755, although no formal declarations of hostilities had taken place, General Braddock, with a body of English troops, was sent to the succor of the colonists in Virginia. His campaign was a most unfortunate one. Braddock was a commander of the old routine cast, who fancied that well-dressed and well-equipped soldiers, who could go through all the manœuvres of the Prussian drill, were sure to be victorious over any number of irregular troops. He marched against the French fort on the Ohio, taking Washington with him, although he despised the American militia and their officers. What the Highlanders were to Cope and Hawley the Indians were to Braddock. In a valley between two woods, within ten miles of Fort Duquesne—utterly neglecting all precautions against surprise—the English general fell into an ambuscade of Indians. A few French only encountered him; but the unerring marksmen of the woods picked off his officers; and Braddock himself, fighting with desperate courage, was mortally wounded. Half his troops fled in confusion, abandoning their artillery. The other half were killed or wounded; and the terrible Indian scalping-knife left few to tell the tale of this fatal reverse.†

While British and French were fighting in the waste regions of North America, their ships were engaged in the Atlantic. Admiral Boscawen, with eleven ships of the line, had been sent to watch a French expedition that had sailed from Brest. Off Newfoundland the squadrons met in a fog. Captain Howe, having received a signal to engage, took two of the French vessels. The others got into Louisbourg, the fortified harbor of Cape Breton. In the autumn of 1755 Sir Edward Hawke, upon a sudden resolve of the government, made some captures of French merchantmen in the Channel. Of the regency—for the king had gone to Hanover—some were inclined for immediate hostilities and some for delaying them. The time had passed for any sudden and decisive blow ; while the ministers were trembling at their own responsibility, afraid to declare war, and not taking sincere and active measures to preserve peace.

After the session had been terminated in April, 1755, the king, in opposition to a strong parliamentary feeling, had set out for Germany. He had left the regency to take care of the great national interests of Britain, while he looked after the usual means of fencing round his own Hanover by subsidizing auxiliary powers. He was now in dread of Prussia ; and to counteract the growing strength of Frederick II. Russia was to receive a subsidy as well as the Elector of Hesse and smaller potentates. "A factory was opened at Herrenhausen, where every prince that could muster and clothe a regiment might traffic with it to advantage." * With the Elector of Hesse, the king, without the approval of his ministers at home, signed a contract for a large annual payment by England, with an additional stipulation for paying levy money for every Hessian soldier. Fox expressed himself in private against all subsidies. Legge, the chancellor of the exchequer, took a bolder step. The king had sent home the treaty with Hesse. The members of the council of regency had signed it, as a matter of course. Legge refused his signature to the treasury warrants which were to open the public purse. Newcastle was terrified, and applied to Pitt to throw his shield over him, offering him a seat in the cabinet if he would support the subsidies. Doddington relates what Pitt told him of his interview with the duke. He implored his grace not to complete the ruin which the king had nearly brought upon himself by his journey to Hanover. "A king abroad at this time, without one man about him that has one English sentiment, and to bring home a whole set of subsidies!" The duke hinted that Pitt's support might be rewarded with the seals of secretary of state. He replied that he did not want the office. The duke's system of carrying on business in the House of Commons would not do. "There must be men of efficiency and authority in the house ; a secretary, and a chancellor of the exchequer at least, who should have access to the crown ; habitual, frequent, familiar access, he meant, that they might tell their own story, to do themselves and their friends justice, and not be the victims of a whisper." Pitt stoutly argued against the system of subsidies. Newcastle talked of the king's honor being engaged to Hesse and to Russia. Let his majesty give, said Pitt, a hundred thousand to one, and a hundred and fifty thousand to the other, out of the fifteen millions he had saved, to be let off these bad bargains.† Fox was more tractable than his rival. He saw promotion at hand, whatever might be his abstract dislike to subsidies, if he would be prudent.

The parliament met on the 13th of November. The king announced the increase of the naval and land forces, and mentioned the treaties he had concluded with Russia and Hesse. In the address of each house especial reference was made to Hanover. The address of the Commons said, "We think ourselves bound in justice and gratitude to assist his majesty against insults and attacks that may be made upon any of his majesty's dominions, though not belonging to the crown of Great Britain." An amendment to omit such a pledge was moved in the Lords by Earl Temple, Pitt's brother-in-law. A similar amendment was proposed in the Commons. These were of course rejected ; but they gave occasion to two remarkable orations. William Gerard Hamilton, a young member, made his maiden speech in favor of the original address—that one harangue, antithetical and familiar, argumentative and declamatory, which handed him down to after times as "Single-speech Hamilton." Pitt made a speech on that famous battle night, of which no fragment remains to us but one which has been preserved by Walpole. The younger Pitt said he would prefer the recovery of a speech of Lord Bolingbroke to the restoration of the lost books of Livy or Tacitus. The contemporary accounts of his father's speeches would almost induce a similar wish, even if the recovery were confined to this effort of the 13th of November. Walpole, in a letter of the 15th of November to Conway, after rapturously noticing Hamilton's success, says, "You will ask what could be beyond this? Nothing, but what was beyond what ever was, and that was Pitt. He spoke at past one, for an hour and thirty-five minutes. There was more humor, wit, vivacity, finer language, more boldness, in short more astonishing perfections, than even you, who are used to him, can conceive." In a letter of the following day to Bentley, Walpole gives the fragment which, with similar detached passages of various other speeches, enable us to form some idea of the lustre which a rich imagination gave to Pitt's eloquence. "The most admired passage was a comparison he drew of the two parts of the new administration." By the new administration Walpole means the coalition between Fox and Newcastle. "It is," said Pitt, "as the conflux of the Rhone and the Saone, which I remember to have seen at Lyons ; the latter a gentle, feeble, languid stream, languid but not deep ; the other a boisterous and overbearing torrent. But they join at last, and long may they continue united, to the comfort of each other, and to the glory, honor, and happiness of this nation." The next morning Fox received the seals of secretary of state, as the reward for his support of the ministerial address. Pitt, on the 20th of November, was dismissed from his office of paymaster ; and Legge and George Grenville were also superseded.

From the agitations of party—from the impending calamities of war—the minds of men were suddenly turned to a convulsion of nature, upon which all the civilized world looked with dread and wonder. The earthquake at Lisbon was announced to parliament by a royal message on the 28th of November, desiring the concurrence of the houses in sending "such speedy and effectual relief as may be suitable to so afflicting and pressing an exigency." The Commons immediately voted a grant of a hundred thousand pounds. It was indeed an event to make men pause in their ordinary career of thoughtless indulgence or selfish ambition. Every church of Lisbon was crowded with worshippers on All Saints Day ; and almost every church was shaken to its foundations, and thousands perished in the ruins. One fourth of all the houses in Lisbon fell. The pier of the Tagus was overthrown, with hundreds who had fled to the banks of the river to avoid the falling houses. Fires broke out all over the devoted town. The great granaries were consumed, and the people were without bread. Robbers came forth from their dens, and murdered those who clung to their movable property. The English people met this terrible infliction with the generous relief and sympathy that they have always extended to the sorrows of other nations. They bethought themselves, for a while, of their own sins, which might draw down the vengeance of heaven. The fashionable world took the necessity of repentance into its earnest consideration, and resolved—to abolish masquerades.

In a fortnight after his dismissal from office, Pitt, from his place in parliament, sent forth a voice whose echoes would be heard throughout the land. The nation was dreading a French invasion—sullenly trembling at the possible consequences of an assault upon the capital, and without confidence in the government to which the public defence was intrusted. Pitt seconded the motion of the secretary of war, for an army of thirty-four thousand men, being an increase of fifteen thousand. He had wanted even a larger increase in the previous year. The king's speech of the preceding session had lulled the nation into a fallacious dream of repose. "He wanted to call this country out of that enervate state, that twenty thousand men from France could shake it. The maxims of our government were degenerated, not our natives." An opinion had gone forth, which in 1757 was embodied in a book of extraordinary popularity, alluded to by Cowper:

> "The inestimable Estimate of Brown > Rose like a paper-kite, and charm'd the town." *

The nation was told, "We are rolling to the brink of a precipice that must destroy us."† Effeminacy, vanity, luxury, rapacity, universally prevailed. Religion was despised. The principle of honor was lost or totally corrupted. The national capacity was lowered. The national spirit of defence was impaired. There were no better fighting men upon earth than the common people of England; but in the better sort there was "such a general defect in the spirit of defence as would alarm any people who were not lost to all sense of danger." ‡ The danger was from an outward enemy. "The French, in land armies, are far our superiors. They are making large and dreadful strides toward us in naval power. . . . Should the French possess themselves of North America, what eye can be so weak as not to see the consequence? Must not a naval power come down upon us, equal, if not superior, to our own?" § A diminished population had accompanied increasing commerce. Excess of trade and overflow of wealth had impaired our bodily strength.‖ It is easy to detect the fallacies of this course of reasoning; but there can be little doubt that the nation required to be roused from its lethargy. Happily there was a man capable of rousing it. Pitt, in his speech of the 5th of December, had expressed his earnest wish to "see that breed restored, which under our old principles had carried our glory so high." The king, on the 23d of March, announced the probability of an invasion, and informed the houses that he had made a requisition for a body of Hessian troops, in pursuance of the treaty recently concluded. Both houses acknowledged with gratitude his majesty's care for the national defence. On the 29th of March Mr. Fox moved, "that an humble address be presented to his majesty, that, for the more effectual defence of this island, and for the better security of the religion and liberties of his subjects against the threatened attacks by a foreign enemy, he would be graciously pleased to order twelve battalions of his electoral troops, together with the usual detachment of artillery, to be forthwith brought into this kingdom." The address was voted by the large ministerial majority; but not without strong dissatisfaction. That state alone, exclaimed Pitt, is a sovereign state, "quis suis stat viribus, non alieno pendet arbitrio"—which stands by its own strength, not by the help of another country. The Hanoverians and Hessians came, and were encamped in various parts of the kingdom. Yet the common people of England were ready to deserve the eulogium of Brown as to their capacity for fighting. They enlisted freely, when called upon. Hogarth's print of the recruit who wanted to add "a cubit to his stature" is an evidence of this disposition.

For half a century Great Britain had held possession of the island of Minorca, which General Stanhope and Admiral Leake had conquered during the palmy time of the War of the Succession. Port Mahon, the best harbor of the Mediterranean, was thought a more important British possession even than Gibraltar. The English ministers had received intimation very early in the spring of 1756 that a formidable expedition was in preparation at Toulon, not provisioned for a long voyage. They shut their eyes to the exposed state of the island that lay within a few days' sail from the shores of Provence. The defence of Port Mahon was intrusted to a small garrison commanded by an aged and infirm general. The government was at last alarmed. They dispatched Admiral Byng (son of Lord Torrington, the Admiral Byng of Queen Anne's time) with ten ships, from Spithead, on the 7th of April. On the 10th of April the French fleet, of twelve ships of the line, sailed from Toulon, with transports, having sixteen thousand troops on board. They were off the coast of Minorca on the 18th, and began to disembark at the port of Ciudadella. The only chance of defence against such an armament was in the strong castle of St. Philip. General Blakeney got together between two and three thousand troops, the officers of the English regiments being for the most part absent; and he prepared for resistance. The natural and artificial strength of the fortress prevented the French from proceeding in the siege without much cautious delay. On the 19th of May Admiral Byng's fleet, having been joined by two more men-of-war, arrived within view of St. Philip, while the batteries of the French were carrying on their fire against the fort, where the flag of England was still flying. Byng, who had touched at Gibraltar, had written home to explain that he could obtain no necessaries at that station; that the place was so neglected that he was unable to clean the foul ships with which he had sailed from England; and that if he had been sent earlier he might have been able to have prevented the landing of the French in Minorca, whereas it was now very doubtful whether any good could arise from an attempt to reinforce the garrison. This was something like an anticipation of failure, with an indication of the neglect which made success difficult. On the 21st of May De la Galissonnière, the French admiral, bore down upon the British fleet. Byng did not engage with that alacrity which the naval traditions of our country point out as the first duty of an admiral, even with a doubtful advantage. Rear-Admiral West, on the contrary, with his portion of the squadron, had attacked with impetuosity, and had driven some of the French vessels out of their line of battle. Byng was scarcely engaged, except at the beginning of the action, when his own ship, being damaged in the rigging, became for a short time unmanageable. He hesitated about advancing, for fear of breaking his line. De la Galissonnière leisurely retired. Byng called a council of war; represented that he was inferior to the enemy in number of men and weight of metal, and proposed to return to Gibraltar. The council agreed to the proposal. The admiral sent home his dispatches; and on the 16th of June Sir Edward Hawke and Admiral Saunders were ordered to supersede Byng and his second in command. The unfortunate admiral was taken home under arrest, and was committed as a prisoner to an apartment in Greenwich Hospital. Admiral West was received with favor at St. James's. After a defence as resolute as it was possible to make against an overwhelming force, St. Philip was surrendered, after an assault on the 27th of June headed by the Duke de Richelieu. The garrison marched out with the honors of war, and were conveyed to Gibraltar. A tempest of popular fury had arisen, such as had rarely been witnessed in England. The news of Byng's return to Gibraltar, without having attempted to relieve the garrison in St. Philip, first came to London through the French admiral's dispatch to his government. "It is necessary," says Walpole, "to be well acquainted with the disposition of a free, proud, fickle, and violent people before one can conceive the indignation occasioned by this intelligence." * But when Byng's own dispatch came, in which he assumed the triumphant tone of a man who had done his duty, his effigy was burned in all the great towns. Every ballad-singer had a ditty in which he was execrated. When he arrived at Portsmouth he was saved with difficulty from being torn in pieces by the mob. A chap-book related "A Rueful Story, by a Broken-hearted Sailor." A coarse print exhibited Byng hanging in chains. A medal was struck, having a figure of the admiral, with the inscription, "Was Minorca sold for French gold?" Addresses went up to the throne from London, and from almost every county and city, calling for inquiry and signal punishment. To the address of the city the king was made to pledge his royal word that he would save no delinquent from justice. Newcastle, "with a volubility of timorous folly, when a deputation from the city had made representations to him against the admiral, blurted out, 'Oh! indeed he shall be tried immediately—he shall be hanged directly.'" † The fate of the unhappy man was not determined until the spring of the following year.

In closing the session of parliament on the 27th of May, the king announced that the injuries his subjects had sustained from the French having been followed by the invasion of Minorca, which had been guaranteed to the British crown by all the great powers of Europe, he had formally declared war against France. Important changes had taken place since, in the previous summer, the king had negotiated for a subsidy to Russia, to protect his Hanoverian possessions against the probable attacks of Prussia. George II. and Frederick II. were not exactly fitted for any cordial friendship. They had been fighting on opposite sides for eight years in the war of the Austrian Succession. George took the side of Maria Theresa, and—to use the words of Mr. Carlyle—"needed to begin by assuring his parliament and newspapers, profoundly dark on the matter, that Frederick was a robber and villain for taking the other side."* Frederick cared little for what parliaments or newspapers might say of him. Perhaps to those who have followed his last historian in tracing the origin of the claims upon Silesia, he may be thought to have had justice upon his side—that sort of justice which encourages sovereigns to imperil the happiness of millions for the assertion of personal rights. The War of the Succession came to an end, and Frederick got Silesia guaranteed to him. Beyond the public differences of George and Frederick, the Prussian king had indulged his unhappy talent of sarcasm; and his sharp sayings about his Britannic majesty were not easily to be forgiven. But the time was come when they became politically necessary to each other. A treaty was concluded at Westminster, on the 16th of January, 1756, by which the King of Great Britain and the King of Prussia, fearing that the peace of Europe might be disturbed in consequence of the disputes in America, entered upon a convention of neutrality, by which they were each bound not to suffer any foreign troops to enter Germany, and their several dominions were reciprocally guaranteed. The scheme of subsidizing Russia was thus renounced. Some old money differences were at the same time adjusted. This treaty was not submitted to parliament till the close of 1756. In the mean time the terrible contest known as the Seven Years War had commenced. The loss of Silesia was the one great grief of Maria Theresa. From the peace of Aix-la-Chapelle her dominant thought, which almost became a ruling passion, was the hope of its recovery. If France could be induced to take part with Austria—if each could forget the hatreds of two centuries, Prussia would return to her old insignificance in the affairs of Europe. The ridicule which King George felt it politic to overlook in his satirical nephew rankled in the heart of the real ruler of France, Madame de Pompadour. Louis XV. had himself writhed under this hornet's sting. The profligate Bourbon resolved to make common cause with Maria Theresa. The Czarina Elizabeth of Russia joined the coalition, with a similar sense of personal affronts. Augustus, King of Poland and Elector of Saxony, and the King of Sweden, entered into the same concert. The King of Prussia saw that his enemies were gathering on every side, and that his sole friend was England.

Frederick, at the commencement of the Seven Years War, was in his forty-fourth year. He had enjoyed ten years of repose since the peace of Dresden in 1746, during which period, by his wisdom as a financier and his strictness as a military disciplinarian, he was prepared to go to war with a full treasury and a well-trained army. His will was law among his five millions of subjects; and, except in his military code, he was a merciful and just despot. Arbitrary sovereigns with eager troops waiting upon their nod are not retarded in their movements by the hesitations of counsellors or the scruples of parliaments. Sir Andrew Mitchell, the English envoy at Berlin, was endeavoring to dissuade Frederick from immediate hostilities. "What, sir!" exclaimed the king. "What do you see in my face? Was my nose made, do you think, to receive fillips?"† Frederick had demanded an explanation of her views from the Empress of Austria, and had received no specific answer. He would not receive an answer, he had said, "in the style of an oracle." He was perfectly informed of the confederacy against himself, and he resolved to anticipate its hostile movements. Toward the end of August he whispered Mitchell, who was at a court supper, to come to him at three o'clock the next morning. Frederick carried the envoy to his camp, and told him, "there were a hundred thousand men setting out that instant, they knew not whither; and bade him write to his master that he was going to defend his majesty's dominions and his own."* To the most feeble of his antagonists, the Elector of Saxony and King of Poland, Frederick allowed no breathing time. He was in possession of Dresden on the 10th of September. The Saxon army was in the fortified camp of Pirna, a position which Frederick deemed impregnable, and therefore was contented to blockade it. He called himself Protector of Saxony, but in truth was its conqueror. Yet, although helping himself to the military stores of the arsenals, and dealing with public money as if it were his own, he exhibited one species of moderation which the conqueror of the next great period of European warfare had the self-denial to imitate at Dresden, whatever was his plunder of other cities. Frederick visited the famous picture-gallery. The director of the gallery trembled, as he saw the master of the capital, and of all its treasures, pause before some of the great works of art which were the pride of the electorate. In his imagination the Madonna di San Sisto of Raffaelle, the Notte of Correggio, were destined to be packed off to Berlin. "Sir," said Frederick to the director, "I suppose I may be permitted to have copies." The King of Prussia was not so moderate or courteous when his greater interests were concerned. It was important that he should obtain possession of the state papers which would prove the designs of the confederacy against him. Augustus was at the camp of Pirna. Maria Josepha of Austria, his consort, was at Dresden. The spirited lady refused to give them up, except by force; and, according to some accounts, sat upon the trunk in which they were contained, which had been carried to her bedchamber; according to other accounts, placed her back against the door of the muniment-room in which they were. The Prussian commandant of Dresden did obtain them by force. The discourtesy was long remembered to Frederick's disadvantage; but by the publication of these papers he showed to Europe that in striking the first blow against the coalesced powers he was justified by the necessity of self-preservation. The military operations which followed secured to him Saxony. An Austrian army, commanded by Marshal Browne, was advancing from Bohemia. Frederick left the camp of Pirna to be dealt with by Prince Ferdinand; and with a force of twenty-five thousand men defeated the Austrian army of forty thousand in the plain of Losowitz. This battle, which was most severely contested, took place on the 1st of October. Frederick returned to Dresden. The Saxon army in Pirna, strictly blockaded, had only the prospect of famine or of surrender. They surrendered unconditionally. Some of these seventeen thousand men were compelled, and some were persuaded, to enter into the Prussian service. The elector retired to Warsaw, and Frederick went into winter quarters in the capital of the country that had, in a few months, been reduced to the condition of an enslaved province.

On the 4th of June, 1756, George, Prince of Wales, completed his eighteenth year, the period determined by the Regency Act as that of his majority in case his grandfather had been dead. The king wished to give the prince a separate establishment, with an allowance of 40,000*l.* a year, thus removing him from the control of the princess dowager. The young prince entreated the king not to separate him from his mother, although he was deeply grateful for the proposed royal bounty. They were both anxious that Lord Bute should be groom of the stole in the new household. Lord Waldegrave relates that he was present at a cabinet council, for the consideration of this appointment; when the chancellor, Lord Hardwicke, said, "he would not give credit to some very extraordinary reports; but that many sober and respectable persons would think it indecent."‡ The court scandal, which Walpole dwells upon with peculiar gusto, continued some time after Prince George came to the throne, and was one of the misfortunes of the early part of his reign. Bute, in spite of the "extraordinary reports"—which are now held by most unprejudiced inquirers to have had their origin in party virulence and vulgar credulity—was appointed to the office in the household, very reluctantly on the part of the king. In this influential position, the favorite of the heir-apparent, he had considerable participation in the politics of the time. One curious example of the mode in which Lord Bute kept the future before the view of great parliamentary leaders may be seen in a passage of a letter to Mr. Pitt, during that first short time of his power which we shall have presently to notice: "I am certain the firm support and countenance of him who is some day to reap the fruits of my friend's unwearied endeavors for the public safety would make him perfectly easy under the frowns of prejudiced, deluded, fluctuating men." *

Mr. Fox had held the seals of secretary of state about ten months, during which period a heavy burden of obloquy had to be borne by the ministry. In October, 1756, he resigned his office. He probably was justified in abandoning his colleagues to the approaching censures of parliament in regard to measures of which he had been allowed no direction. The popular indignation about the loss of Minorca was taking a new direction. In September, "the whole city of Westminster was disturbed by the song of a hundred ballad-singers, the burden of which was, 'to the block with Newcastle and the yard-arm with Byng.'" † In October "Poor Byng is the phrase is every mouth, and then comes the hackneyed simile of the scapegoat." ‡ The resignation of the secretary of state was a sudden blow to Newcastle, "who meant that Fox should have continued in a responsible office; with a double portion of dangers and abuse, but without any share of power." § The prime minister was left without any support in the House of Commons. Murray, the attorney-general, insisted upon being appointed lord chief justice, a vacancy having occurred by the death of Sir Dudley Ryder. Newcastle offered the great lawyer the choice of sinecures of fabulous amount—a pension—any terms if he would remain in the House of Commons. Murray was immovable, and to the enduring advantage of the nation became chief justice and Lord Mansfield. Pitt stood alone without a rival—"no orator to oppose him who had courage even to look him in the face." ‖ Newcastle, in his extremity, induced the king to consent that an overture should be made to the awful Commoner. Pitt refused to treat, saying that "a plain man, unpractised in the policy of a court, could never be the associate of so experienced a minister." ¶ The unhappy duke went about imploring this nobleman and that commoner to take the seals. "No man would stand in the gap," says Waldegrave. At last Newcastle himself resigned. "Perfidy, after thirty years, had an intermission," writes Walpole. Lord Hardwicke, the learned and able chancellor, who desired retirement, followed his old friend. A coalition was proposed between Fox and Pitt, which Pitt refused to agree to. At last, in November, the Duke of Devonshire was appointed first commissioner of the treasury; Pitt, secretary of state; his brother-in-law, Temple, at the head of the admiralty; Legge, chancellor of the exchequer.

On the 2d of December the parliament was opened with a speech from the throne, "which," says Lord Waldegrave, "by its style and substance, appeared to be the work of a new speech-maker." Never was a vital change of policy more boldly indicated. It declared that the succor and preservation of America "demand resolutions of vigor and dispatch." That, for a firm defence at home, "a national militia may in time become one good resource." "Relying with pleasure on the spirit and zeal of my people," said the king, "the body of my electoral troops, which I ordered hither at the desire of my parliament, I have directed to return to my dominions in Germany." Finally, his majesty said, "Unprosperous events of war in the Mediterranean have drawn from my subjects signal proofs how dearly they tender my honor and that of my crown." To recommend a militia, which his majesty had always ridiculed; to trust to the British people for the defence of their country, instead of trusting to the Hessians and Hanoverians; to call uncourtly addresses and popular clamor signal proofs of affection—these were indeed evidences of a new speech-maker. The king, says Waldegrave, "in common conversation made a frank declaration of his real sentiments." A spurious speech had been circulated in town and country. This production was burned by the common hangman, and the printer was ordered to be prosecuted. George, who sometimes displayed a quaint sarcastic humor, "hoped the man's punishment would be of the mildest sort, because he had read both speeches, and, as far as he understood either of them, he liked the spurious speech better than his own." **

The electoral troops were sent home. A Militia Bill was now passed, although a similar bill had been rejected in the previous session. Under this act thirty-two thousand men were to be called out in England and Wales. The measure was received with popular approbation, until it began to interfere with individual ease and freedom. The Protestant dissenters in London and the provinces remonstrated against the possible insertion of a clause in the bill that the militia might be exercised on Sundays; but the notion, although it did not appear to excite any displeasure among the clergy of the Established Church, was very wisely given up. Reinforcements were sent to the Earl of Loudoun, who now commanded in America. The regular army had been increased to 45,000 men; and Pitt, at this time, adopted the politic suggestion made by Duncan Forbes in 1738, that the Highlanders should be enlisted in the service of the state, instead of being prompted to disaffection by needy chiefs. Two Highland regiments were raised, the command of one being given to Simon Fraser, son of Lord Lovat; of the other, to Archibald Montgomery, brother of Lord Eglington. Twenty years afterward, in one of his great speeches, in which Chatham urged conciliation toward "our brethren in America," he looked back upon the success of this first measure of his bold statesmanship: "I remember, after an unnatural rebellion had been extinguished in the northern parts of this island, that I employed these very rebels in the service and defence of their country. They were reclaimed by this means; they fought our battles; they cheerfully bled in defence of those liberties which they attempted to overthrow but a few years before." * As the war minister of George II., Mr. Pitt had to modify some of his former opinions with regard to continental alliances. He brought down a message from the king on the 17th of February, to ask from his faithful Commons that they would assist his majesty in maintaining an army of observation to protect his electoral dominions, and to fulfil his engagements with his good ally, the King of Prussia. This was the first day that Pitt had entered the House of Commons since his accession to office. His appearance there had been delayed by continued illness. He followed this demonstration of his individual opinions by moving a grant of 200,000*l.* in compliance with the message. Fox twitted his rival with a saying of the previous year, that "German measures would be a millstone about the neck of the minister." Yet Pitt was not inconsistent in proposing this measure. He had told Lord Hardwicke, in September, 1755, that "he thought that regard ought to be had to Hanover, if it should be attacked on our account." † Lord Mahon has very justly defended Pitt against the sneer of Fox. "The French were preparing to invade the electorate, not from any injury, real or pretended, which the electorate had done them, but notoriously and avowedly as a side-blow against George II.—as a retaliation for the measures which his majesty had adopted in British America." ‡ Hanover was about to be attacked on our account. Walpole, with reference to the Prussian subsidy, bitterly remarks, "One cannot say which was most ridiculous—the richest prince in Europe [Frederick] begging alms for his own country, or the great foe of that country [George] becoming its mendicant almoner." § Frederick of Prussia commissioned the British envoy to express his thanks to Mr. Pitt for his speech of the 18th of February; and to inform him that he regarded the resolutions of parliament as the strongest assurances that can be given of the favorable and friendly disposition of the British nation toward him. Pitt, in his reply, expressed his "sentiments of veneration and zeal for a prince, who stands the unshaken bulwark of Europe, against the most powerful and malignant confederacy that ever yet has threatened the independence of mankind." ‖

Among the difficult questions which the recently-formed administration had to deal with, was that of the fate of Admiral Byng. A court-martial upon the unfortunate officer commenced at Portsmouth on the 28th of December. In every town and village through which the admiral was conveyed from Greenwich, escorted by horse-guards, he was insulted by the populace. The trial lasted till nearly the end of January. Before the close of the proceedings the court-martial had submitted a question to the admiralty—whether they were at liberty to mitigate the 12th Article of War, which was in these words: "Every person in the fleet who, through cowardice, negligence, or disaffection, shall, in time of action, withdraw or keep back, or not come into the fight or engagement, or shall not do his utmost to take or destroy every ship which it shall be his duty to engage, and to assist and relieve all and every of his majesty's ships, or those of his allies, which it shall be his duty to assist and relieve, every such person so offending, and being convicted thereof by the sentence of a court-martial, shall suffer death." The admiralty returned for answer that the court could not modify the Article of War. The unanimous verdict was that Admiral Byng had not come under that article by treachery or disaffection; but that he had not done his utmost to relieve the Castle of St. Philip, or to defeat the French fleet; and he was therefore adjudged to be shot to death. But the court also agreed to recommend the admiral to the mercy of the crown. Byng, rejoiced at being acquitted of cowardice, heard his sentence with composure. It was perhaps difficult for the crown to exercise its prerogative of mercy, amid the popular clamor for the execution of the sentence. "Pitt and Lord Temple," says Waldegrave, were desirous to save Byng; "but to avoid the odium of protecting a man who had been hanged in effigy in every town in England, they wanted the king to pardon him without their seeming to interfere." The king, he adds, "not choosing to be their dupe, obliged them to pull off the mask, and the sentence against the admiral was not carried into execution till, by their behavior in parliament, they had given public proof of their partiality." It is a singular commendation of the king, that he wished to damage his ministers by exhibiting them opposed to a popular cry. They had the House of Commons with them, in their desire for mercy. Pitt told this to his sovereign. "Sir," said George, "you have taught me to look for the sense of my subjects in another place than the House of Commons." Every effort to save Byng was made in vain. His execution was delayed, while a bill passed the Commons to absolve the members of the court-martial from their oath of secrecy, as it was alleged that they had something of importance to say with regard to their sentence. The bill was sent to the upper house. But the law lords, Hardwicke and Mansfield, having examined all the members of the court-martial upon oath, and finding that they could not declare their knowledge of anything which had passed previous to the sentence which would show it to be unjust, or of any undue practice or motive to influence the sentence, the bill was rejected. The 14th of March was fixed for the execution of Admiral Byng. He was shot on the quarter-deck of the Monarque, in which he had been confined; and to the last he displayed a calmness and resolution which were sufficient of themselves to exonerate him from the charge that, in his neglect of his duty, he had acted from a want of that courage which is the most essential, as it is the commonest attribute of every sailor and every soldier, whatever rank he may hold in the service of his country.

At the beginning of April, 1757, Pitt, Temple, and Legge were suddenly dismissed from their high offices. The nation could not understand this. One feeling, however, prevailed—that these ministers had labored to benefit the nation, and that pitiful court intrigues had been too powerful for them. Smollett, whose "Continuation" of his history was nearly contemporaneous, speaks very vaguely of "the old junto," who had "found the new associates very unfit for their purposes." The "Memoirs of the Earl of Waldegrave," which were not published till 1821, throw light upon the proceedings of the royal closet. In February this nobleman saw the king, who expressed his dislike to Pitt and Temple in very strong terms. The secretary, his majesty said, made him long speeches, which might be very fine, but were above his comprehension. Temple was pert, sometimes insolent, and when he meant to be civil was troublesome. "Go to Newcastle," said George; "tell him I do not look upon myself as a king while I am in the hands of these scoundrels; that I am determined to get rid of them at any rate; that I expect his assistance, and that he may depend on my favor and protection." Newcastle was quite ready to second the king's wishes; but he thought it more prudent to get the supplies first, and obtain an acquittal of himself and his colleagues of 1756, under the inquiry pending in parliament.* The Duke of Cumberland, Waldegrave says, pressed the king very strongly that Pitt and Temple should be turned out without further deliberation; and that a new administration should be formed before he went to Hanover to take the command of the electoral forces. To depend on Pitt for supplies; to have the popularity of Pitt ravish half his laurels, if fortune should once smile upon him—were apprehensions, as Walpole alleges, which made the duke urge his royal father to take such a perilous step. When the dismissal of the ministers was known, without any official delinquency or public misfortune being made a charge against them, the voice of the nation was expressed in the most unequivocal manner. Pitt and Legge received the freedom of London from the common council, presented in gold boxes. A dozen corporations of great cities followed the example. "It rained gold boxes," says Walpole. Pitt kept very quiet. He took no decided part in the inquiry about Minorca, which resulted, not in a vote of approbation or a vote of censure, but in a long recapitulation of the circumstances, ending in declaring that no more ships and no more troops could have been sent on that service. Twelve weeks were now spent in negotiations for the formation of a government. Newcastle was sent for. The duke, dreading Pitt's popularity, wished to coalesce with him. Pitt would not accept office without the entire direction of the war. Newcastle then told the king, under a solemn promise, that he would have nothing to do with so intractable a man. The old scheme of Newcastle and "his footmen," as the king termed the duke's ministerial dependants, was then resorted to. That would not answer; and Newcastle and Pitt were brought together again, by the mediation of Lord Chesterfield and Lord Bute. The king was enraged that Pitt had once more been applied to, under the violation of Newcastle's pledge. George then tried his own hand at making a ministry, and proposed to associate his personal friend, Lord Waldegrave, with Mr. Fox. Lord Holderness, one of the secretaries of state, and the remaining powerful body of the Newcastle "footmen"—powerful in their votes, if not in their abilities—threatened to resign. There was no resource. Pitt saw that if his magnificent boast, "I am sure that I can save this country, and that nobody else can"—if that grand ambition was to be realized—he must not trust alone to oratory or popularity; he must command parliamentary support. Newcastle could bring that capital into a political partnership. The king had no choice. He empowered Lord Hardwicke to negotiate with Newcastle and Pitt. The eloquent commoner again became secretary of state upon his own terms. The influential duke returned to the head of the treasury, without any real power in the direction of the great affairs of the nation, at a memorable crisis in its fate. On the 29th of June commenced what is emphatically termed "Mr. Pitt's administration." It mattered not to contemporaries or to posterity who was first lord of the treasury, or who presided over the admiralty, or who was commander-in-chief. It was "Mr. Pitt's administration."

From the midsummer of 1756 to the midsummer of 1757, while England was lying under the dread of foreign invasion; calling for vengeance on those who had lost Minorca; distracted by political rivalries—events were taking place in the most distant settlement of the East India Company, of which the nation had no instant cognizance, but which were as important to its future destiny as the changes to be produced by the altered character of its government. There first came, slowly travelling for months from the Ganges to the Thames, the news of a terrible atrocity of Oriental despotism which filled every heart with grief and indignation. Six months later the report came of a swift retribution, inflicted by the hero of Arcot; and six months after that, the great intelligence arrived, that a victory had been won—the victory of Plassey, which raised the British merchant settlers of India into the condition of conquerors and dictators, and laid the foundation of an empire which can scarcely be contemplated by us at this day without a mixed feeling of awe and of pride. The fearful tragedy known as that of the Black Hole of Calcutta took place on the 20th of June, 1756, after the city had been taken by the Subahdar of Bengal. Calcutta was retaken by Clive on the 2d of January, 1757. The battle of Plassey was won by Clive on the 23d of June of the same year. We must briefly relate these consecutive events.

The rulers of Bengal, Orissa, and Bahar, called subahdars, or nabobs, professed to hold allegiance to the Great Mogul, but really exercised all the powers of sovereignty. They dwelt at their capital city of Moorshedabad. In April, 1756, Surajah Dowlah, a cruel, debauched, and ignorant boy of nineteen, succeeded his grandfather as the lord of these vast provinces. He coveted the wealth which he imagined was accumulated in the British factory of Calcutta; and he marched from Moorshedabad to Fort William with a great army. The governor, and the English captain in command, escaped in terror, and left the defence of the factory to the servants of the company. The Subahdar having bombarded the fort for two days, further resistance was unavailing. Mr. Holwell, a civil officer of the company, who had been chosen to act as a commander during the two days of their defence, was called before the despot. He was dissatisfied to have found only fifty thousand rupees as his prize; but he assured Mr. Holwell that the lives of himself and of his fellow-prisoners should be spared. There were a hundred and forty-five men, and one woman, of this devoted company. They were to be secured for the night in the dungeon of the fort. Into that den, eighteen feet by fourteen, with two small windows, were these hundred and forty-six adults forced by the ferocious guard that the tyrant had set over them; and the door was closed. Mr. Holwell spoke from the window to an old officer, who appeared to have some human pity, promising a reward of a thousand rupees if a portion of the prisoners by his influence could be removed to another room. The officer went to make his humane attempt. He returned to say that the nabob was asleep, and could not be disturbed. Of that night of horror, the relation given by Mr. Holwell is one of the most powerful narratives of the extremity of suffering which was ever penned.* The expedient of the prisoners to obtain more room and air, some sitting down, never to rise again, through their companions falling upon them; the calling out to the guard to fire and relieve them from their misery; the raging thirst; the delirium; the stupefaction; the many dead trampled upon by the few living—these are horrors without a parallel in history or fiction. An order for the release of the prisoners came from the Subahdar at six o'clock in the morning. One hundred and twenty-three had been released by death. The English lady survived, to endure the harder fate of being consigned to the harem of the Subahdar. Surajah Dowlah called for Mr. Holwell. Unable to stand, he was borne before the despot, who exhibited no remorse for the acts of his murderous guards. All he talked of was buried treasure. He sent Mr. Holwell and two of the chiefs of the factory to his capital as prisoners; the others were set at liberty. Fort William was occupied by a Mohammedan garrison of three thousand men; and the victor returned to Moorshedabad, and decreed that, in honor of his triumph, Calcutta should be called by the name which signified the Port of God.

Colonel Clive, upon his return to India, had co-operated with Admiral Watson, who was in command of a British squadron off Bombay, to effect the destruction of a formidable body of pirates, who issued from their fortified headland of Gheriah, to the terror of every merchant-vessel on the Indian Ocean. This stronghold was taken without much effort. Clive returned to his command as governor of Fort St. David, in June. It was not till August that the news of the terrible occurrences at Calcutta reached Madras. Admiral Watson was at anchor in the roads. Clive was sent for by the presidency, and the command of an expedition was offered to him. There was a struggle about the claims of a senior officer, who thought that his rank, whatever was his inexperience of Indian warfare, ought to outweigh the deference paid to a young man who had captured and defended Arcot, and won the great victory of Arnee. The presidency were firm; and so was the jealous Colonel Adlercron. The council at Madras gave the command to Clive. The colonel, who had the control of the king's stores, refused him the royal artillery. With nine hundred Europeans—which number included the 39th regiment—that regiment which, after many glorious campaigns, proudly bears on its colors the suggestive inscription, "Primus in Indis"—the armament set sail. The winds were contrary. Two months elapsed before they entered the Hooghly. Calcutta was taken on the 2d of January, with little trouble. At the head of forty thousand men, Surajah Dowlah marched from Moorshedabad and encamped near Fort William. Clive went forth to a night attack upon the camp, but retired after some loss, having been embarrassed by a thick fog. Yet the Subahdar, terrified by this exhibition of prowess, sought to conclude a peace with the English, and yielded to every condition that was proposed for the future security of Calcutta. There was no satisfaction for the murders of the 20th of June. Clive even consented to a treaty of alliance with this miscreant. The honest admiral refused to sign this agreement. The Calcutta merchants had pressed it upon Clive, as they thought the alliance would enable them to get rid of the rival French station at Chandernagore. The Subahdar gave a doubtful answer to their proposal to attack this settlement, which Clive interpreted as an assent. The French were overpowered, and surrendered their fort. Surajah Dowlah was now indignant against his recent allies, and sought the friendship of the French officers. Clive, called by the natives "the daring in war," was also the most adroit, and—for the truth cannot be disguised—the most unscrupulous in policy. The English resident at the court of Moorshedabad, under Clive's instructions, encouraged a conspiracy to depose the Subahdar, and to raise his general, Meer Jaffier, to the supreme power. A Hindoo of great wealth and influence, Omichund, engaged in this conspiracy. After it had proceeded so far as to become the subject of a treaty between a select committee at Calcutta and Meer Jaffier, Omichund demanded that a condition should be inserted in that treaty, to pay him thirty lacs of rupees as a reward for his service. The merchants at Calcutta desired the largest share of any donation from Meer Jaffier, as a consideration for themselves, and were by no means willing that three hundred thousand pounds should go to a crafty Hindoo. Clive suggested an expedient to secure Omichund's fidelity, and yet not to comply with his demands—to have two treaties drawn; a real one on red paper, a fictitious one on white. The white treaty was to be shown to Omichund, and he was to see with his own eyes that he had been properly cared for. Clive and the committee signed this, as well as the red treaty which was to go to Meer Jaffier. Admiral Watson refused to sign the treacherous document. On the 19th of May, 1773, Clive stood up in his place in the House of Commons, to defend himself upon this charge against him, among other accusations. He boldly acknowledged that the stratagem of the two treaties was his invention—that Admiral Watson did not sign it; but that he should have thought himself authorized to sign for him in consequence of a conversation; that the person who did sign thought he had sufficient authority for so doing. "He [Clive] forged Admiral Watson's name," says Lord Macaulay. Clive thus defended his conduct: "The treaty was immediately sent to Omichund, who did not suspect the stratagem. The event took place, and success attended it. The house, I am fully persuaded, will agree with me, that when the very existence of the company was at stake, and the lives of these people [the conspirators] so precariously situated, and so certain to be destroyed, it was a matter of true policy and justice to deceive such a villain."* The courage, the perseverance, the unconquerable energy of Clive, have furnished examples to many in India who have emulated his true glory. Thank God, the innate integrity of the British character has, for the most part, preserved us from such exhibitions of "true policy and justice."

The English resident, Mr. Watts, left Moorshedabad. Clive wrote a letter of defiance to Surajah Dowlah, and marched toward his capital. The Subahdar had come forth from his city, as populous as the London of a century ago, to annihilate the paltry army of a thousand English, and their two thousand sepoys disciplined by English officers, who dared to encounter his sixty thousand. He reached the village of Plassey with all the panoply of Oriental warfare. His artillery alone appeared sufficient to sweep away those who brought only eight field-pieces and two howitzers to meet his fifty heavy guns. Each gun was drawn by forty yoke of oxen; and a trained elephant was behind each gun to urge it over rough ground or up steep ascents. Meer Jaffier had not performed his promise to join the English with a division of the Subahdar's army. It was a time of terrible anxiety with the English commander. Should he venture to give battle without the aid of a native force? He submitted his doubt to a council of war. Twelve officers, himself among the number, voted for delay. Seven voted for instant action. Clive reviewed the arguments on each side, and finally cast away his doubts. He determined to fight, without which departure from the opinion of the majority, he afterward said, the English would never have been masters of Bengal. On the 22d of June his little army marched fifteen miles, passed the Hooghly, and at one o'clock of the morning of the 23d rested under the mango-trees of Plassey. As the day broke, the vast legions of the Subahdar—fifteen thousand cavalry, forty-five thousand infantry—some armed with muskets, some with bows and arrows, began to surround the mango-grove and the hunting-lodge where Clive had watched through the night. There was a cannonade for several hours. The great guns of Surajah Dowlah did little execution. The small field-pieces of Clive were well served. One of the chief Mohammedan leaders having fallen, disorder ensued, and the Subahdar was advised to retreat. He himself fled upon a swift camel to Moorshedabad. When the British forces began to pursue, the victory became complete. Meer Jaffier joined the conquerors the next day. Surajah Dowlah did not consider himself safe in his capital, and he preferred to seek the protection of a French detachment at Patna. He escaped from his palace disguised; ascended the Ganges in a small boat; and fancied himself secure. A peasant whose ears he had cut off recognized his oppressor, and with some soldiers brought him back to Moorshedabad. In his presence-chamber now sat Meer Jaffier, to whose knees the wretched youth crawled for mercy. That night Surajah Dowlah was murdered in his prison by the orders of Meer Jaffier's son, a boy as bloodthirsty as himself. At the installation of Meer Jaffier as Subahdar of Bengal, Clive conducted him to the seat of honor. His gratitude was not withheld from those who had raised him to his power. Under the treaty made before the battle of Plassey large concessions were to be made to the Presidency of Calcutta; and money amounting to two millions and three quarters sterling was now granted as a payment to the fleet, the troops, and the committee, by whose agency this revolution was effected. Clive was content with something under three hundred thousand pounds. He subsequently declared in the House of Commons that when he walked through the treasury at Moorshedabad, and saw gold and silver and jewels piled up to the right and the left, he might have helped himself to what he pleased. He added, with an oath, "at this moment do I stand astonished at my own moderation." When Omichund was denied his expected gratuity, and was told of the disgraceful fraud that had been practised upon him, he fainted, and was carried home, to exhibit during the small remainder of his days an impaired intellect, and to die a broken-hearted idiot.

A statue of Clive has recently been erected in Whitehall. It is highly characteristic of a man of strong will and undaunted courage —"not a man to do anything by halves." Macaulay uses this phrase in speaking of Clive's participation in the fraud and forgery by which Omichund was deceived. But this determination to do nothing by halves, though it betrayed Clive into a dishonorable action, made him a "heaven-born general," as Pitt called him. His wondrous energy led him, after he had placed Meer Jaffier on the throne of Bengal, never to rest until the ascendency of the English company in that province was supreme, undisturbed by French or Dutch rivalry. Exactly a year after the battle of Plassey a commission arrived at Bengal from London, remodelling the presidency, and not including Clive in the nomination of officers. The news of the great victory had not reached the India House when the court of directors thus threw a slight upon the only man who could preserve their ascendency. But the members of the presidency at Bengal had the good sense to request Clive to take the government upon himself. By his exertions, and through his example, the French were gradually driven from every stronghold; and in six months after the accession of George III. not a vestige of the supremacy which Dupleix and Bussy and Lally had won for them remained in the peninsula.

The appointments of several of Mr. Pitt's political friends to high offices, in the final arrangement of the administration, excited no surprise. Earl Temple became lord privy seal, and Mr. Legge chancellor of the exchequer. But the reappointment of Lord Anson to the admiralty—unpopular as he was, abused as he had been by those who were now to be his associates—was regarded as "a most surprising phenomenon." * He had been himself a wretched administrator—"an incapable object," as Walpole terms him. It is stated that Pitt took effectual means to neutralize Anson's incapacity. He stipulated with the king that the correspondence with naval commanders should be in his own hands, and that the board of admiralty should sign the dispatches without reading them. † Doubtful as this statement may appear, it is unquestionable that Pitt, from the hour of his triumphant return to that post which involved the whole conduct of foreign affairs and of the war, determined that no coadjutor should interfere with his plans. The prospect before him was not very brilliant. The nation was committed to its alliance with Frederick II.; and at the very moment when the new ministry had entered upon their duties came the news of a great disaster—"the reversal of all the King of Prussia's triumphs." ‡ Frederick had commenced his second campaign at the end of April. Even in the days of Marlborough Europe had not seen such a vast array of mighty armies moving in every direction—Austrians, troops of the Empire, French, Swedes—four hundred and thirty thousand men gathering together to crush the prince of a small German state, who had only a hundred and fifty thousand men in the field to encounter this overwhelming allied force. The Russians in the campaign of 1757 were merely committing ravages in the provinces beyond the Vistula. The English and Hanoverian army, commanded by the Duke of Cumberland, was relied upon to prevent the French attacking Prussia. There were vast odds against the success of Frederick, according to ordinary calculations. The great writer and statesman, Edmund Burke, who at this time influenced public opinion, not from his place in parliament but from Messrs. Dodsley's shop in Pall Mall, thus describes the one resource that enabled Frederick "to sustain the violence of so many shocks"—his vast powers of mind: "His astonishing economy, the incomparable order of his finances, the discipline of his armies beyond all praise, a sagacity that foresaw everything, a constancy that no labor could subdue, a courage that no danger could dismay, an intuitive glance that catches the decisive moment—all these seemed to form a sort of balance to the vast weight against him, turned the wishes of his friends into hopes, and made them depend upon resources that are not within the power of calculation." § At the opening of this campaign Frederick saw that he should first have to encounter Austria. He marched from Saxony into Bohemia by four different mountain passes, purposing to unite his detachments in the environs of Prague. Before this city the Austrian marshal, Browne, was encamped, in a position almost impregnable. Frederick waited for his gallant companion-in-arms, Marshal Schwerin, to join him; and then, on the 6th of May, he fought one of the most sanguinary battles on record. The conflict lasted eleven hours, the Prussians losing eighteen thousand men and the Austrians twenty-four thousand. The brave old marshal fell, leading his regiment, which had given way, to the thick of the battle, waving the national standard of the black eagle which he had snatched from an ensign. The Austrian commander, Marshal Browne, was also mortally wounded. The king displayed that personal intrepidity which never failed him after his first battle of Molwitz. His victory was complete. Prague was then bombarded, and for three weeks did its unfortunate inhabitants endure the horrors of war, with more than its usual calamities. Twelve thousand famished victims, whose houses had been destroyed, were turned out of the gates of Prague, that more food might be left to its defenders. They were driven back again by the unpitying Prussians. The city resolutely held out. A great division of the Austrian army under Marshal Daun was advancing for its relief. On the 17th of June Frederick fought the battle of Kolin, with an inadequate force, and he was defeated with the loss of thirteen thousand men. Six times did he lead his cavalry to the charge against the Austrian position. He was advancing the seventh time, with only forty men, when an English officer said to him, "Is your majesty going to storm the battery by yourself?" He at last ordered the retreat; and, riding off alone, he was found seated by the side of a well, drawing figures in the sand with his stick. The siege of Prague was raised, and the Prussians hastily marched out of Bohemia.

Under this great reverse of their one ally the English government turned its attention to naval enterprises. Something, indeed, might be expected from the army under the Duke of Cumberland; and a great success on the coast of France would raise the spirits of the people, who were lamenting over the fatal day of Kolin. Such an enterprise would operate as an important diversion of the French from the war in Germany. An expedition was sent out, in September, under the command of Sir Edward Hawke and Sir John Mordaunt. Sixteen ships of the line and ten regiments of foot were destined for an attack on the great arsenal of Rochefort. The French coast was without many troops for its defence. Louis XV., when he heard of the arrival of an English armament at the mouth of the Charente, was fully convinced that Rochefort would fall. The fortified island of Aix was attacked by Captain Howe, who anchored his ship within fifty yards of the fort, and after an hour silenced the French batteries. General Conway took possession of the citadel.* After a week spent in councils of war, it was agreed that the expedition should return home. Mordaunt and Hawke were at issue. The general required to be assured by the admiral that if any mishap occurred in the attack upon Rochefort, such arrangements could be made as would allow the troops to re-embark. Hawke said that must depend upon wind and weather. We have a letter of General Conway, in which he writes to his brother about "resolutions and irresolutions." . . . "I am sorry to say that I think, on the whole, we make a pitiful figure in not attempting anything. . . . For the only time of my life I dread to come back to England."† Colonel Wolfe, when these miserable discussions were going on between the commanders, said that if they would give him three ships and five hundred men he would take Rochefort. Pitt, when he wanted such a soldier, did not forget Wolfe. Mordaunt was acquitted by a court-martial. Other evil tidings had travelled to England thick and fast. The news had come that the Duke de Richelieu had compelled the Duke of Cumberland, after a series of retreats, to leave Hanover to the mercy of the French; and, being pursued to Stade, he had agreed to a capitulation, known as the Convention of Closter-Seven, under which all his Hessians and Brunswickers were to be disbanded, and all his Hanoverians were to be sent into various cantonments. The duke was insulted by his father when he came home, and resigned his post as commander-in-chief. George had turned his back upon his favorite son when they first met, and said aloud, "He has ruined me and disgraced himself." The indignation of the English people was extreme. They associated in their minds the retreat from Rochefort and the surrender at Stade as the result of some treachery or court intrigue. "The people will not be persuaded that this pacific disposition [at Rochefort] was not a preliminary for the convention of Stade."‡ The public discontent was at its height when the intelligence arrived that Lord Loudoun, having the command of a force of twelve thousand men, furnished by large reinforcements from home, had shrunk from attacking Louisbourg, and that Admiral Halbourne, the naval commander, hesitated about imperilling his squadron of eighteen ships of the line in an attack upon the French squadron of nineteen ships of the line. When this account came Horace Walpole might well write, "It is time for England to slip her cables and float away into some unknown ocean."§ To crown the misfortunes of the first three months of Pitt's administration, there were serious disturbances in various parts of the country about the Militia Act, which came into operation at that time. The people were persuaded that, when enrolled, they were liable to be drafted into the king's forces and be sent abroad. It was in vain to urge the precise words of the statute. Yeomen, farmers, and laborers were obstinately incredulous; and in some places the timid magistrates were obliged to postpone their meetings for enrolling men, to prevent the violence which the ignorant multitudes threatened. Such were the blessings produced by the want of publicity for parliamentary proceedings, and by the utter deficiency of ability in the conductors of provincial newspapers to treat any social question as a matter for elucidation.* Their local "Accidents and Offences," the appointment of the parish beadle, or the marriage of the squire's daughter, constituted their notion of public instruction.

At the end of October Pitt wrote to Grenville, "The King of Prussia keeps the field, and his cause is still alive. An event or two may yet change the gloomy prospect. Immense expense I see is unavoidable, and the heavier load of national dishonor threatens to sink us with double weight of misfortune."† An event did come which did change the gloomy prospect. On the 15th of November Pitt wrote to Grenville, "The King of Prussia has gained a complete victory over the Prince de Soubise, near Weisenfels in Saxony."‡ Wondrous change of fortune, produced by the unshaken constancy of one man surrounded by dangers on every side. The Russians were desolating Frederick's eastern provinces. Silesia was filled with Austrians. He was under the ban of the empire, every German state being forbidden to give him aid. A letter published in the English papers at the end of August says, "Many persons who saw the King of Prussia, when he passed lately through Leipsic, cannot express how much he is altered. They say he is so much worn away that they scarce knew him."§ The final catastrophe—a ruin as complete as that of Charles the Twelfth at Pultowa—seemed fast approaching. The Prince de Soubise, with an army of forty thousand French and twenty thousand troops of the Empire, was encamped near Mucheln. Frederick, with twenty-two thousand of his Prussians, had marched to encounter this unequal force. After some changes of position on either side, on the 5th of November Soubise was suddenly attacked, when he thought that the king was retreating. Never was victory more complete than in this short battle of Rosbach. It was one universal rout. The French and the Imperial troops vied with each other in the swiftness of their flight. They left seven thousand prisoners, guns, colors, baggage—all that could manifest the extent of their humiliation. Before the battle Soubise had sent a dispatch to Louis to announce that he might be expected soon to arrive in Paris with the King of Prussia as his captive. The French officers looked upon the little Prussian army, and laughed at the presumption of Monsieur le Marquis de Brandenbourg. Frederick indulged himself, as was his custom whether victorious or defeated, by writing some very indifferent occasional verses to bid farewell to the runaway French. He then turned to real business. He would recover Silesia before the approaching winter should prevent any military operations. By forced marches he reached the neighborhood of Breslau. Here Prince Charles of Lorraine was at the head of an army of Austrians, exceeding sixty thousand men. They met at the village of Leuthen, near the woods of Lissa, on the 5th of December; and thus this greatest of Frederick's battles is known by either name. This was no sudden rout like that of Rosbach. The Austrians fought bravely, but the genius of the Prussian leader gave him a mighty victory, which Napoleon said was of itself sufficient to place Frederick in the rank of the greatest generals. When this wonderful campaign shall come to be described by a historian equal to the theme, we may perhaps understand the meaning of the words, "There were great kings before Napoleon." The writer to whom this task is allotted has briefly told us what he thinks of Rosbach and Leuthen: "Austerlitz and Wagram shot away more gunpowder—gunpowder probably in the proportion of ten to one, or a hundred to one; but neither of them was tenth part such a beating to your enemy as that of Rosbach, brought about by strategic art, human ingenuity and intrepidity, and the loss of four hundred and seventy-eight men. Leuthen too, the battle of Leuthen (though so few English readers ever heard of it) may very well hold up its head beside any victory gained by Napoleon or another. For the odds were not far from three to one; the soldiers were of not far from equal quality; and only the general was consummately superior, and the defeat a destruction." * The English people of 1757 did know something of Rosbach and of Leuthen. They forgot their own national misfortunes and disgraces in the triumphs of their great ally, the King of Prussia. "All England has kept his birthday," writes Walpole. "The people, I believe, begin to think that Prussia is some part of old England."

The defeat of the French at Rosbach led the King of England to refuse to ratify the Convention of Closter-Seven. "Some trifling infractions of the neutrality on the part of the French," according to Walpole, "were pretended to cover this notorious breach of faith." † Others hold that these "trifling infractions of the neutrality" consisted in the grossest cruelties and extortions exercised by the French on the electorate. Prince Ferdinand of Brunswick, a distinguished officer in the Prussian army, was recommended by Frederick to assume the command of the Hanoverian troops, who were thus freed to take part in the campaign of 1758. The session of the English parliament was opened on the 1st of December. The king recommended that his "good brother and ally," the King of Prussia, "should receive all the support which his magnanimity deserved." A subsidy of 670,000*l.* was voted, with only one dissentient voice. His majesty by a message announced that the army formed in his electoral dominions was "to be put again into motion" to act in concert with the King of Prussia; and a present supply for the payment of that army was asked, in consideration of "the exhausted and ruined state of the electorate." One hundred thousand pounds was immediately voted. The votes for supplies amounted to ten millions. Pitt rarely went to the House of Commons, being laid up with the gout; but, whether confined to his chair or his bed, he issued his orders for the manning of fleets or the movement of armies, in every quarter of the globe. Some of his plans were successful; others were failures. He had not yet trodden down the system under which family connections and parliamentary influences were the paramount considerations in the choice of generals and admirals to command expeditions. Early in the session Pitt had hurled his thunderbolts against Lord Loudoun, who, he said, might have recovered affairs in America if he had not loitered from the 9th of July to the 5th of August, inquiring whether or no the French force was superior. "Our ill success has hurt my quiet and tainted my health." He had again to bear a repetition of ineffectual proceedings on the French coast, imputed by some to his want of knowledge of the defences of the place to be attacked—St. Maloes. An armament sailed on the 1st of June. The fleet was commanded by Lord Anson, the troops by the Duke of Marlborough. At St. Maloes a landing was effected without opposition. A number of small vessels were burned, and then the soldiers re-embarked. "The French learned," writes Walpole, "that they were not to be conquered by every Duke of Marlborough." ‡ The success, such as it was, was called by Mr. Fox "breaking windows with guineas." On the 8th of August Cherbourg was taken without opposition; its forts and basin were destroyed, with its hundred and seventy iron guns. Its brass guns were brought to the Tower of London. From Cherbourg the same expedition proceeded to make another attempt upon St. Maloes. The place was found too strong for assault; and the English troops, who were in a wretched state of discipline, disgraced themselves by their excesses as they wandered about in the district. A large French force was coming down upon them. All was hurry to rejoin the ships in the Bay of St. Cas; but the rear-guard of fifteen hundred men was cut off, and a thousand were killed or made prisoners. There needed some decided success to counteract the influence of these misfortunes. The French were dispossessed of their settlements on the African coast. An expedition sent against Fort Louis, on the Senegal River—a project suggested to Pitt by Thomas Camming, a commercial Quaker, who hoped that the French might be deprived of their monopoly of the gum trade without shedding a drop of blood. He went with the expedition, and Fort Louis was taken without slaughter. Goree surrendered to a stronger armament, but not without many broadsides from our ships, which showed Pitt's "good and worthy Friend," as the minister addressed him, that gentle warfare was not a possible thing. There were greater conquests in America. Pitt had not only publicly censured the Earl of Loudoun; he did what was more effectual—he recalled him. He now chose his commanders, not by seniority, but by their reputation for ability. General Amherst was dispatched to take the command of the troops, with Wolfe as his second in seniority, with the rank of brigadier-general. Admiral Boscawen was to command the fleet. There were now an admiral and a general who would co-operate. On the 2d of June a fleet of a hundred and fifty ships, bearing twelve thousand troops, appeared off Louisbourg. The soldiers were conveyed to the shore in boats, and Wolfe was the first to jump into the surf, and lead his men to the attack of the French, who were drawn up to oppose their landing. The defences were very strong, and it was nearly the end of July before Louisbourg capitulated, with nearly six thousand prisoners of war. Cape Breton once more formed a part of our dominions. The French fleet in the harbor was utterly destroyed. Throughout England there was universal exultation. This great success was regarded as a proof that the nation was beginning to reap the fruit of vigorous councils. This was the turning-point in Mr. Pitt's administration. There came disasters. This boldest of war ministers had a vast scheme of operations, each portion of which had reference to some ultimate object. He was already looking to the conquest of Quebec, and proposed to General Abercrombie to reduce the French forts on the borders of Lake George and Lake Champlain. An attack upon Ticonderoga, a strong fort, was repulsed by the Marquis de Montcalm, an experienced French general, with a loss to the British regiments and the American militia of two thousand killed and wounded. In a previous skirmish Lord Howe, who appears to have been "what every man in arms should wish to be," fell at the head of his regiment. The American campaign was concluded by the surrender to the British of Fort Duquesne, the original cause of the war. Its name was changed to Pittsburg.

In this year, while Prince Ferdinand kept the French in check, Frederick, on the 25th of August, fought the great battle of Zorndorf, near Frankfort-on-the-Oder, in which he defeated the Russians with a fearful slaughter. To show the short step from the sublime to the ridiculous, Walpole writes: "Well! the King of Prussia is found again—where do you think? only in Poland, up to the chin in Russians. Was ever such a man! He was riding home from Olmutz; they ran and told him of an army of Muscovites, as you would of a covey of partridges; he galloped thither and shot them." * The smart letter-writer then speaks of the extreme popularity in England of the great Fritz: "The lowest of the people are perfectly acquainted with him; as I was walking by the river the other night, a bargeman asked me for something to drink the King of Prussia's health." A large portion of the English public—a portion somewhat above the bargemen on the Thames and the ale-house keepers who set up the head of "the Protestant hero" as their sign—looked with intense interest upon the man who had fought six pitched battles in one year, and, undepressed by failure as he was calm under success, was still fighting for his little kingdom against a host of enemies. They looked with wonder upon the versatility and unconquerable gayety of this most extraordinary of kings who gave Europe a poem when he had no materials for a gazette. His poems, translated well or indifferently, unequal as their originals, found their way into popular miscellanies. When he, in his Epistle to Voltaire, talked of "the insipid farce of tedious state," "the fickle multitude's caress," "the thorny pomp of scepter'd care," critics might believe that there was the affectation of philosophy in all this; but the general sympathy would acknowledge that Frederick did not claim more for himself than he was entitled to when he said that he must be,

August. In October he was surprised by the Austrians in his camp, in a combined operation of General Daun and General Laudohn. As the church-clock of Hochkirchen struck five, on a cold and foggy morning of October, Frederick was awakened with the news that his batteries were stormed, and that a hostile army was in the centre of his camp. His presence of mind saved his troops from complete destruction, but after fighting five hours he was obliged to abandon his tents, his baggage, and his artillery. He halted about half a league from the field of battle, but he had brought off his men in such good order that the Austrians did not dare again to attack him. The great loss on that day was Marshal Keith.

The parliament met on the 23d of November. "It is all harmony," says Walpole, "and thinks of nothing but giving away twelve more millions." The lavishness of Pitt has been objected against him, but it must be borne in mind that there can be no greater waste than results from the false economy of what Wellington called "a little war." The official mode of looking at a war expenditure is thus described, with reference to the period when Pitt entered upon his ministerial career: "The heavy debt of the nation served as an excuse to those who understood nothing but little temporary expedients to preach up our impossibility of making an effectual stand. They were willing to trust that France would be so good as to ruin us by inches." * But Pitt took other means to rescue the nation from its ignoble lethargy and its slow decay than the common lavishness even of weak ministers. He infused his own energetic spirit into every one whom he intrusted with the execution of his plans. In choosing men for military command he passed over the ancient formalists "who had grown old on a very small portion of experience." He wanted men who would not shrink from difficulties. On the 22d of September, 1758, a letter was addressed to the minister by the youthful general who had first leaped into the surf at Louisbourg. Wolfe had returned home in ill health. He was then in his thirty-third year. He informed Mr. Pitt that he had no objection to serve in America, and particularly in the River St. Lawrence, if any operations were to be carried on there. He asked only a little time to recover the injury done to his constitution, that he might be "the better able to go through the business of the next summer." † Pitt at once promoted Wolfe to the rank of major-general, and gave him the command of the projected expedition to Quebec. Lord Mahon has related, upon private authority, a most interesting anecdote of circumstances attending the last interview between the minister and the young soldier to whom he had intrusted so heavy a responsibility. Pitt invited Wolfe to dinner, Lord Temple being the only other guest. "As the evening advanced Wolfe —heated, perhaps, by his own aspiring thoughts and the unwonted society of statesmen—broke forth into a strain of gasconade and bravado. He drew his sword, he rapped the table with it, he flourished it round the room, he talked of the mighty things which that sword was to achieve. The two ministers sat aghast at an exhibition so unusual from any man of real sense and real spirit." ‡ Was there not some other exciting cause than Wolfe's own aspiring thoughts? —some inspiration beyond the ordinary sober talk in the society of statesmen? It is well known that Pitt would harangue in other places than in parliament. He harangued George II. He harangued every one to whom he gave important instructions. It has been said that no officer went into his presence to receive his commands without coming out a bolder man. According to a joke at the court of Louis XV., he so frightened Bussy, the French envoy, by his declamation that the terrified negotiator jumped out of the window. The bravado of Wolfe might be the almost unconscious tribute of an impulsive nature to the warlike eloquence of Pitt.

The year 1759 is one of the most memorable years in the annals of Britain. On the colors of our 12th, 20th, 23d, 25th, 37th, and 51st regiments are inscribed the name of "Minden." At the great battle of Minden, on the 1st of August, Prince Ferdinand defeated the French generals the Duke de Broglie and the Mareschal de Contades, who commanded a force very superior to that of the Hanoverians and English. In the preceding April Ferdinand had been compelled to retreat before these generals, after having been defeated at Bergen. The electorate of Hanover seemed again ready to be a prey to the rapacity of the French, when another like the Duke de Richelieu might build a palace out of its spoils. But the skilful tactics of Ferdinand stood between the French and their expected conquest. Cassel, Munster, and Minden were in their possession. A small detachment of the Hanoverians and English appeared before Minden, exposed, as it appeared to the French officers, to inevitable destruction. De Broglie marched out from his strong position to surround them, when the whole allied army was seen, drawn up in order of battle. De Contades then joined him, and the two, with their cavalry, made repeated attacks upon the solid English and Hanoverian infantry. Again and again they were driven back, and at length the French generals commanded a retreat. The cavalry, under Lord George Sackville, had not been engaged. Ferdinand sent him orders to charge the French before they could rally. Sackville would not understand the messages brought to him by three aides-de-camp, two of whom were English. The opportunity was lost for the entire rout of the enemy, although the victory was complete, as far as it went. That evening the Englishman whom his countrymen were to brand as a coward appeared at Ferdinand's table. Surprise was expressed at the marvellous audacity. In the general orders issued the next morning, in which the troops and some distinguished officers received the thanks of their commander, the name of Sackville was not mentioned; and the Marquis of Granby, the second in command, was referred to as one who, if he had been at the head of the cavalry, would have made the decision of that day more complete and brilliant. Lord George begged to return home and to resign his command. He came to England, was deprived of all his offices, and, being tried by court-martial in the following year, was found guilty of disobeying Prince Ferdinand's orders, and was declared unfit to serve in any military capacity. The haughty and ambitious man, in despite of public contempt, made his way to civil employment in the next reign. But, in spite of Sackville, Minden was a British triumph. Other triumphs succeeded. The French were preparing for our invasion. Pitt sent Admiral Rodney to destroy their gunboats in the port of Havre, which service was effectually accomplished. Brest was blockaded. Admiral Boscawen on the 17th of August defeated a French fleet in the Bay of Lagos on its way from Toulon to assist in the operations in the Channel. Guadaloupe had capitulated to an English armament in May that was employed in attacks upon the French West India Islands.

The French colony of Canada, in 1759, contained forty thousand souls. Lower Canada, or Canada East, was occupied almost exclusively by the French settlers, who had been established there since 1608, on the spot now occupied by the city of Quebec. The Red Indians ranging over the vast surface of unoccupied country were, for the most part, in friendship with the French, and assisted them, as we have seen, in their inroads upon the British North American colonists. Two millions of civilized men, whether of French or of British descent, incorporated into a great people, now inhabit that fine country of Canada, and, through the sure effect of the wise measures of the imperial government, however tardy, are among the most attached of British colonists, sending their surplus population to add to the home defence of the state which they honor. The Marquis de Montcalm, in 1759, commanded the French troops in Canada —a brave and honorable man, untainted with the profligacy of the court of Louis XV. The plans of Mr. Pitt for the campaign in America were of a wide but comprehensive character. There were three armaments. Two of these had a field of operations calculated to attain partial advantages in themselves, but intended to combine in one great undertaking. In the middle of July a body of the American militia, and of Indians in amity with them, commenced the siege of Niagara, a strong fort on that river, near the Falls. Six hundred men defended the place. A large force, chiefly of Indians, approached to the relief of the garrison, and during the battle which ensued the Indian war-whoop was heard above the cataract's roar— a singular contrast to many European battles in which the thunderclap has mingled with the boom of the gun. The garrison capitulated, and the fall of Niagara was numbered among the triumphs of that year. General Amherst had succeeded to the command held by General Abercrombie, who had failed, not without incurring blame, in his attack upon the fortress of Ticonderoga in 1758. In July Amherst reduced this stronghold, the French retreating to another fort on Lake Champlain, called Crown Point. This place was also secured. But at the upper end of the lake the French had taken up a strong position. The English general had to build boats before he could attempt to dislodge them. He had been instructed, after securing the navigation on Lake Champlain, to march along the River Richelieu, and combine his operations with those of Wolfe on the St. Lawrence. Amherst embarked on Lake Champlain. He was driven back by storms; and then came the winter. Wolfe, with eight thousand men, had sailed in a fleet commanded by Admiral Saunders; and by the aid of some charts of the river which had been taken on board a French vessel, the difficult passage of the St. Lawrence was accomplished. On the 27th of July the small British army landed on the Isle of Orleans, opposite Quebec, where they found abundance to recruit them after their long voyage.

The highest hopes of the English people attended the progress of these operations in North America. The force sent out was large. There was confidence in the skill and bravery of the commanders. On the 14th of October there arrived in London a letter addressed by Wolfe to the Earl of Holderness, one of the secretaries of state, which appeared to annihilate every hope, as did a letter addressed to Mr. Pitt. On the 16th Walpole writes: "Two days ago came letters from Wolfe, despairing, as much as heroes can despair." The letter to Holderness, dated on the 9th of September, "On board the Sutherland, at anchor off Cape Rouge," is singularly interesting; written with great care, and with the solemnity of a brave man who feels that he is likely to fail in doing the state service. Quebec, he says, he could have taken, if Montcalm had shut himself up in the town; "but he has a numerous body of armed men, and the strongest country, perhaps, in the world to rest the defence of the town and colony upon." He had attacked their intrenchments on the 31st of July, but accidents prevented the success of the attempt, and the post had been so strengthened that another attempt would be too hazardous. The English fleet blocks up the river, but can give no assistance in an attack upon the Canadian army. The heat of the weather and great fatigue had thrown him into a fever, and he had begged the generals to consider what was best to be done. They recommended that a considerable corps should be conveyed into the upper river, to draw the enemy from their inaccessible situation and bring them to an action. "I agreed," he says, "to the proposal; and we are now here with about three thousand six hundred men, waiting an opportunity to attack them, when and wherever they can best be got at." The fleet of transports had carried the army, reduced to this small number, up the St. Lawrence, several miles above Quebec, where they disembarked. "So far recovered as to do business," he waited "an opportunity to attack." Genius makes its own opportunities. The Heights of Abraham form a continuation of the steep ridge of rocks on which Quebec is built—an almost natural barrier against any assaults from troops landing near the city. It was one o'clock in the morning of the 13th of September when the little band were crowded into boats, to float down the broad river with the flowing tide. In darkness and in silence they embarked. Wolfe, who had the poetical element in his composition, repeated in a low voice to his brother officers as they sat in the boat the famous poem which he had retained in his memory—Gray's "Elegy in a Country Churchyard."* They reached a little inlet about two miles above Quebec, now called "Wolfe's Cove." They landed at the foot of a cliff, with one narrow path which led up to a wide table-land. The men struggled up with the aid of boughs and stumps of trees, or clinging to projections in the rock. Foremost among those who scaled the cliff was one of the new Highland regiments. A French picket fired and fled. The height was gained. The troops formed in line, and anxiously waited for another detachment which the boats had gone back to bring. When the day broke a compact army stood, as if brought thither by magic, on the high ground at the back of Quebec. Montcalm would not believe the intelligence. He saw with his own eyes, and then led his troops forth from their intrenchments. "If I must fight, I will crush them," he said, and prepared for battle.

Wolfe had disposed his little force with admirable judgment. Montcalm was advancing with French and Canadian regiments intermingled, while his Indian allies were detached to outflank the British on their left. This left wing was commanded by Brigadier-General Townshend, while Wolfe was with the right wing, where the hottest work was expected. He had ordered his men not to fire till the enemy came within forty yards. Montcalm's troops had fired as they advanced, and Wolfe had received a shot in his wrist. He bound the wound with his handkerchief. The volley of the British stopped the advance. Wolfe headed his grenadiers to the charge, when another shot struck him in a vital part. Still he issued his orders and pressed on. A third ball hit him in the breast. He fell, and was carried to the rear. His eyes were growing dim as he looked upon the battle. He sank on the ground, when an officer near him exclaimed, "They run." The dying man raised himself on his elbow, and asked, "Who run?" "The enemy, the enemy." "I am satisfied," said Wolfe. The second in command, General Monkton, had also fallen. General Townshend completed the victory. The brave Montcalm was mortally wounded, and, being carried into the city, died the next day. Quebec capitulated on the 18th of September.* The hearts of the people were probably never more stirred than by Wolfe's gloomy dispatch of the 9th of September, followed by the intelligence of the capture of Quebec, and of the death of Wolfe, which arrived three days later. "They despaired, they triumphed, and they wept."† The popular admiration of Wolfe was not a passing sentiment. A quarter of a century afterward, when Cowper published his "Task," it was

Parliament was opened by commission on the 13th of November. Peace was talked of, but it was urged that such supplies should be given as would enable his majesty "to sustain and press, with effect, all our extensive operations against the enemy." In the course of the session fifteen millions and a half was voted for supplies—an enormous sum by comparison with the estimates of previous years of war. Pitt on the 20th moved that a public monument should be erected to the memory of General Wolfe. He moved also the thanks of the house to the generals and admirals, "whose merit," he said, "had equalled those who have beaten armadas—'May I anticipate?' cried he, 'those who will beat armadas.'"‡ At the hour at which Pitt used this remarkable expression a naval battle was being fought, which made his anticipation look like some mysterious sympathy which outran the ordinary means of intelligence—the "shadows before" which a sanguine mind sees in "coming events." Admiral Hawke was driven by the equinoctial gales from his blockade at Brest. Conflans, the French admiral, came out with twenty-one ships of the line and four frigates. Admiral Duff was off Quiberon Bay with his squadron, and Conflans hoped to attack him before Hawke could come to the rescue. But Hawke did return; and then Conflans hurried to the mouth of the Vilaine—fancying himself secure amid the rocks and shoals on that shore to which the Britons sailed to the aid of the Veneti. The danger of a sea-fight in such a perilous navigation had no terrors for Hawke. The pilot pointed out the danger. "Lay me alongside the French admiral," was Hawke's reply to the pilot's remonstrance. "You have done your duty, but now obey my orders." The fight went on till night while a tempest was raging. Signal guns of vessels in distress were heard on every side. When the morning came two British ships were found to be stranded, but their crews were saved. Four of the French fleet had been sunk, among which was the admiral's ship. Two had struck. The rest had fled up the Vilaine. This final victory put an end to all those apprehensions of a descent upon England which prevailed before Pitt had infused his spirit into commanders by land and sea. The French admiral, Thurot, was to have co-operated with Conflans in an attempt at invasion. He landed in the north of Ireland, attacked Carrickfergus, which was bravely defended by seventy-two men, and then went again to sea, having plundered the town, and carried off the mayor and three other inhabitants as his prisoners.

* Strange as this may seem in such a moment of anxiety, it was the relief from the weight of an overwhelming thought; such as Shakespeare has exhibited when he makes Cinna and Casca discuss where the coming day was to break, in the interval that preceded the resolve that Cæsar should die.

It was the determination to believe nothing impossible to a strong will, and to think no loss irretrievable, which sustained Frederick of Prussia through the reverses of 1759—the most disastrous of all his campaigns. The defeat by the Russians at Kunersdorf would have annihilated a less resolute man. But he rallied, and he fought through another year of checkered fortune, during which his own territories suffered the extremities of misery, to win the two victories of Legnitz and of Torgau.

The year 1760 was not a year of excitement to the English people. The war went on, but even the defence of the conquests of 1759 required no great exertions. Quebec was besieged, but the besiegers were compelled to retire, when an English fleet appeared in the St. Lawrence. There was little domestic agitation, except a ministerial difference with the court, which somewhat detracts from the dignity of Pitt, in his exhibition of contempt for that influence which prevented his brother-in-law, Earl Temple, from obtaining the Garter. Parliament had little more to do than vote supplies. "Success," said Pitt, "had produced unanimity, not unanimity success." A sudden event came, destined in a short time to change the whole aspect of affairs—to involve England once again in political contests more to be dreaded than the ordinary course of party warfare—more to be dreaded, because other leaders appeared than those of parliament, and the representatives of the people were not on the popular side. The reign of George II. came suddenly to a close on the 25th of October. The king had risen at his usual hour of six, had taken his cup of chocolate, and had been left alone by his attendants. A noise as of a heavy fall was heard, then a groan. The old man lay on the ground, and never spoke more. The right ventricle of his heart had burst.

It is related that, on the morning of the 25th of October, George, Prince of Wales, taking an early ride in the neighborhood of Kew, where he was residing, a messenger came to him, bearing a note from a German valet-de-chambre who was about the person of George II., which note bore a private mark, as previously agreed, that declared the king was dead. The prince, suddenly become George III., showed no surprise or emotion, dropped no word to indicate what had happened, but, saying his horse was lame, turned back to Kew, and, dismounting, thus addressed his groom: "I have said this horse is lame; I forbid you to say to the contrary." This is Walpole's relation, and this his comment: "The first moment of the new reign afforded a symptom of the prince's character, of that cool dissimulation in which he had been so well initiated by his mother, and which comprehended almost the whole of what she had taught him." * We place this gossip of the servants' hall at the commencement of our narrative. It is quoted by Lord John Russell as a trifling incident which showed the power which the young king had acquired over his countenance and manner.† It is referred to by Mr. Massey, to show that George III. "was not always scrupulous on the point of veracity." ‡ Our readers will form their own opinion of this symptom of the royal character. Princes, as well as others of the higher orders of society, have been immemorially trained not to exhibit emotion; and the artifice by which the pupil of an adroit mother desired to conceal his irregular knowledge of a great fact may be paltry enough, but yet not a manifestation of habitual unveracity. Lord Waldegrave, who had unusual opportunities for studying the character of the prince, assigns to him, in his twenty-first year, qualities which may certainly be traced in his maturer life: "His parts, though not excellent, will be found very tolerable, if ever they are properly exercised. . . . He is strictly honest, but wants that frank and open behavior which makes honesty appear amiable. . . . His religion is free from hypocrisy, but is not of the most charitable sort. . . . He has spirit, but not of the active kind; and does not want resolution, but it is mixed with too much obstinacy. . . . He has great command of his passions, and will seldom do wrong, except when he mistakes wrong for right; but as often as this shall happen it will be difficult to undeceive him, because he is unusually indolent, and has strong prejudices. . . . Whenever he is displeased his anger does not break out with heat and violence, but he becomes sullen and silent, and retires to his closet; not to compose his mind by study or contemplation, but merely to indulge the melancholy enjoyment of his own ill-humor. Even when the fit is ended, unfavorable symptoms very frequently return, which indicate that on certain occasions his royal highness has too correct a memory. . . . Though I have mentioned his good and bad qualities, without flattery and without aggravation, allowances should still be made, on account of his youth and his bad education." * With regard to the education of the prince, his mother told Doddington that it "had given her much pain. His book-learning she was no judge of, though she supposed it small or useless; but she hoped he might have been instructed in the general understanding of things." Speaking of Mr. Stone, the sub-governor, the princess dowager said, "she once desired him to inform the prince about the constitution; but he declined it, to avoid giving jealousy to the Bishop of Norwich." † The bishop had the title of preceptor. These instructors, according to Lord Waldegrave, though men of sense, men of learning, and worthy good men, "had but little weight and influence. The mother and the nursery always prevailed." The partisans of Lord Bute, Walpole says, "affected to celebrate the care he had taken of the king's education. . . . His majesty had learned nothing but what a man who knew nothing could teach him." ‡ It has been, we think, hastily assumed that this king, in his maturer life, added nothing to his scanty stores of knowledge.
